Mr. WATKINS. I intend to object, but reserve my objection so that the gentleman can make his statement.

Mr. WILLIS. I thank the gentleman for his courtesy. I was asking unanimous consent to return to section 133, so as to insert the word "bureaus" after the word "departments" in line 15, and also after the word "departments" in line 17. By so doing we will have a complete and definite statement of the method by which exemplified copies can be obtained. It seems to me, if we let it stand as it is, there will be confusion, because there are many bureaus that have seals that are not enumerated here in the bill; and if we are going to enumerate some of the bureaus that have seals, we ought to enumerate all of them, but they are not all enumerated in this bill. Therefore it seems to me it would be better to make a general provision, such as I have suggested, by amending section 133; and I ask unanimous consent to return to section 133 for the purpose of offering that amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Ohio asks unanimous consent to return to section 133 for the purpose of offering an amendment. Is there objection?

Mr. WATKINS. I object, Mr. Chairman.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Louisiana objects.

Mr. WATKINS. Now, Mr. Chairman, I wish to be recognized on the pending amendment offered by the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. STAFFORD]. The gentleman who offers to strike out section 134 gives as his reason for so doing that section 133 covers the law which is intended to be enacted and which is now enforced in section 134. The gentleman is mistaken about that. It is true that in section 133 the Committee of the Whole, having passed over that, have left the statement in the section that other Government establishments besides the executive departments do have the right to give these certifications, and that they are to be recognized, but section 134 is confined to the Solicitor of the Treasury. The Solicitor of the Treasury is not a department of the Government, nor is he one of the establishments of the Government. He has been provided with a seal. There was no doubt a reason at the time the law was enacted providing him with a seal why it should be done, and up to the present time I have heard no reason assigned except that it is not a frequent occurrence when he is called upon to use that seal in these certifications. I know of a number of cases now which in all probability in a short time will require his certification and his seal. There is a bill now pendng in the Senate which I am sure, if it is enacted into law, will require a number of instances in which this seal will have to be used, and it will be a great convenience to the department to have the solicitor himself use the seal, instead of always going to the Secretary, the head of the department, and having him or his secretary stamp his seal on the documents which are certified to by the solicitor.

If that is not done, if he does not go to the head of the department each time to have his seal stamped on the document that is certified, he will have himself to be furnished with the seal of the head of the department. It is not advisable that the various solicitors in the several departments be authorized freely and at their will to use the seal of the head of the department, and it is much better, more practicable, easier, and more satisfactory for the man who is provided with the seal to use his own individual seal, and let the impression of that seal carry its authority along with it. For that reason I oppose the amendment to strike out section 134.

Mr. WILLIS. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. WATKINS. Certainly.

Mr. WILLIS. I understand the gentleman to be contending that the office of the solicitor would not be an executive department or a Government establishment, and I quite agree with him in that contention.

Mr. WATKINS. Yes.

Mr. WILLIS. According to the language of section 133, as I proposed to amend it, would it not be regarded as a bureau, and would not these others mentioned in sections 135, 136, and 137 come under the language already suggested as an amendment? Would they not be bureaus? What is the gentleman's objection to that amendment?

Mr. WATKINS. The objection is that it would be too general. It would give too many parties the right to use the seal, and when those parties were using a seal they would be expected to use the seal of the head of the department, or else the seal would have to be placed in the possession of these subordinates and let them use the seal of the head of the department.

Mr. WILLIS. The gentleman does not contend that the amendment as I have suggested it would permit any bureau to use a seal if it were not already given a seal by law. It could not lead to any confusion in that respect.

Mr. WATKINS. I did not understand the gentleman's suggestion to go that far.

Mr. WILLIS. My suggestion was simply this, to insert the word "bureaus" after the word "departments," in line 15 and in line 17, so that any bureau which now has by law a seal could give exemplified copies. It would not extend the right to any bureau that does not now have a seal by law. I would not favor such a proposition as that for a moment.

Mr. WATKINS. In what part of section 133 does the gentleman propose to insert that language?

Mr. WILLIS. I shall be glad to call the attention of the gentleman to that. My proposition was to amend section 133 so that it would read as follows:

SEC. 133. Copies of any books, records, papers, or documents in any of the executive departments, bureaus, or other Government establishments, authenticated under the seals of such departments, bureaus, or establishments, respectively, shall be admitted in evidence equally with the originals thereof.

Mr. WATKINS. Does not the gentleman realize that if he should use that language, that would require these various bureaus to use the seal of the head of the department?

Mr. WILLIS. No; I do not so understand it. It would require the heads of bureaus that now have seals by law to furnish exemplifications under their seals; but a bureau that does not have any seal would not have any different authority from what it now has.

Mr. WATKINS. The gentleman does not state that those who do not have seals shall not have that authority.

Mr. WILLIS. That would not be necessary, because, of course, those who do not have seals would have no authority and no occasion to give the exemplifications.

Mr. WATKINS. They could use the seal of the head of the department.

Mr. WILLIS. I do not think it would admit of such an interpretation as that, because obviously a bureau that does not have a seal by law could not use a seal, and in those bureaus that do not have seals, of course all the exemplifications would have to be given by the head of the department. But in those bureaus that do have seals they could give exemplified copies without any confusion. That is precisely the point I was trying to make; and if we should amend that section in that way, then it would do away with the necessary confusion that will result if we do not do something of that kind. There are bureaus that have seals that are not mentioned in this bill, and if we pass it as it stands, that must inevitably lead to confusion.

Mr. WATKINS. These bureaus that have seals and are not authorized to use them by this bill would have to get the seal under the head of the department. I think it would make it too general, and I do not think it would be a safe proposition.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment of the gentleman from Wisconsin to strike out section 134.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I can not agree with my friend from Wisconsin [Mr. STAFFORD] in regard to this matter, nor do I agree with the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. WILLIS]. Section 133 is a general section authorizing transcripts of evidence, and so forth, under the seal of the department; or, in the case of the Interstate Commerce Commission, under the seal of the commission as an establishment other than a department. But there are certain officers in the various departments who have control of certain things that do not go through the head of the department. The Solicitor of the Treasury is an officer that has certain powers that are not subject to the control of the Secretary of the Treasury. The Comptroller of the Treasury is another officer with similar powers, and under the law, under the provisions of this bill, these officers have seals to certify copies of papers in their control, and those are to be taken as evidence, and they are not required to go to the head of the department. If the word "bureau" was inserted in section 133, as suggested by the gentleman from Ohio, I am not sure whether it would be sufficient to include them. They are not covered under the term "bureau" ordinarily. They are covered under the term "office." There are many other bureaus of the Government, using the term generically, which come in close contact with the people in their official relations, and they now furnish evidence under the seal of that particular office. It is undoubtedly true that it would be possible to frame a general provision authorizing any bureau which had a seal to certify under the seal of that bureau the transcript of testimony, but it is not entirely certain that that would be desirable. Most of the bureaus which are under the actual control of the head of the department probably ought to submit papers to the head of the department, and obtain the seal in that manner from the head of the department.

Mr. BARTLETT. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MANN. Yes.

Mr. BARTLETT. Does the gentleman understand the word "establishment" to cover the Interstate Commerce Commission?

Mr. MANN. Undoubtedly.

Mr. BARTLETT. And the Commissioner of Insular Affairs?

Mr. MANN. No. I think it would not cover any establishment inside of an executive department, and the Insular Bureau is in the War Department.

Mr. BARTLETT. I intended to say the Isthmian Canal Commission.

Mr. MANN. Oh, yes.

Mr. BARTLETT. The Solicitor of the Treasury would not come under the head of "establishment."

Mr. WILLIS. It would be a bureau.

Mr. MANN. In using language in the past in reference to this matter we have used the words "bureau," "office," and two or three other terms, so as to be sure to include everything of the kind.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Illinois has expired.

Mr. WILLIS. I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman's time be extended five minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. WILLIS. Now, I want to ask the gentleman, suppose the Children's Bureau has a seal——

Mr. MANN. I have just looked that up, and it has not one.

Mr. WILLIS. Then take a bureau that does have a seal.

Mr. BRYAN. The Auditor of the Post Office Department has a seal.

Mr. WILLIS. Take a bureau that does have a seal; how would the gentleman proceed to get an exemplified copy, if you found that bureau was not authorized to issue exemplified copies?

Mr. MANN. I would apply to the head of the bureau for an exemplification, and it would be prepared and furnished under the seal of the department.

Mr. WILLIS. Notwithstanding the bureau had a seal, it could not use it?

Mr. MANN. It could not use it in that case, undoubtedly. As a matter of fact, I do not think a bureau ought to have a seal unless there is a special reason for it.

Mr. BARTLETT. I was going to say that I think the wisdom of the policy is not to give a seal to the bureau where there is not too much inconvenience to require the seal of the head of the department.

Mr. SLOAN. Mr. Chairman, I have looked around on the vast unoccupied public domain in this House, and not desiring to raise the question of no quorum, I desire to submit a parliamentary inquiry.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. SLOAN. Would it be proper now to make a filing for a homestead on this great unoccupied American domain? [Laughter.]

The CHAIRMAN. That is not a parliamentary inquiry. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Wisconsin.

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. WATKINS) there were 4 ayes and 10 noes.

So the amendment was rejected.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 136. Every certificate, assignment, and conveyance executed by the Comptroller of the Currency in pursuance of law, and sealed with his seal of office, shall be received in evidence in all places and courts; and all copies of papers in his office, certified by him and authenticated by the said seal, shall in all cases be evidence equally with the originals. An impression of such seal directly on the paper shall be as valid as if made on wax or wafer.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. Do I understand the purport of the present section that certified copies of the certificates, assignments, and conveyances executed by the Comptroller of the Currency would be received as evidence in all the courts and places outside of the jurisdiction of the United States? Was not the provision originally a part of the law that limits its effects to United States courts?

Mr. WATKINS. These laws of evidence apply to United States courts as a rule. It is enacted for the purpose of being used in United States courts.

Mr. MANN. Oh, no; they are good anywhere.

Mr. WATKINS. They are for the courts in the United States.

Mr. STAFFORD. Of course, there is no limitation in this particular section. It struck me that there ought to be a clause limiting it to the jurisdiction of the United States.

Mr. WATKINS. We could not enact laws for other countries.

Mr. STAFFORD. I am quite well aware of that; but I think it would be made clear by the addition of the words "within the jurisdiction of the United States."

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, the pro forma amendment will be withdrawn, and the Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 137. Copies of the organization certificate of any national banking association, duly certified by the Comptroller of the Currency, and authenticated by his seal of office, shall be evidence in all courts and places within the jurisdiction of the United States of the existence of the association, and of every matter which could be proved by the production of the original certificate.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word, and suggest to the gentleman that he prepare and probably later put into this part of the bill a provision in reference to the organization of the Federal reserve boards, and so forth.

Mr. WATKINS. Mr. Chairman, I will state to the gentleman that my understanding is that the same official now signs those certifications who signed them under the late law; at least, he is continuing to do that up to the present time.

Mr. MANN. The same official may sign them, but this language is:

Organization certificate of any national banking association.

Mr. WATKINS. Yes; he is signing them right now.

Mr. MANN. I know; but the Federal Reserve Board is not a national banking association. In the codification that may as well be included, so as to have it all in this law. Of course it is covered by existing law, but that was passed by act of Congress since this matter was arranged, probably.

Mr. CULLOP. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MANN. Certainly.

Mr. CULLOP. Why not add to this section, where it properly belongs, an amendment containing this phrase?

Mr. MANN. I did not undertake to say what language would be sufficient, but I call the attention of the chairman of the Committee on Revision of the Laws to it, so that he might have an amendment prepared and return to it and insert it, if he desires.

Mr. CULLOP. I was going to make that suggestion to the gentleman. Why not have this section passed until the gentleman can see what language the amendment should be in that should be made to this section for the purpose of having it cover that matter?

Mr. WATKINS. Mr. Chairman, in answer to the gentleman's question, I will state that the Comptroller of the Currency is still signing these certificates and using the seal, and, I suppose, will continue to do it. I do not know of any reason why there should be any change.

Mr. MANN. But the gentleman will notice that section 137 provides:

Copies of the organization certificate of any national banking association duly certified by the Comptroller of the Currency, etc.

A "national banking association" is the title of a national bank under the law.

Mr. WATKINS. Would there not be time when we get to section 137 to consider that?

Mr. MANN. That is what we are considering now.

Mr. WATKINS. I thought we were on 136. My attention was called off, and we passed 136 without my knowing it. I beg the gentleman's pardon. I stand corrected.

Mr. CULLOP. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman ask to have the section passed until a proper amendment can be prepared?

Mr. WATKINS. Mr. Chairman, I have no objection to that.

Mr. BARTLETT. Does not the gentleman think we ought to still leave it here? There may be cases arise in which they would require a certified copy from the comptroller's office.

Mr. MANN. I am not objecting to that at all; but I suggested, as long as we are codifying, that we add to that what is carried as to the Federal Reserve Board.

Mr. BARTLETT. I think that is true; but we ought not to strike this out.

Mr. MANN. Oh, no. Nobody has suggested that.

Mr. WATKINS. Mr. Chairman, I see no objection to passing this over and considering it at our next session.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Louisiana asks unanimous consent to pass over temporarily section 137. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 141. Copies of the quarterly returns of postmasters and of any papers pertaining to the accounts in the office of the Auditor of the Treasury for the Post Office Department, and transcripts from the money-order account books of the Post Office Department, when certified by the said auditor under the seal of his office, shall be admitted as evidence in the courts of the United States in civil suits and criminal prosecutions; and in any civil suit, in case of delinquency of any postmaster or contractor, a statement of the account, certified as aforesaid, shall be admitted in evidence, and the court shall be authorized thereupon to give judgment and award execution, subject to the provisions of law as to proceedings in such civil suits.

Mr. BRYAN. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. I have very serious doubt that so much importance ought to be paid to these accounts in the office of the Auditor of the Post Office Department as is provided for in this section. There may be basis of criminal prosecutions by this section, but according to the best information I can gather things are in such shape down there that those accounts and claims that are filed against the post offices over the country are not receiving any great indorsement from the postmasters, and the auditor down there generally has to back up when the postmasters come back against him and attempt to show him his inaccuracy. Of course the Auditor of the Post Office Department is a man who was advanced by the request of Senator PENROSE and Senator OLIVER of Pennsylvania, and he is very well versed in Republican systems, and all that sort of thing, and has, no doubt, rendered great and efficient service to the Republican Party in precinct, county, State, and Nation, and it is a $5,000 job, and I have no doubt somebody thinks that he is the only man in the United States who can do that work or else he would not keep the job. But I am sure the auditor has the wool pulled over the eyes of those who have charge of things. The auditor's office is about a year behind now. A short time ago they threw six months' work entirely away, never having audited it. He has special clerks there now auditing on stuff that involves the year 1912.

A short time ago he ordered a woman suspended. It is claimed that he ordered her suspended because he thought she had given out some information revealing his faulty methods, but he alleged as a reason—the principal reason—that she was a trouble maker, and that eight years ago, 1906, she had closed a transom that allowed a draft between her room and an adjoining room. That was the only point against her definitely, so she protested earnestly and vigorously to the Secretary of the Treasury and asked that she be reinstated, or be removed from the cruel jurisdiction of this man, and went after him hot and heavy. I published her answer in the RECORD. Others brought the matter to the attention of the Assistant Secretary of the Treasury, Mr. Hamlin, and the woman was reinstated and transferred to another department, showing that the auditor himself was to blame; he was not vindicated; and I am quite sure that the administration that is so obsessed with the idea that this PENROSE politician is the only man in the world that is able to do that work and that there is nobody else who could do it, if it would make an investigation would find that it is entirely off on that matter, and would learn of the accusations made of the way he treats his employees, trying to cut them out of their leave, and terrorizes them with every form of petty restriction.

I understand he is attempting to relieve this key-punching arrangement now by declaring a 5-minute recess every hour, and when 55 minutes comes they ring a bell and the clerks running these punching machines get a 5-minute recess, and they must take it. Of course, that merely indicates the proposition I have already advanced that they are not operated under right conditions. He has not yet consented for the Bureau of Health to investigate, and, although complaints have been filed with the Bureau of Health and that bureau has tried to investigate him, he has refused to permit the investigation, and so I think that the provisions that are included here in this section pay entirely too much attention to the auditor's findings and give entirely too much consideration to his certifications under seal.

If the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. Cox] would publish the letters and complaints he has received against Mr. Kram and his methods, he would reveal a condition that would demand an investigation. In a former statement Mr. Cox mentioned the fact that very violent complaints had been lodged with him against the auditor, but Mr. Cox declared that upon investigation he had discovered that there was no merit to the complaints. The way Mr. Kram puts it over on these newly empowered Democrats is really amusing. Take a man who knows nothing about shoe machinery through a big shoe factory and praise all the machinery and tell him how it all works; he will agree with the expert when he is through the factory; but let a real expert go through and a different report may be made. Mr. Kram takes Mr. Congressman up to those men, piece-rate workers, who hold down the bonanza jobs, many of them colored men, who formerly received lower pay than they now receive, and they simply fill the Congressman full, stuff him; yes, Kram him, and he goes away and peddles the dressing.

They do not know anything about the system; they do not hear complaints, because a complaining clerk knows what will happen if Mr. Kram hears any complaints.

There is not one of these defenders of the wonderful Mr. Kram on this floor that could explain his system to any inquirer. I went through and heard him tell how it was all done, and it all seemed plausible. But when I asked him to let me talk with the bookkeepers who receive the postmasters' kicks against his audit he balked. There are barrels of letters there from postmasters who will not pay up on his demands, and generally when the postmaster writes as though he knows what he is talking about, the auditor writes back, "All right, sir; we will just drop the matter."

Mr. George B. Furman, a clerk who received Mr. Kram's commendation for his efficiency, wrote the Secretary of the Treasury on March 27, 1913, that Kram's audit was a farce. Furman is in another department now. He told the Secretary to interrogate certain men in Kram's department if he wanted the facts. Does anybody suppose that Secretary McAdoo knows anything himself about this? I am sure he would not claim such knowledge. I do not want to repeat the figures I put in the RECORD on May 11, 1914, but I refer Mr. Cox and the defenders of this system to page 8767 of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD for figures which have been given to me as accurate, which show that the system is wasting money at a lavish rate. I do not claim to know that these figures are accurate, but they are declared to be by parties who ought to know, and I challenge the defenders of the auditor to show wherein the figures are wrong. The auditor is not fair in his claims. In a recent statement he said:

It was recognized at the time the electrical tabulation system was installed that there were a number of employees in the office not adapted or not qualified to perform the work under the new system.

There is just enough truth in that statement to make it false. No one has ever claimed that anybody employed on the electrical tabulating machines is not qualified or that these machines are injurious. The electrical machines afford bonanza jobs comparatively speaking. Some of them tabulate, others assort. The operators of these machines are, as a rule, very well pleased. Most of them are men.

The machines complained of have no more connection with electricity than the North Pole has with the Equator. This controversy arises over the card-punching machines, and they are not electrified. It is wrong for Auditor Kram to talk about electricty when discussing these machines.

The auditor says a number of employees are not adapted to these machines and adds:

There are persons who are not adapted to the work of typewriting, but typewriting would not be condemned for that reason. The operation of a key-punching machine is similar to the operation of a typewriting machine, and experience has shown that there are a few employees not adapted by temperament or training to the operation of this device. They are a small minority, and their dissatisfaction or inefficiency in this respect should not be seized upon as an opportunity to condemn a system which has demonstrated its superiority over the method of audit formerly in use.

CLAIM MANY ARE AFFECTED.

Auditor Kram has used a typewriter, and he should realize the comparison is not justified. He told me himself that men are not qualified for these punching machines. Not a man is employed. He said he himself could not operate them. Are the men in his office a "small minority"? No; they are a large majority.

All the men and very many women are disqualified for these piece-rate punching machines. He demands young women. They are mostly District women and girls who have no Congressmen or Senators to look after their interests. Those who are in line for promotion belong elsewhere, for piece-rate workers have no promotion ahead.

The operation of a typewriter and one of these punching machines are no more subject to comparison than joy riding and sewer digging. It is an outrage for an intelligent man to attempt such a comparison. Why are men disqualified? Simply because men are accustomed to voting and will not stand subjection and abuse. Put 10 men in one of those rooms with 10 of those machines to be operated piece rate and subject to error slips, and in a week they would all quit or fight; if they did not, they would go crazy.

Why does Mrs. Archibald Hopkins complain to the Health Bureau? Why do the operators go to the doctors? Why does Auditor Kram slam the door shut in the face of the Government Health Bureau? The women and girls are eager to make something for their support, and he holds out better wages by piece rate, and by a series of bulletins and classifications the fastest ones make their mark while they last. When they come to themselves, and he begins to suspect that they will tell facts about his system, he has them dismissed, as he did Miss Nellie M. Corrigan the other day, because she closed a transom that some one else had opened eight years ago.

AVERAGES CRITICIZED.

Kram's figures are misleading. When he talks about averages, he does not consider the key punchers alone, but includes a lot of other employees. The claims of the auditor about saving money to the Government are mostly electrified figures, according to the very best information I can gather.

The auditor says:

When we question a postmaster's statement of money-order accounts, we virtually charge him with embezzlement.

Yet there are barrels of letters in the office now from postmasters who refuse to accept the audit of these machines. A southern postmaster wrote the auditor a "sassy" letter recently, in substance as follows:

I keep accurate records; your audit is crazy. I have advanced some money out of my own pocket to satisfy some of those holes punched by your tired piece-rate workers, but I'll do that no more.

Another one out West wrote him that he had allowed him a credit for a certain substantial amount to which he was not entitled, and the western postmaster expressed surprise that Uncle Samuel had such a silly auditing system.

BALANCE SHEETS SAID TO BE OFF.

They are supposed to strike a trial balance with the offices of the several States. I am reliably informed that most of the State balance sheets are hopelessly off.

The office is a crazy house. In the course of the audit, cards are found for which there is no possible accounting. They are called stray cards, and there is a "mating room," where girls attempt to make them match. It looks more like a game of solitaire. Each ill-mate is an error on some postmaster, who, the auditor says, gets charged with embezzlement.

But for all this the auditor has applied a new remedy. His recent "mum-and-gag" rule is the most preposterous and absurd order ever issued in a Government department.

There is an order in the Treasury Department which reads as follows:

Clerks and employees will not be permitted to visit each other or to receive visits during office hours except on official business, and then only with the knowledge and concurrence of their immediate superiors. Frequenting or loitering in the corridors of buildings will not be permitted.

Pretending to recite and post this order, but omitting the words "during office hours," the following has been issued by Auditor Kram:

The Treasury Department rule which forbids clerks and employees to visit each other or to receive visits except on official business, and then only with the knowledge and concurrence of their official superiors, must be strictly observed.

Visiting by employees on one floor with those on another floor, or between those in different divisions, is positively forbidden.

MUST NOT VISIT.

Card-punch operatives must not visit or receive visits from adding-machine operators or examiners on either the paid or issued side.

These directions are effective during office hours, luncheon half hour, and any period of attendance, before or after office hours.

By direction of the auditor.

It will be seen that Kram's order prohibits the employees from talking from one department to another at noon or before office hours, in time which is their own and is designed for recreation. The rule says "visit," which means, of course, that they are not permitted to confer one with another about any subject on earth. This rule is not in force in any department or private manufacturing plant in the country, and is so absurd as to brand his system as absolutely impossible.

I received the following letter recently:

MAY 5, 1914.

Hon. Mr. BRYAN.

SIR: I can not refrain from a few remarks regarding the wonderful Mr. Kram, Auditor for the Post Office Department. "He is such an efficient man." Was there ever an efficient man before Mr. Kram? It seems not, as most of them have retired and had their places ably filled. Now, who has proven Mr. Kram's efficiency? No one save Mr. Kram, for, as you are aware, he will not dare let the office be investigated. If his office is beyond reproach, I should think that he would welcome an investigation and be vindicated of the charges made against him. No; he would not dare let the eyes of an honest man see into the black corners. In penalizing he has not done so to the men; he has discriminated against one class of women, and even now, instead of fighting openly, he is dodging behind a few women in the office to try to carry on his sweatshop system.

Sincerely,

I have dozens of letters and have had dozens of interviews on this subject. I shall publish here a letter received from a Central State. If I give the name of the city, I fear Auditor Kram could locate the woman referred to and probably fire her because she opened a transom eight years ago.

Hon. Mr. BRYAN, Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR MR. BRYAN: I take the liberty to write you a few lines regarding a matter which I know you will be interested in greatly.

As you are one out of many Congressmen who has the courage of your convictions and man enough to come to the defense of the poor and helpless girls employed by the Auditor of the Post Office Department of the Treasury, Mr. Kram, who seems to enjoy putting the bulk of burden upon the girls who have little influence or none to work in their interest and who work in his health-wrecking and degrading office because they have to work for a living, I wish to enter my protest and objection against the method of treatment and manner carried on in the office of the auditor. My sister * * * accepted a position under Auditor Kram about two years ago temporarily on some clerical work which lasted three or four months. When my sister went home Auditor Kram was as nice as pie, saying that he would have her name restored on the eligible list; but she learned afterward that he did not report her name eligible for appointment until six or more months after she was dismissed, and her name should have been on the list. I can not go into detail, but Kram tried his very best to prevent her reinstatement, and in spite of Mr. GRAHAM'S efforts he delayed her reinstatement to the very last minute, and when my sister reached Washington he said that "We had an awful time getting you back."

Well, she was placed upon those nerve and health wrecking punching machines, although she is rather nervous disposition. As the weeks and months passed there was still no promotion offered. It has been seven months now since she started. Girls who came in two or three months later than sister have been promoted to positions of good pay and pleasant work. There was another department a king for my sister at two different times to fill a position, but Kram stood in her way, saying that my sister was satisfied and doing nice work. And Mr. Kram refused to let her go, saying that he was satisfied with the work she was doing and had refused both times to let her go into the other department, but pushed some of his favorites into the position who had worked only a short time. Kram did not even ask my sister if she would accept the position offered or tell her that she had been called upon. I want you to call my sister for an interview immediately, and I believe that my sister and scores of other girls under him can give you some heart-rending stories of solid fact regarding the auditor's office if they have courage to testify against him. I know that practically every operater of those machines are afraid to say anything against the auditor for fear of losing their jobs or gaining his ill will, in which case one has no alternative except quitting or working to death, Kram caring very little which is chosen.

My sister is literally a nervous wreck and eyesight so greatly affected by close work that both nerves and eyes may be permanently injured, and if something is not done immediately in the way of betterment for the employees I believe that the department head should be held responsible for such conditions, and I believe that such conditions as now exist are a disgrace to a civilized nation and are indefensible.

Mr. Kram's machines may save money in one way, but I do not believe in holding the dollar so close to the eye that the condition of the employees can not and are not to be seen.

I am writing this in behalf of all of those employed on those awful machines, and ask that in the name of justice, in the name of humanity, that you and Congress abolish such machines, as well as such auditors. I am,

Yours, very respectfully, ——— ———.

I withhold the name of this party for obvious reasons.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, it is one of the blessed privileges of being elected a Member of this House that you have the right to abuse anybody you want to, and especially if it is some other Government official, you can abuse him as often as you can get the floor. I take it that if at any time during the night, when the gentleman from Washington was sound asleep, somebody should whisper the words "Auditor for the Post Office Department," he would instantly, either awake or asleep, be making a speech abusing that auditor. It is an obsession with the gentleman from Washington. Everyone else, or nearly everyone else, believes Mr. Kram to be one of the best officials in the Government service. That is testified to by the high standing that he has under a Democratic administration. If, as suggested by the gentleman from Washington—and I am not posted on the matter—he was originally placed in office through the influence of Senator PENROSE, no one accuses him of having any political influence with the Democratic administration or with the Progressive Party. Now, the gentleman again repeats the statement that the Auditor for the Post Office Department, who is under the control of the Secretary of the Treasury, refused to permit the Public Health Service, which is also under the control of the Secretary of the Treasury, to investigate the auditor's office. I take it that that is an impossibility. This investigation would be by order of the Secretary of the Treasury; and if the Secretary of the Treasury, who has control of the Public Health Service, should direct an investigation of the auditor's office, also under his control, there would be no way of escaping it.

Mr. BRYAN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MANN. Certainly.

Mr. BRYAN. The gentleman remembers that I stated here recently that Dr. Rucker, of the Health Bureau, told me that he was sent there to investigate these objections, and that Mr. Kram objected to the investigation and plead jurisdiction, and that the only way the bureau could investigate was to ride over him, roughshod, or words to that effect.

Mr. MANN. Why, if the Public Health Service should send a doctor to my office to investigate it, I would throw him out.

Mr. BRYAN. The gentleman is like Mr. Kram on that.

Mr. MANN. Yes; absolutely. There is a method, a proper method, by which the Public Health Service has authority. It has no right to make these investigations except by proper order of the Secretary of the Treasury; he is the one to give the order to make the investigation; and if he gives such an order, it will be obeyed. Without such an order, the Public Health Service has no business to stick its nose in the matter.

Mr. COX. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word, and ask the indulgence of the committee a few moments. The other day, when the legislative, executive, and judicial bill was under discussion, several Members of the House, including the gentleman from the State of Washington [Mr. BRYAN], took occasion to severely criticize Auditor Kram of the Post Office Department. I did not believe that the criticism was just and merited for anything that Mr. Kram had done, and in defense of him I said a few words in his behalf. Since that time I have received several letters from employees working in his office, every one of them commending him in every way, not only for his humaneness but commending the system he had inaugurated, and each one of them denying the charges made against him by Members on the floor of this House that he was an autocrat or a tyrant.

Mr. WILLIS. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. COX. For a question.

Mr. WILLIS. I understood the gentleman to say that the correspondents were condemning the methods of Auditor Kram.

Mr. COX. Oh, no; commending. If I said condemn, I will correct it in my remarks.

Mr. WILLIS. The gentleman said some eight letters commended him.

Mr. COX. I have received five or six letters commending him, and am going to ask the privilege of inserting those letters and making them a part of my remarks.

WASHINGTON, D. C., April 17, 1914.

Hon. WILLIAM E. COX,
House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: I am employed in the office of the Auditor for the Post Office Department as a piece-rate operative.

I wish to state that I have worked on an average of five and one-half hours each day, and received amounts varying from $100 to $120 per month.

I have always been treated very fairly by the officials in this office, and hope that the present piece-rate system will continue.

Thanking you very kindly, and with best wishes for your success, I am,

Respectfully, yours, ——— ———.

WASHINGTON, D. C., May 7, 1914.

Hon. W. E. COX,
House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.

SIR: Having recently read of the many abuses and hardships that the piecework system in the Office of the Auditor for the Post Office Department has worked against the employees of that office, and being employed there myself, and desiring to be fair and equitable to all concerned, I would like to add a word of praise from an unprejudiced standpoint.

I firmly believe that the placing of employees on a basis wherein they are paid for actual work turned out is, in my judgment, the only fair way to compensate, for this gives each and every individual an opportunity to demonstrate their fitness, and, as a consequence, does away with the possibility of favoritism being shown.

In the second place, I believe that there are very few instances where those who have been taken off the regular roll and placed on the basis of pay for what you do have suffered very much of a reduction, as far as actual cash is concerned.

Before this system was installed, when an employee was promoted it was not uncommon to hear comments about the favoritism that was being shown in the matter of promoting people; now this is all done away with, so far as I can hear.

Of course, it is hardly possible to find any two people who will turn out the same amount of work; but, then, this ought to be no excuse to condemn the method of payment, for how often do we find men and women drawing from two to six hundred dollars per year more than the employee sitting next to them, and who turn out less work than this employee; and yet were an effort made to give their salary to the person doing more work than they, there would be a great big hallo made about it.

I have seen many instances where employees have been transferred from one work to another when they demonstrated that they were unable to perform that work; and this is more consideration than is given in some places, for it would be possible to dismiss an employee if it were found that he was unable to perform work assigned, and the employee would have no recourse; but the auditor has, I firmly believe, tried to take care in some way or other of all of the employees whom he has learned were unable to perform duties assigned, if not in his office, in other branches of the service.

Now, as to the complaints about the driving propensities of the auditor, these I am unacquainted with, for personally he has always been very considerate whenever I have had an occasion to converse with him.

While it is true that the leave periods were somewhat disturbed during the last year, this, to my judgment, was not done from a standpoint of unfriendliness toward the employees, but due to the fact that the new system of accounting being in its embryonic stage necessitated a full force being present as near all the time as was practicable in order that the work might go on unhampered.

In conclusion permit me to say I for one am not so biased or prejudiced that I can not see some good in the system of pay for what you actually do.

Respectfully, yours, ——— ———.

P. S.—I do not know whether you care to use this letter or not in any public way, but prefer that you not use my name unless it be actually necessary, for I would not care to win the displeasure of any Member of Congress who might be opposed to the system now in vogue in the Office of the Auditor for the Post Office Department.

OFFICE AUDITOR POST OFFICE DEPARTMENT,
April 19, 1914.

Hon. WILLIAM COX, M. C.,
House of Representatives.

DEAR SIR: I have been reading with interest your defense of the Auditor for the Post Office Department, Charles Kram. Prior to this system now in vogue I received a salary of $660 per annum; worked side by side with clerks who received $720, $780, $840, and $900 per annum for the same work performed. It was more of a sweat shop in those days than to-day, and a veritable hell in seven volumes.

There are several, nay, a goodly number of clerks who are not afraid to speak up, and all we do want is piece, with peace—simple peace—thrown in. The ones who disfavor piece rate desire the old method restored, which means favoritism, and the auditor's office under former auditors headed the list for large pay for little work, small pay for efficient workers.

The auditor, Charles Kram, came as a godsend to overworked women, who were discriminated against year after year and who are now making a decent, honest living. The work requires the mind's attention and a quick eye, and there are some people that can only look after their neighbors' business from morn to night. My sentiments are piece rate and God bless our auditor.

BETHESDA, MD., April 13, 1914.

Hon. WILLIAM E. COX,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: I wish to commend you for so loyally defending our auditor, Mr. Kram, during the discussion of last week, in which not only this new system was attacked, but Mr. Kram himself.

It was all so unfair and so unjust that I wonder what motive could prompt one person to make such a remark about another as did Mr. NOLAN about Mr. Kram. I am operating an electrical tabulating machine in this office, and I can knowingly say that many things said about this system and the manner of operating it are false. The trouble is this: So many clerks have been on a so-called pension plan for so long that the giving of a full day's work for a full day's pay is very foreign to their policies. Mr. Kram does not drive us, neither does he measure out the amount of work to be done in a day; the clerks determine that themselves—those who are not afraid to work.

There are a few agitators in this office who spend a portion of each day in the "rest room" criticizing the new system, Mr. Kram, and the clerks who are trying to assist him.

I am going to ask you to treat this letter as a private matter, but if there are any questions you want to ask me, I am ready to answer anything you want answered. I am,

Respectfully, yours, ——— ———.

WASHINGTON, D. C., April 18, 1914.

DEAR SIR: The statements and attack being made against Mr. Kram are wholly without foundation.

Mr. Kram has a character that is unblemished when it comes to honesty, and it is only because he is "doing things," making his clerks work, is the sole reason for this attack.

I have been in his office for almost 10 years, and I am on piece rate, making more than I ever made, and I don't hear the "key punchers" voicing their dissatisfaction, if any. There are some few—what we speak of as trouble brewers—who have tried to cause discontentment, and I think it is their failure to accomplish their end that has made them forget and throw aside any truthfulness that they might have had before making their attack; and I am surprised that men of any intelligence would go ahead and attack a man that they really had no cause—just cause—to attack, without looking into matters.

AN EMPLOYEE.

Mr. BRYAN. I would like to couple with that request that I may be permitted to insert quite a number of letters, particularly one which I received this morning.

Mr. COX. The gentleman can make that request in his own time.

Mr. Chairman, I do not believe the criticism imposed upon Mr. Kram is just. I do not believe there is any merit or any basis for the criticism at all. During the progress of these debates I have been referred to particularly by the gentleman from the State of Washington because I stated during the debates, while the legislative, executive, and judicial appropriation bill was under consideration, that some of the employees of the auditor's office tried to get me to investigate it. It is true they did come to my office and endeavor to get me to inaugurate an investigation of Mr. Kram's office, including the system of work that was then being tried out by him. I went in person to the auditor's office in response to the request made to me by the employees and investigated it, and I gave it then as my judgment that the employees who were objecting to it were making an unjust and erroneous criticism not only upon Mr. Kram personally, but the method of his work. Mr. Chairman, what has been the result of the system of work employed by Mr. Kram? So far as the system inaugurated by Mr. Kram is concerned it has certainly inured to the financial benefit of a large number of the employees in his office. Of the employees who earned $720 per year prior to the inauguration of the system many of them are now earning from $800 to $1,100 per year, and at the same time many of these employees are able to do and conclude their day's work in from four to five or six hours per day; and I am informed by Mr. Kram and many of the employees under him that if he would not fix a maximum amount for a day's work many of these employees would earn from $1,200 to $1,400 per year who prior to the inauguration of this system earned only $720 per year, and yet Mr. Kram must be sat upon, personally abused, and attacked by Members upon the floor of this House for having brought about a betterment of the condition of his employees by increasing their wages and shortening their hours of employment, as testified to by the employees whose letters are printed herein.

The system he has inaugurated to a very large extent develops the individuality of the person and appeals to the employee to make good, and to advance himself according to his own ability to make advancement, and does away with the system heretofore largely accused of being in force—that of having a political pull—and places each employee upon his or her own merit, and enables them to go to the top by their own ability unaided and unassisted by any inside or outside political help.

If inaugurating a system whereby employees can increase their salaries from 20 to 33⅓ per cent and at the same time reduce the number of hours of labor per day works to an injury of such employees, then perhaps some of the criticism waged against Mr. Kram and the system he has inaugurated might be just. If, on the other hand, these things work to the benefit of the employee, from the viewpoint of any ambitious man or woman desiring to better their condition, instead of him being censured and criticized he ought to be commended and upheld. The system inaugurated by him in this department, the largest auditing department in the Government, being the biggest department of the Government except the Treasury, has enabled the Postmaster General to decrease the number of employees in the department between 70 and 80. The postal business increases each year between 7½ to 10 per cent in volume of business. This carries with it a corresponding increase in the number of employees to do and transact the business of the department, but no increase in employees has been added to the force of Mr. Kram. Notwithstanding the increase of business he has been able to decrease the number of employees. Certainly for this he ought to be commended instead of condemned. It looks to me very much like that when a man does his duty as a public official, brings efficiency to bear upon his work, and also economy to the taxpayers of this country, instead of being commended on all sides we hear him condemned. This is not much encouragement to a man honestly endeavoring to serve his country, but I am glad to know that the views of the gentleman from the State of Washington are not shared in by very many Members of this House. But no condemnation heaped upon Mr. Kram either personally or upon his system will detract from his ability and efficiency as a public official. It will stand out in bold relief and defy all criticism, no matter if it comes from employees in his department or falls upon deaf ears on the floor of this House.

Recently the Federal Reserve Board asked the Postmaster General that Mr. Kram be detailed to go to the city of New York to enable the members of the board to put in force the same system now in force in the Post Office Department in the great regional reserve bank to be established in the city of New York.

Mr. BRYAN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. COX. Does that show success or does it show failure?

Mr. BRYAN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. COX. For a question only.

Mr. BRYAN. Did they put the system in or was it rejected?

Mr. COX. I do not know whether it was put in or not, but I imagine they are going to put it in. The reserve board sent for Mr. Kram and selected him above all others to go to New York, the great financial center of the Nation, for the purpose of teaching men of experience, men in high finance, and men who have studied every system from an economical viewpoint, and they sought him out to tell them how to inaugurate a perfect system in their new and proposed regional bank, so as to enable it to reduce expenses to a minimum.

Mr. Chairman, I can not believe that Mr. Kram is inhuman, tyrannical, or autocratic. On the contrary, I believe that he is fully possessed of every principle of wide, broad, and comprehensive humanity. I think the fault lies with a large number of the clerks in his department. To quote from one of these letters:

So many clerks have been on the so-called pension plan for so long that the giving of a full day's work for a full day's pay is very foreign to their policies.

It should be the object and aim of every clerk—and, in fact, everyone connected with Government service, be the position high or low—to feel the solemn duty of rendering to their employer, the Government, a full day's work; they should not feel simply because they are working for the Government that they are not under the same obligation to do a full day's work that they would be under if working for a private individual.

Full freedom is granted to each clerk in this line of work and a maximum placed upon the amount of work each clerk can do, and beyond that maximum no clerk is permitted to go, and that maximum is so arranged that any clerk with ordinary ability can easily do his or her day's work if they be but willing so to do.

If it is found that a clerk is unfitted for this kind of work, they are transferred to some other department. In other words, no clerk is required to work here against his or her will. If they find they are unable to do this kind of work, all they have to do is to ask for a transfer, and it will be quickly granted. It is peculiar, when other departments of the Government are constantly taking on employees, at a tremendous cost and expense to the people, and though the business of Mr. Kram's office is increasing each year by leaps and bounds, yet he has not only been able to do this work with the employees that he had when he begun the system, but he has not taken on any additional employees, and has brought about such a condition and improvement as to enable the Postmaster General to dispense with from 70 to 80 employees in the department; but for all this he is to be condemned, and condemned in a place where his voice is not to be heard. I have no interest on earth in Mr. Kram personally, except the interest that I have in my fellow man, in seeing that full, fair justice be meted out to each and all as merit is due each and all.

I hope this controversy will cease and, as some of these writers in these letters say, that they will have peace down there; and let those who are not willing to do piecework seek employment elsewhere, and if they are not satisfied with it, and can not get employment elsewhere, let them quit the service entirely and seek employment in private life. It is wrong, unjust, and unfair to criticize a man for having done nothing but his solemn duty, and for one I refuse to remain idly by and fail to raise my voice in defense of a man who I believe has done nothing but his duty.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Washington [Mr. BRYAN] wish to extend his remarks?

Mr. BRYAN. Yes; by inserting these letters.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Washington asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks by inserting the letters referred to. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. BRYAN. I wish also to incorporate figures to show that this pretense about this remarkable saving is all bosh; that he has not made any saving, and has not raised the salary of employees.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Washington [Mr. BRYAN] asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none. Without objection, the pro forma amendment will be withdrawn, and the Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 149. The transcripts into new books made by the clerks of the district courts in the several districts of Texas, Florida, Wisconsin, Minnesota, Iowa, and Kansas, in pursuance of the act of June 27, 1864, chapter 165, from the records and journals transferred by them, respectively, under the said act, to the clerks of the circuit courts in said districts, when certified by the clerks, respectively, making the same to be full and true copies from the original books, shall have the same force and effect as records as the originals. The certificates of the clerks of the circuit or district courts, respectively, of transcripts of any of the books or papers so transferred to them shall be received in evidence with the like effect as if made by the clerk of the court in which the proceedings were had.

Mr. WATKINS. Mr. Chairman, I wish to offer an amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Louisiana [Mr. WATKINS] offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

Page 84, line 7, strike out all of section 149 and insert in lieu thereof the following:

"SEC. 149. That in any proceeding before a court or judicial officer of the United States, where the genuineness of the handwriting of any person may be involved, any admitted or proved handwriting of such person shall be competent evidence as a basis for comparison by witnesses, or by the jury, court, or officer conducting such proceeding, to prove or disprove such genuineness.

Mr. MANN. I reserve a point of order on the amendment.

Mr. WATKINS. Mr. Chairman——

Mr. MANN. May I ask the gentleman if section 149 is entirely obsolete now?

Mr. WATKINS. My amendment is to strike out that section and insert the other in place of it.

Mr. MANN. Is section 149 now entirely obsolete?

Mr. WATKINS. So far as I can find from investigation I have made, it appears to be. I can not find any use to which it can be put at this time at all. The circuit court being abolished, I think it invalidates that section. That operated so long as the circuit court was in force.

Mr. MANN. This relates to the district court. I will take the gentleman's statement in reference to that.

Mr. WATKINS. If the gentleman will look at line 13, he will understand what I mean.

Mr. MANN. I see.

Mr. WATKINS. Now, Mr. Chairman, it may be necessary to make a short statement in reference to that.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I ask to have the amendment reported again.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will again report the amendment.

The amendment was again reported.

Mr. WATKINS. Mr. Chairman, the point of order has been reserved, and the objection has been stated that it is not germane. It is the striking out of what I consider to be an obsolete statute.

Mr. MANN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WATKINS. Yes, sir.

Mr. MANN. Of course, I take it the gentleman is perfectly willing to let section 149 go out as obsolete.

Mr. WATKINS. I am.

Mr. MANN. And then was proposing to make use of the opportunity to put a section in there.

Mr. WATKINS. Just preserving the number, as we are on the subject of evidence.

Mr. MANN. After all, it is not germane to this part of the bill.

Mr. WATKINS. I do not claim that.

Mr. MANN. Why do you not put this section in where it belongs?

Mr. WATKINS. It will fit in there about as well as anywhere else. That is a recent law passed by Congress.

Mr. MANN. It is right in the middle of the law with reference to transcript of testimony, and so forth. It has nothing to do with this subject matter. What harm would it do to put that section in where it belongs, and then these numbers along here can be easily changed.

Mr. LLOYD. Put it in at the end of chapter 3.

Mr. STAFFORD. Would it not be better at the end of section No. 111 or 112?

Mr. WATKINS. I was trying to utilize that section by using the number, and when the bill goes to the Senate we can rearrange the numbers.

Mr. MANN. Well, I do not care. I withdraw the point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] withdraws the point of order. The question is on the amendment striking out the section and inserting a new section.

The amendment was agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

The committee informally rose; and Mr. LLOYD having taken the chair as Speaker pro tempore, a message from the Senate, by Mr. Tulley, one of its clerks, announced that the Senate had passed bill of the following title, in which the concurrence of the House of Representatives was requested:

S. 5574. An act to amend and reenact section 113 of chapter 5 of the Judicial Code of the United States.

The message also announced that the Vice President had appointed Mr. PAGE and Mr. LANE members of the joint select committee on the part of the Senate, as provided for in the act of February 16, 1889, as amended by the act of March 2, 1895, entitled "An act to authorize and provide for the disposition of useless papers in the executive departments," for the disposition of useless papers in the Treasury Department.

REVISION OF THE LAWS—JUDICIARY TITLE.

The committee resumed its session.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 151. The transcripts into new books made by the clerks of the circuit courts of appeals and district courts in pursuance of any law or order of the court, when certified by the clerks, respectively, making the same to be full and true copies from the original books, shall have the same force and effect as record as the originals. The certificates of the clerks of said courts, respectively, of transcripts of any of said transcribed records shall also be evidence with the like effect as if made by the proper clerk from the originals from which such records were transcribed.

Mr. WATKINS. Mr. Chairman, there are two clerical errors in that section which I wish to correct. I send up an amendment. At the end of line 10, under section 151—if I can get the attention of the Clerk before my amendment is offered, Mr. Chairman—the final "e" is left out. I move that the "e" be inserted.

Mr. STAFFORD. In the copy of the bill that I have the "e" is there.

Mr. MANN. It is the same way in the copy I have.

Mr. WATKINS. Then that does not make any difference. Let the Clerk read the amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 85, line 15, after the word "as," where it first occurs, strike out the word "record" and insert the word "records."

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 157. Whenever any of the records or files in which the United States are interested, of any court of the United States, have been or may be lost or destroyed, it shall be the duty of the attorney of the United States for the district or court to which such files and records belong, so far as the judges of such courts, respectively, shall deem it essential to the interests of the United States that such records and files be restored or supplied, to take such steps, under the direction of said judges, as may be necessary to effect such restoration or substitution, including such dockets, indices, and other books and papers as said judges shall think proper. Said judges may direct the performance, by the clerks of said courts, respectively, and by the United States attorneys, of any duties incident thereto; and said clerks and attorneys shall be allowed such compensation for services in the matter and for lawful disbursements as may be approved by the Attorney General of the United States, upon a certificate by the judges of said courts stating that such claim for services and disbursements is just and reasonable; and the sum so allowed shall be paid out of the judiciary fund.

Mr. WATKINS. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment to correct a clerical error.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 88, line 18, after the word "States," strike out the word "are" and insert in lieu thereof the word "is."

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. I would like to inquire whether this provision would not authorize the clerk to receive the fees for this service. You will notice that the very last clause of the paragraph is that "the sum so allowed shall be paid out of the judiciary fund." In this bill we are making provision for a definite salary for clerks. The thought came to me that perhaps this authorization might warrant the clerk in receiving these fees in addition to his salary.

Mr. WATKINS. I think not. I think we have sufficiently safeguarded that in the language of the amendment which was prepared, in which it is stated that each clerk should receive a salary in lieu of all other compensation, except the $3,000 in naturalization cases, to compensate his assistants in naturalization cases.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, I withdraw the pro forma amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The pro forma amendment is withdrawn. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 158. The acts of the legislature of any State or Territory or of any country subject to the jurisdiction of the United States shall be authenticated by having the seals of such State, Territory, or country affixed thereto. The records and judicial proceedings of the courts of any State or Territory or of any such country shall be proved or admitted in any other court within the United States by the attestation of the clerk, and the seal of the court annexed, if there be a seal, together with a certificate of the judge, chief justice, or presiding magistrate, that the said attestation is in due form; and the said records and judicial proceedings, so authenticated, shall have such faith and credit given to them in every court within the United States as they have by law or usage in the courts of the State from which they are taken.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. STAFFORD] moves to strike out the last word.

Mr. STAFFORD. This provision is the enactment which has been on the statute books for more than a hundred years. I direct the attention of the chairman and the members of the committee to the phraseology in the second line of the section, "or of any countries subject to the jurisdiction of the United States." I wish to suggest to the chairman and the committee whether it would not be preferable to have the clause inserted, "or any of its possessions." We have no countries subject to the jurisdiction of the United States other than our insular possessions, and I ask whether that would not be more acceptable language under the status of our insular possessions than this, which appears in the same form as it was when this was first enacted?

Mr. WATKINS. I have no preference as to which language is used. The word "jurisdiction" there is more generally used as a law phrase than the other expression.

Mr. STAFFORD. I direct attention to the last clause of the section, and wish to inquire of the chairman whether our insular possessions would be comprised in the general phrase "within the United States"? These authenticated copies, you will notice, are to have full faith and credit given to them in every court within the United States. It is of doubtful construction whether the insular possessions can be consistently construed to be within the United States, and I would suggest, in order to remove all doubt, the addition of the words "or any of its possessions." Certainly it is intended to have these authenticated copies of judicial proceedings acceptable for full faith and credit in our insular possessions as well as in the States and Territories.

Mr. WATKINS. Are you speaking of the word "possessions" to be used in line 24?

Mr. STAFFORD. I will direct the attention of the chairman to the exact phraseology in line 24, page 89.

Mr. WATKINS. There is where you propose to substitute the words "and its possessions"?

Mr. STAFFORD. The words "or any of its possessions."

Mr. WATKINS. I have no objection to that.

Mr. STAFFORD. Does not the gentleman believe that it would clarify the intendment of the statute?

Mr. WATKINS. I think so.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment to insert, after the words "United States," in line 24, page 89, the words "or any of its possessions."

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 89, line 24, after the word "States," insert the words "or any of its possessions."

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 161. The edition of the laws and treaties of the United States published by Little & Brown shall be competent evidence of the several public and private acts of Congress, and of the several treaties therein contained, in all the courts of law and equity and of maritime jurisdiction, and in all the tribunals and public offices of the United States, and of the several States, without any further proof or authentication thereof. The pamphlet copies of the statutes and the bound copies of the acts of each Congress published in pursuance of Title XLV, and all acts amendatory thereof and supplementary thereto, shall be legal evidence of the laws and treaties therein contained in all the courts of the United States and of the several States therein.

Mr. WATKINS. Mr. Chairman, I have a committee amendment to offer.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 92, line 8, after "XLV," strike out the comma and insert "of the Revised Statutes."

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Wisconsin moves to strike out the last word.

Mr. STAFFORD. My purpose, Mr. Chairman, is to inquire of the chairman of the Committee on the Revision of the Laws whether there is any need of the first sentence of this section? It makes evidence the publication of the laws and treaties published by Little & Brown. We all know that the firm of Little & Brown is now out of existence, although it has been succeeded by the firm of Little, Brown & Co., or by a corporation. But the original firm of this name is no longer in existence.

Furthermore, I would like to inquire whether the committee has taken into consideration the question of making in evidence the laws published by private publishers, such as the West Publishing Co.?

Mr. WATKINS. I will state to the gentleman that we incorporated this section as we found it in the statutes. At that time the compilation of Little & Brown was the most exhaustive treatise on the subject. It was thought proper at that time, in order to give it authenticity, to place it in such form as could be used in the courts as authentic, and it could be authentic only through or by virtue of an act of Congress. It was carried in the statutes and given authenticity in that way, and the law is still the same as it was then, although the firm has gone out of existence and has been superseded by other members. But still the work on treaties is extant.

Mr. STAFFORD. But the gentleman knows, as the footnote shows, that this was passed in 1846, when it was not the practice of the Federal Government to publish its own laws or treaties, but to have private publishing houses do that work.

Mr. WATKINS. If we strike out that now it will prevent it from being authentic, whereas if we leave it there it will still be authentic.

Mr. STAFFORD. Of course, the gentleman knows that the compilation of treaties published by Little, Brown & Co. half a century ago is rarely used at the present time? The compilation of treaties that is now used in the courts and the like is the volume prepared by the State Department.

Mr. WATKINS. I will state, from the use which I have had occasion to make of that compilation, that it is occasionally used in the courts yet, and it is serviceable. There may be later compilations which are more thorough, and may be more accurate and up to date.

Mr. STAFFORD. Has the gentleman's committee considered the advisability of extending the authenticity of the statutes to the compilations of other private concerns?

Mr. WATKINS. Yes; we have considered present-day customs, and have thought that at this time it would hardly meet with public approval for us to designate any particular companies that are issuing publications. We have thought that to give the sanction of the House of Representatives or of Congress to any particular publication would be an advertisement that we would not be authorized to make of those publications.

Mr. STAFFORD. Then, as I understand, the position of the gentleman is that the only real purpose in continuing this paragraph is to provide for those rare cases where this old tome of treaties published by Little & Brown might be used in evidence?

Mr. WATKINS. Yes; that is correct.

Mr. STAFFORD. The occasions would be very rare. I do not believe anyone of us will ever live to see that volume used.

Mr. WATKINS. We are not contending that that section shall remain in. We simply say we think it will not do any harm, although it will very seldom do any good.

Mr. STAFFORD. I withdraw the pro forma amendment.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I notice this section provides that the pamphlet copies of the statutes and the bound copies of the acts of each Congress, published in pursuance of title 45 of the Revised Statutes, and so forth, shall be legal evidence. I do not recall just what are the provisions of title 45 of the Revised Statutes, because since that time we have passed a printing act which entirely changes those provisions. We publish now, first, a separate copy of a law; then after that we publish a pamphlet copy of the acts of a session of Congress; then after that we publish the acts of the Congress in a bound volume as a portion of the Statutes at Large. Apparently this would not include all of those copies. I do not recall what the provision is as to pamphlet copies, but I should suppose that perhaps it referred to the session laws. Certainly the separate copy of the law as published ought to be made evidence. And, by the way, I should like to suggest to Members of the House that we frequently see copies of acts published, Public, No. so-and-so, although it may relate to years ago. In each Congress as acts are published in leaflet or separate form, each is given a number, public, so-and-so, or private, so-and-so. Until recently there was nothing to indicate what Congress passed an act, except the date. Some time last summer I suggested to the State Department that that be changed so that if the act was public, No. 1, it be "Public, No. 1, Sixty-third Congress," and that new style was adopted with the beginning of this session of Congress. So that hereafter people who get a copy of the separate form of an act of Congress can refer to it by number in connection with the Congress and it can be identified. Has the gentleman from Louisiana a copy of the statute there which is referred to in this section?

Mr. WATKINS. Yes. Does the gentleman desire me to read it?

Mr. MANN. I do not care whether the gentleman reads it, if he can state it. I think that has been entirely changed by the printing law.

Mr. WATKINS. Yes; it refers to public printing, advertisements and public documents. The whole chapter refers to the public documents that are printed.

Mr. MANN. There has been an entirely new printing act passed since that was passed.

Mr. WATKINS. The section as we have presented it provides for that.

Mr. MANN. Yes; this would cover acts amendatory thereof and supplementary thereto.

Mr. WATKINS. It would cover all of them.

Mr. MANN. But I am under the impression that this language in the bill antedated the Revised Statutes and was in conformity with the printing act then in force, and that since that time we had begun to print an extra form of the acts, which, as a matter of fact, is now received in evidence, and I am sure the gentleman would not want to change that.

Mr. WATKINS. No.

Mr. MANN. In other words, the separate copy of the act. When the bill goes to the President and is signed, and then goes to the Secretary of State, he immediately causes a certified copy of it to be made, which is sent to the Printing Office, and that is printed as a separate copy of the law; and that is the only copy that we have until the session laws are printed. All of these ought to be admissible in evidence, and I think they all are now. I call it to the attention of the gentleman, hoping that he will investigate the matter.

Mr. WATKINS. I will state to the gentleman that it would be too loose a way of doing business to give official authenticity to any leaflet put out in that way unless there was some verification of it. If it is incorporated in a bound volume, and the whole volume is properly certified to, then it is authentic; but if you just allow anybody to take a pamphlet and put the word "approved" at the bottom of it, without having any signature to it, if it is not certified to at all, that would be a very loose way of proceeding.

Mr. MANN. None of these are certified to. They are all just printed. The Revised Statutes are not certified to.

Mr. WATKINS. The Revised Statutes, however, are provided for by law to be in a certain form.

Mr. MANN. Yes.

Mr. WATKINS. And the law itself verifies them.

Mr. MANN. They are made admissible in evidence. Copies of the laws published everywhere, by the States and the United States, are made admissible in evidence.

Mr. WATKINS. That is correct.

Mr. MANN. And these copies of the acts that we print here are, I think, now admissible in evidence. We pass a law to-day, it is approved by the President, and is printed in separate form by the State Department. Certainly we ought not, then, to be compelled to go to the Secretary of State and have a certified copy made before we can introduce that in evidence.

Mr. WATKINS. I think so.

Mr. MANN. I think not.

Mr. WATKINS. I think so, unless it is authenticated in some way.

Mr. MANN. I think that copy is now admissible in evidence, and ought to be.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Illinois has expired.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 169. The trial of issues of fact in the district courts shall be by jury, except in causes of equity and admiralty and maritime jurisdiction, and except as otherwise provided in proceedings in bankruptcy and by the next section. In causes of admiralty and maritime jurisdiction the court may, in its discretion, summon a jury for the purpose of assisting it in the assessment of damages.

Mr. CULLOP. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment, to follow this section as two new sections.

Mr. BRYAN. Mr. Chairman, I desire to offer an amendment to the pending section, which I think precedes any new sections.

Mr. CULLOP. My amendment is to follow section 169, two new sections, to be numbered 169a and 169b.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Washington offers an amendment to perfect the text, which will be in order first.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment by Mr. BRYAN:
Page 95, lines 21 and 22, strike out the words "and admiralty and maritime jurisdiction."
Also strike out the word "in" where it last occurs in line 23, and strike out all of lines 24, 25, and 26.

Mr. BRYAN. This amendment simply proposes to strike out the words "and admiralty and maritime jurisdiction" from the exceptions to jury trials. In other words, its purpose is to provide for jury trials in an admiralty tort the same as any other kind of tort or injury or damage.

Under the present law if a man is injured on a railroad train or in a coal mine, or in any way on the land, he has a right to a trial by 12 jurors and the jury assesses the damages. This is a right we all prize very highly. It is protected by the Constitution and ought to be protected. Now, why it is that when a man on a steamboat gets scalded half to death or gets one of his limbs disabled or sustains any bodily injury that man can not have the benefit of a jury trial is something I can not understand.

The Titanic went down a little over a year ago and several cases were brought in England and were tried by juries and damages assessed and allowed, and the plaintiffs have got their money and spent it I suppose. But here in this country there were several cases filed against the company—one in Chicago, one in Minnesota, and one in New York—and they have no right to a jury trial whatever. It is not right, there is no reason for it, and no justification in any sense that appeals to me. To cut a man off from a jury trial because he was pushe off from a boat instead of being injured on a railroad train is without reason.

Mr. GARNER. What has been the law heretofore in admiralty cases?

Mr. BRYAN. This section as submitted by the committee does not change the law in principle nor in matter of detail. The old idea was that the master of the ship was the lord of everything and he had supreme power, and the present law grew out of it; but under the existing condition of things where the man's case is to be tried in the same court, by the same judge, under identically the same rules of evidence, I do not believe that he ought to be subjected to that distinction, but that we should give the seaman and the sailor—the man who works on the sea, who works aboard boats and steamers—the same advantages in our courts as you do to the railroad-train brakeman or the worker in the coal mine. There is no reason in the world that could be suggested against this amendment, and I think the committee ought to agree to it. The report shows that in England the right of jury trial is granted absolutely under the Lord Campbell act, which pertains to land and sea the same. We certainly ought to have that provision here, and we ought not to require a man to go before a Federal judge without reason except some old tradition that has no meaning or sense to it. We are behind English practice in this. We are guilty of favoritism. We tend to degrade the service on the sea, and we limit the legal remedy of passengers as well as of seamen.

Mr. WATKINS. Mr. Chairman, I was about to state what the Department of Justice said about this matter, but it seems to me that it is totally unnecessary, and I will not take up the time in argument.

Mr. STAFFORD. I think we ought to have the reasons presented.

Mr. WATKINS. Very well; I will ask the Clerk to read the letter from the Department of Justice.

The Clerk read as follows:

OFFICE OF THE SOLICITOR GENERAL,
Washington, D. C., May 13, 1914.

MEMORANDUM FOR THE ATTORNEY GENERAL.

(In re H. R. 15578, sec. 169.)

I see no objection to this section as it appears in the proposed bill, nor do any necessary additions occur to me.

The present law, Revised Statutes, 566, provides for a trial by jury in cases of admiralty and maritime jurisdiction relating to any matter of contract or tort with reference to certain vessels on the Great Lakes. As pointed out in the report of the committee, page 13, this provision is a remnant of the act of February 26, 1845—an act to establish admiralty jurisdiction of the United States over vessels on the Great Lakes. Later it was decided by the Supreme Court that such jurisdiction existed independently of legislation. (Genesee Chief v. Fitzhugh, 12 How., 443; In re The Eagle, 8 Wall., 25.) The act mentioned was therefore omitted from the Revised Statutes, except that portion relating to trials by jury in these cases. I agree with the committee that this provision is anomalous and serves no useful purpose.

Mr. WATKINS does not indicate what new provisions will be suggested on Wednesday, the 13th, and it is therefore manifestly impossible to discuss them.

I recommend that he be advised that the department has no criticism to offer of the section as proposed.

Respectfully,

JNO. W. DAVIS,
Solicitor General.

Mr. BRYAN. Mr. Chairman, I do not see that there is any reason offered in the letter from the Department of Justice why my amendment should not be agreed to.

Mr. WATKINS. There is no reason except the Solicitor General thinks that the provision is sufficient to cover all the contingencies necessary.

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. FOSTER). The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Washington [Mr. BRYAN].

The question was taken, and the amendment was rejected.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will now report the amendment offered by the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. CULLOP].

Page 95, at the end of section 169, add the following additional sections:

"169a. In all cases where the questions of fact are submitted to a jury for trial the court shall instruct the jury only on the law applicable to the issues joined under the pleadings in the case.

"169b. In all cases where issues of fact are submitted to a jury for trial the court can not take said case from the jury except by agreement of parties only on motion of the defendant at the close of the plaintiff's testimony in chief, and for the reason that the plaintiff has not produced any testimony in support of some material allegation essential to a recovery, and in no case where a reasonable dispute may arise as to what the facts testified to establish."

Mr. WATKINS. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the discussion on this section and amendments thereto close in 30 minutes.

Mr. BARTLETT. I have no objection, except that I want to offer an amendment and have it pending.

Mr. STAFFORD. I suggest to the gentleman to let the debate run along a little.

Mr. CULLOP. Mr. Chairman, I reserve the right to object, and I suggest to the chairman that we let the debate run some little time. This is a very important matter in the formation of this code, and I think the matter can be adjusted in less time than it would if we fix the time.

Mr. WATKINS. I will withdraw my request, Mr. Chairman.

Mr. CULLOP. Mr. Chairman, section 169a, offered as an amendment to this provision of the code, is that in all cases of fact in any case submitted to a jury for trial, the court shall only instruct the jury as to the law under the pleadings upon the issue joined and not upon the facts.

Every citizen in this country is entitled to a jury trial in cases both of criminal and civil nature except in equity cases.

Mr. BRYAN. And if he is a seaman or works on a boat.

Mr. CULLOP. And with that exception. Now, it is the experience of almost every lawyer in the Federal courts—the practice now prevails that the court instructs the jury as to what the facts prove, and sometimes singles out witnesses and comments to the jury on their testimony and the consideration it should receive. That is a denial of every man's constitutional right of trial by jury when he is entitled to submit his case to a jury for trial. In the Supreme Court of the United States, the highest court of the land, in a decision rendered, the court said that experience had taught the people that a jury was the safest and best tribunal there was to determine a question of fact; that 12 men called from all the different walks of life were better prepared, were better qualified from experience and knowledge in their association with men to determine questions of fact and give the result of their consideration than a single man, it mattered not what his experience in life had been. There is good reason for that doctrine. How frequently do we find in the reports of cases in the Federal court where the judge arbitrarily has said to the jury that this or that man's testimony is not worthy of belief. It is at that system that this provision is striking. In nearly all of the State courts if a judge instructing the jury attempts to tell the jury what the evidence of any witness establishes it constitutes reversible error, because it is taking from the jury the prerogative of the jury to determine the question of fact involved in the issues. One word of reflection against the testimony of a witness by a judge to a jury trying a case has great weight with the jury, because of the position of the judge. The judge ought to be required to tell the jury only what was competent testimony under the rules of the law. That he does in the progress of the trial when the evidence is being delivered, and not when he comes to instruct the jury before they retire to consider of their verdict in the case. This practice has been abused. It has been abused in nearly every judicial circuit in the Federal courts in the United States. This amendment is offered for the purpose of correcting that abuse; for the purpose of preventing a recurrence of that abuse. Judges sometimes do not give the same attention to the testimony that the jurors do. Their attention may be attracted to something else. They may not be in a position to weigh the testimony as carefully as the jurors whose duty it is to pass upon the questions of fact and to determine what facts are established and what facts are not established in the trial of a case; and yet in the Federal courts, the only courts in the country, the judge may sit upon the bench and say that this man's testimony or that man's testimony is not worthy of belief. He has a right to do it under the present practice, and does it.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Indiana has expired.

Mr. CULLOP. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for five minutes more.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. CULLOP. This amendment is directed at that abuse, at this denial of the constitutional right of the litigant to have the facts determined by a jury. It is the law now in nearly every State in the Union that the judge can not instruct the jury upon the facts, as to what the facts prove or do not prove, or as to what this or that witness's evidence establishes or what weight should be given it.

Mr. BARTLETT. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. CULLOP. Certainly.

Mr. BARTLETT. Does not the gentleman think his amendment better be phrased so as to forbid the judge to express an opinion upon the facts, rather than that he should not instruct the jury on the facts? My suggestion is made because I agree with the gentleman in what he has said as to the evils that exist under such practices; but the statute of my State, and I think of every other State, provides that the judge, in charging the jury, shall not express an opinion as to what has or has not been proven. The gentleman's amendment narrows that down to where the judge shall not instruct the jury upon the facts. It becomes necessary for the judge very often, without expressing an opinion as to what the facts establish, to instruct the jury as to the facts, to call their attention to the evidence in the case, and that might be construed to be an instruction on the facts, whereas I apprehend the evil the gentleman seeks to correct is not the instruction as to the facts but the instructions which carry with them an opinion as to what the facts do or do not establish.

Mr. CULLOP. Mr. Chairman, I realize the position of the gentleman from Georgia, and I knew that he was too good a lawyer not to agree with me on this question that the abuse now existing ought to be corrected by a statute; and I was sure that I would have the assistance of the gentleman from Georgia, whom I regard as one of the ablest lawyers in this House, and his support in correcting this evil and injustice. His experience doubtless has enabled him to witness frequently the abuses perpetrated on the litigants and the constitutional rights of the citizens in the Federal courts in his own State.

Mr. BARTLETT. Mr. Chairman, I will state to the gentleman that it is a positive requirement by our statute that a new trial shall be granted by the Supreme Court in any case where the judge expresses an opinion on the facts.

Mr. CULLOP. It is in all the States, practically. In my State the law prohibits the judge from expressing an opinion to the jury upon the facts. The expression of an opinion by the court is cause for a new trial. If we simply limited it to the expression of an opinion of the court alone, that might prevent the court from giving his reasons for ruling upon the admission of evidence during the course of the trial. I want to see this abuse corrected, and I have no doubt the great membership of the lawyers of this House recognize the abuse and recognize that the evil ought to be wiped out.

The second section that I have offered, in substance, is this: It prohibits the court from taking the case from the jury where there is room for reasonable men to dispute about what the testimony proves. It is frequently true in the trial of a case that upon motion of the defendant at the close of the testimony in the case, or at the close of the testimony of the plaintiff in chief, the rules differing in different States, that the court takes the case from the jury, not because there is no evidence tending to support every material averment in the complaint, declaration, or petition necessary to recover, but sometimes because the court says he does not believe the witnesses. Whenever a court takes the case from the jury for such reason he is invading the constitutional right of the party, and that is the right to have a trial by jury.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Indiana has again expired.

Mr. CULLOP. Mr. Chairman, as a portion of my time was taken up in the colloquy with the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. BARTLETT], I would like to proceed for five minutes more.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. CULLOP. Mr. Chairman, almost every lawyer has had that experience in the courts at some time. The very reason that the court in many instances has expressed for taking the case from the jury was the question of fact to be settled by the jury and not by the court. The rule a on this question in all of the States is that the court can not upon motion of the defendant take a case from the jury at the close of the plaintiff's testimony or at the close of the whole testimony, if there is any evidence tending to support the material allegations of the plaintiff's case necessary for a recovery, or if the facts produced are such as reasonable men might dispute about what they tend to establish. That is the rule as near as I can state it, and, as I believe, the correct rule. This is the rule violated about which we complain.

Mr. STEENERSON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CULLOP. Yes.

Mr. STEENERSON. Is it not the rule now that the Federal courts in the trial of civil actions follow the practice of the State where the trial is held as to the method of charging the jury, and so forth?

Mr. CULLOP. Emphatically no; it is not the rule. Not very long ago my colleague from Indiana [Mr. Cox] raised that identical question in a Federal court, and the rule and practice is just as I have stated it, not as it was in the State courts. In that observation the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. Cox] will clearly bear me out. I have known the question to arise in Federal courts in different jurisdictions.

The rules of pleading are the same in the Federal courts as in the courts of the State where situated, but when you come to instructing a jury, then they seem to differ, and the Federal rule is as I have stated it in all Federal jurisdictions with which I am acquainted. But if it is as in the States, then this amendment is appropriate, and will serve a good purpose. It will not trouble the situation in the State of the gentleman from Wisconsin or in any other man's State. Now, this provision, or rather the want of it, has been the means of working a positive denial of justice in many instances, where the court and jury would have disagreed doubtless as to what the facts established in the case. Courts and juries frequently disagree. The judge may sometimes say that the testimony of some witness is not reasonable to him, and he does not believe it, but 12 jurors that are acquainted with the everyday affairs of life, from their knowledge and association with men in the communities where they reside, would say it was reasonable, and are better qualified, therefore, to pass upon it, as the Supreme Court of the United States has distinctly said in passing upon this question. Now, I submit that these two amendments, if adopted, rectify an evil now existing in the practice in Federal courts, that will be of great value to the people, the litigants who may be compelled to go into court for the trial and disposition of their causes, and I submit that their adoption will bring about a better and a fairer administration of justice than exists now in the trial of causes in the Federal courts. But some one may say, "Oh, the plaintiff can appeal if he is dissatisfied." Maybe he can, and maybe he can not. We have all seen cases put out of court, the right of trial denied for the want of just such statutes as these, where the plaintiff could not appeal because he could not get the means to prosecute the appeal from the lower to the higher court on this proposition. The want of such a provision works a hardship on poor litigants.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has again expired.

Mr. BARTLETT. Mr. Chairman, this is a very important proposition and one that ought to be given very careful consideration, because it concerns a matter which will revolutionize the present practice in the United States courts that has prevailed since their organization and at the same time involves all those who may be called into a United States court, either as a party plaintiff or a party defendant, or to answer charges by way of indictment or accusation. My State early in its history passed a statute, now nearly 100 years old, which forbids a judge in the trial of any case in charging a jury or instructing a jury to express an opinion as to what the fact did or did not establish, recognizing that well-accepted fact, recognized and accepted as a fact by all those who have lived under the Anglo-Saxon system of jury trial, that no other means has ever been devised by man so admirably suited for the trial and settlement of disputed facts as 12 men in a jury box. The Supreme Court of the United States itself in numerous cases has given utterance to the statement that no other tribunal or means has been devised so well adapted to the settlement of questions of disputed facts, and yet we all know that in the trial of cases in the Federal court where jury trials are had, both in civil and criminal cases, the opinion of the judge as to the facts not only often but with rare exception does settle the matter and control the jury. And I might recall instances of a trial in a district in the United States where the jurors sometimes thought it proper to exercise their power of differing with the judge where they have received the censure of the judge. I do not rise, however, to criticize the judiciary of my country, because the bad judges, in my opinion, under our system are not in the majority, but in the minority; but whether bad or good, the question of the disputed facts ought to be settled by the tribunal that the law provides for the settlement, and it ought not to be so minimized and so intrenched upon as absolutely to destroy that right. Now, it is true that the Supreme Court of the United States in numbers of cases have said that it is the duty of a jury and their sole province to determine questions of fact, even though they may differ with the judge, and although a learned and experienced judge, one of great ability, who knows how to express an opinion of the facts, may put them to the jury—you know how prone juries are to shift responsibility from their shoulders and to follow the suggestion of a judge and his opinion as to the facts.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. BARTLETT. Mr. Chairman, I ask for five minutes more.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Georgia asks unanimous consent to proceed for five minutes, Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. BARTLETT. Jurors are prone to follow that course except in case where men of firm minds and stubborn wills sometimes act upon the theory that they will assert their own opinions. We know how futile it is in many, many cases not to expect the jury to follow the judge upon his opinion of the facts. I could recall quite a number of cases in my experience, Mr. Chairman, cases that involved life and liberty and property of vast amount, where the question of disputed facts was absolutely determined by the opinion that the judge entertained in reference to them. Without referring to the place where it occurred, I might call attention to the fact that I recall a time in a United States court where a judge absolutely threatened to punish an attorney who asserted the right of the jury to find the facts as they might determine, though they differed with the judge. I might recall a case where the attorney in the case, where a life was at stake, was compelled to fortify his position as to the right to argue to the jury its duty to differ with the judge as to the facts involved before he was permitted to take that position.

I do not, as I say, propose to criticize the judiciary of my country, but I do, if I can offer this amendment, propose to do that which the advanced thought of the lawmaking power and the lawyers and the people of the various States have done—say that the jury and not the judge shall decide questions of fact. And it is but giving to the people and the courts a stone when they ask for bread, and a serpent when they ask for fish, when you say that the juries are to be judges of the fact and then permit the judge with all his power and environment, of learning and ability, to take one side of the case and represent the plaintiff and defendant in his charge, for that is what it means; so that, sometimes as you walk into a court where a case is being tried you would naturally ask, as a stranger did when he walked into a court when they were trying a case, and after hearing the judge instruct the jury, inquired who represented the plaintiff besides the judge. So I think the spirit of it, the intention of the proposed amendment, is right. But I suggest to him that it would answer the purpose, and it is not from any desire to correct him in any particular beyond the desire to accomplish something. Now, the gentleman says that in instructing the jury as to the facts the judge shall not express an opinion. I will get the amendment and quote it exactly. I suggested to him that this would answer all he desires and would not go to the extent that he does:

In all cases where any trial is had by a jury the judge in instructing the jury shall not express an opinion as to what has or has not been proven by the evidence.

It seems to me that that is not only in the language of my own statute but is in the language of the various statutes of the other States with which I am familiar.

Mr. STEENERSON. I think the statutes of the State of Minnesota say that he shall not express an opinion on the question of fact.

Mr. BARTLETT. In instructing the jury?

Mr. STEENERSON. Yes.

Mr. BARTLETT. I will put it that way. I think "opinion as to what has or has not been proven——"

Mr. STEENERSON. They are not synonymous.

Mr. BARTLETT. They are not synonymous; but if he can not express an opinion as to what has or has not been proven, it would answer the same purpose.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that these two propositions be considered separately. They are virtually two amendments, and we ought to have them considered separately.

Mr. CULLOP. I think we ought to have them voted on separately myself.

Mr. SCOTT. Mr. Chairman, I am in sympathy with the idea of the gentleman from Indiana, but I fear his section is unhappily worded. As I understand the law governing trials at common law in Federal courts the court has the authority to say to the jury that any essential and controlling fact is not supported by any evidence, because that is the pronouncement of a proposition of law. Unlike the practice in the State courts, under a decision of the Supreme Court of the United States the Federal trial judge may with impunity express an opinion to the jury upon the weight of the evidence as directed to some essential fact. In other words, he can express his opinion to the jury as to what the evidence in fact proves, that opinion not, however, being binding upon the jury. I believe that that doctrine, which has prevailed from the beginning in the Federal court, is wrong. It is not in accord with the general fundamental principles of our judicial system. I do not think it would be safe to say, however, that the court shall not instruct the jury upon any question of fact, because that would invade the right of the court to pronounce upon matters of fact concerning which there was no evidence, and thereby invade the constitutional right of the court to proceed in accordance with the common law. I think that as far as Congress can go in this matter is to prohibit the court from expressing opinions to the jury either upon the weight of the evidence or upon the facts which the evidence in his opinion proves. It seems to me that the amendment as suggested by the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. BARTLETT] would meet the situation fully; at least, if it is made so as to prohibit the court from expressing such an opinion while giving the charge to the jury.

Mr. COX. Mr. Chairman, I do not want to consume the time of the committee but a very few minutes. I think this is the most important amendment that has been offered to this bill, and I hope the chairman in charge of the bill will see his way clear, when the amendment is framed up to meet the evil that now certainly exists, to accept it.

Mr. WATKINS. I wish to state to the gentleman that this amendment, not having been submitted to the Committee on the Revision of the Laws during its consideration of this bill, I would not feel authorized personally to comply with his request. Therefore I will not have anything to say one way or another.

Mr. STAFFORD. Will the gentleman yield right there?

Mr. WATKINS. I will.

Mr. STAFFORD. I would like to have the attention of the committee. Everyone recognizes the very great importance of this provision, as it changes the entire procedure of the trial of cases in the Federal court, and I would ask the chairman whether he does not think it of sufficient importance to have these provisions passed over and have them considered in the interim between now and the next meeting day?

Mr. WATKINS. It seems almost impossible during the consideration in the committee to keep a quorum here.

Mr. STAFFORD. I am not insisting on a quorum, but it seems hardly fair to the membership of the House to have this matter considered at the present time.

Mr. WATKINS. The Members ought to be here.

Mr. STAFFORD. The Members ought to be here, and if this matter could go over until the next session the chairman of the committee would have ample time to give thought to it, and other Members would have ample time. The second amendment that has been proposed is in such an awkward phraseology that we would have to vote it down even if we agreed with the principle of it.

Mr. WATKINS. There will be a substitute offered which I think may remedy that trouble.

Mr. BRYAN. If we are going to stay here and work until we come to something important and then pass it over, we had better quit altogether. I think we had better go on with the work.

Mr. STAFFORD. The gentleman does not believe in deliberation.

Mr. BRYAN. I do not believe in stopping the work.

Mr. COX. Mr. Chairman, I believe I have the floor. I am glad to have the chairman of the committee express an opinion so far as he does. Like the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. BARTLETT], I am not going to offer any criticism upon any court of the Nation, Federal or State. But it is an indisputable fact, Mr. Chairman, that criticisms most severe have been directed against the judiciary of the Nation for the last 15 or 20 years. Now I shall not stop in this short time to go into the reason for this criticism or what has brought it about. But there is an idea, at least as to some of the Federal courts, that they are all-wise and all-powerful, and arrogate to themselves modes of procedure. And I am not going to criticize them for that, because in all likelihood the real criticism should be directed against the Congress of the United States because of the failure heretofore to outline a clear, clean-cut mode of procedure to govern the judiciary in these things.

But to sit by, Mr. Chairman, in a Federal court or a State court and have a judge absolutely withdraw a case from the jury and refuse to submit the questions of fact to the jury, in my judgment, is a subversion of the right of trial by jury. [Applause.]

I have seen instances in Federal courts, and no doubt other lawyers have time and again seen them, in connection with questions of negligence, where that question is a disputed question both by the plaintiff and the defendant, pro and con, such as ordinarily the question of the right or the law of self-defense is disputed between the State on one side and the defendant on the other, where that court, with an array of facts before it all on one side, without any contradictory evidence having been introduced at all by the defendant, of his own motion, his own will, his own accord, not asked for by the defendant, has withdrawn the case from the jury strictly and solely on a question of negligence, with possibly the doctrine of the assumption of risk to a certain extent entering into it.

Mr. STEENERSON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield there?

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Indiana yield to the gentleman from Minnesota?

Mr. COX. Yes.

Mr. STEENERSON. Is not that exactly the kind of a case that ought to be determined by the court or the judge?

Mr. COX. No, sir. Never in this world will I surrender my rights as an American citizen, or the rights of an American constituency on this earth to take from the jury the finding of a question of fact.

Mr. STEENERSON. Does not the gentleman admit that when facts are undisputed they raise a question of law, and when they are disputed they raise a question of fact?

Mr. COX. There is where your false premises are when you undertake to fortify the judgment of the court by assuming that the court is right, when he says that the plaintiff, although he has introduced a tremendous amount of evidence, has not yet made out his case.

Mr. STEENERSON. Yet the gentleman's own statement of the case was where there was no dispute as to facts at all.

Mr. COX. Oh, no. The gentleman did not make that statement at all. The gentleman misunderstood me entirely.

Mr. STEENERSON. Read the RECORD and see.

Mr. COX. To recapitulate, Mr. Chairman: It is an absolute mockery—that is all it is—to let a judge, after hearing all the evidence introduced by the plaintiff, say, "I will concede everything you have testified to here, Mr. Plaintiff, and everything your witnesses have said, and still in law you have not got a case." Why, the very purpose of a jury trial, taking men from all walks of life—some of them farmers, some of them mechanics, some of them bankers, men following this occupation and that occupation, likely drawing different conclusions—is to secure their judgment; and who, after all, is going to say that a Federal judge is a better judge of what a given state of facts proves or tends to prove than the average man?

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Indiana has expired.

Mr. COX. So I hope, Mr. Chairman, that the amendment may be whipped into shape in some way or manner so that it can become a part of this law.

Mr. VAUGHAN. Mr. Chairman, I offer a substitute.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Texas [Mr. VAUGHAN] offers a substitute.

Mr. WINGO. Mr. Chairman, I understand this is a very important question. It looks as though we ought to have more Members present. We have now but nine Democrats and four Republicans, and the official score keeper, the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. FESS], is absent [laughter], as I see. I shall not make the point of quorum now, but if gentlemen can not stay here to transact business of this importance I shall have to insist upon a quorum.

Mr. STAFFORD. If the gentleman is going to insist upon the point of no quorum I suggest that he do so before this matter is considered, so that a sufficient number of Members may be here to act on it intelligently.

Mr. VAUGHAN. Mr. Chairman, I offer a substitute for the amendment of the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. CULLOP].

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report it.

The Clerk read as follows:

Substitute for the Cullop amendment to section 169:
"SEC. 169a. In jury trials the judge shall not express to the jury any opinion on the facts or make any comment on the weight of the evidence.
"SEC. 169b."——

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, I understand we are considering these amendments separately.

Mr. VAUGHAN. Yes; I am offering that as a substitute. We are offering them together, but they are to be voted on separately.

The CHAIRMAN. They will be reported upon separately, but will be discussed together.

Mr. VAUGHAN. Yes; discussed together.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, a few moments ago I asked unanimous consent that two amendments, virtually different propositions, should be considered separately, and it was agreed to.

Mr. VAUGHAN. Mine embraces both of these matters, and I am desirous of having the amendment read.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 169b. No judge shall take from the jury in any case the determination of the issues of fact arising under the evidence.

Mr. VAUGHAN. Mr. Chairman, these two substitutes, if adopted, will accomplish the purpose intended by the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. CULLOP]. Perhaps his language would do so, but I think the language I have used is shorter, simpler, and more easily understood, and makes it clear that the judge shall not comment upon the weight of the evidence. Judges of the Federal courts may now do so.

Of course, it will be necessary to except to such conduct if it is indulged by the court after these substitutes become law. But every issue of fact raised by the evidence will be for the determination of the jury alone.

I think the adoption of section 169a would accomplish what is designed, but we ought to be certain about it. The proposed section 169b would preclude the court from instructing the jury to return a verdict for or against any party in any case where there are any issues of fact raised by the evidence. I do not suppose anyone would insist that a case should be submitted to the jury when there are no issues raised by the evidence, the determination of which by the jury would determine in whose favor a verdict should be rendered.

Mr. SCOTT. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. VAUGHAN. For a question.

Mr. SCOTT. Does the gentleman understand that his substitute, if enacted, could deprive the court of the power to take a case from the jury where some essential fact was without the support of evidence?

Mr. VAUGHAN. No; it would not.

Mr. SCOTT. I think the gentleman's amendment goes that far.

Mr. VAUGHAN. I think not.

Mr. SCOTT. Will the Clerk report the amendment again? It is very brief.

The CHAIRMAN. If there be no objection, the Clerk will again report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 169b. No judge shall take from the jury in any case the determination of the issues of fact arising under the evidence.

Mr. VAUGHAN. The determination of the issues of fact arising under the evidence is for the jury. Of course, if there is no issue of fact arising under the evidence——

Mr. SCOTT. The issue would have to arise under the pleadings.

Mr. VAUGHAN. It would have to arise under the evidence also, or there would be nothing to submit to the jury. I know that the pleadings make the issues upon which evidence is admitted pro and con; but the issues submitted to juries for their decision are issues of fact raised by the evidence introduced at the trial, and it does not matter how many issues are raised by the pleadings, unless there is an issue of fact raised by the evidence there is nothing to submit to the jury.

Mr. SCOTT. The question is whether the court could determine whether any one issue or fact pleaded is without the support of evidence.

Mr. VAUGHAN. Under the substitute I offer, if there is a single fact which a party must prove in order to entitle him to a verdict, and he fails to introduce any evidence to prove it, the court may direct a verdict for the opposing party; and it is a question of law, whether or not there is any evidence to prove that fact; and if there is no evidence to prove it, the court may say so and direct a verdict; but if there is any evidence to prove it, then it is a question for the jury to determine whether or not the fact is proved.

Mr. SCOTT. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. VAUGHAN. I yield for a question.

Mr. SCOTT. On the gentleman's construction of the second section of the substitute, is not that identically the present law?

Mr. VAUGHAN. No; I think not.

Mr. SCOTT. Do you understand that the court may take from the jury an issue of fact where there is substantial evidence on both sides, or substantial evidence upon one side, to support it?

Mr. VAUGHAN. I did not use the word "substantial," if the gentleman will notice.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. VAUGHAN. I ask unanimous consent to proceed for five minutes more.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman asks unanimous consent to proceed for five minutes. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. VAUGHAN. The weight to be given to the testimony in any case, be it much or little, is for the jury. It is not for the court to say whether or not he believes it. It is for the jury. That is the peculiar province of the jury, and the jury may believe one man against a hundred. No court should have the right to tell the jury that they must believe or disbelieve any witness or any number of witnesses or what weight they should give to any fact or circumstance in evidence. The judges of the Federal courts have that right now. They exercise that power now.

Mr. BARTLETT. If the jury find a verdict that is contrary to the weight of the evidence, or without evidence to support it, the judge can grant a new trial.

Mr. VAUGHAN. He has the power to set aside the verdict now. I do not think, Mr. Chairman, that any man is good enough or safe enough or wise enough or fair enough to be trusted with the right to determine the issues of fact in cases constantly arising. It is too great a power to put in the hands of any one man, to trust him with the decision of the questions of fact instead of the jury, or to give him the power to give his opinion upon the facts. The Federal judges now have that power. It ought to be taken away from them. They ought not to have the power to comment upon the weight of testimony or to express opinions upon it. It is almost giving them the power to decide the case to permit them to comment upon the weight to be given to the testimony. I think these two substitutes I offer will make it absolutely certain that every issue of fact in a jury trial is for the jury to determine.

Mr. BRYAN. Mr. Chairman, I am in favor of the proposition, but I think the amendment the gentleman has just offered carries the matter in too general terms. But I am in favor of the proposition, and however it may be finally offered I am going to support it.

But I am not going to lose the opportunity to cinch the argument that I made a few minutes ago. We are all here trying to apply the right of jury trial in more liberal terms to the cases that come under our immediate views, those that affect us more directly. But a while ago I suggested that we grant the fundamental proposition of a jury trial to a man on a boat, and that amendment was refused by this committee. In other words, it is the purpose and determination of this body to lay down a different rule for a man on the water, whether as a passenger or as a workman, than for a man who is on the land. I want to drive that thought home. That kind of a distinction is going to be put out of business, and those of us who are so enthusiastic for jury trials are sooner or later going to get driven into our noodles the idea that a jury trial that is so essential for a man on land is just as essential for a man on the water.

Mr. VAUGHAN. Does not the gentleman think that in enacting a Federal statute on this question it is very safe to follow the language of a statute that has received a well-defined construction?

Mr. BRYAN. Why do you not follow the interpretation of a statute instead of introducing the amendment you have introduced here? The whole purpose is to change the statute, to make the terms providing for jury trial for a man on the land stronger. I asked a while ago to open the door a little bit to a man on the water. You refused that; and then you tell me, "Why not follow old statutes? Why change existing law?"

Mr. VAUGHAN. The gentleman does not understand my question. I asked him if he did not think that in conserving the right of trial by jury we should follow those State statutes on the question that undertake to preserve it.

Mr. BRYAN. Follow nothing that is not just. You are so particular to safeguard jury trial for a man with a claim in court concerning a land dispute, but I say you ought to give the right of trial by jury in a civil case to a seaman or to a man on a boat, a man who suffers injury on the ocean or in a river or on a bay. You ought to give him the same right of trial by jury as you give to a man who is hurt on a railroad train or anywhere else.

Mr. BARTLETT. I think so, too.

Mr. BRYAN. Yet my amendment has been voted down by a small company of men here on this floor who are unanimous in their insistence on jury trial as one of the most precious rights of our Constitution. All you need is to look at this matter from the standpoint of common sense. Where do you get the idea that a human being on the water is any less entitled to his constitutional rights than on the land?

Mr. STAFFORD. A parliamentary inquiry, Mr. Chairman.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. STAFFORD. After this amendment is voted upon, will there be opportunity for discussion on the second amendment?

The CHAIRMAN. The original amendment was offered as one amendment, but an arrangement was made by which a division of the question was permitted. It is really only one amendment, but the sections will be voted on separately.

Mr. STAFFORD. The notes of the reporter will show that I asked unanimous consent that it be considered as two amendments, as the subject embodied two separate propositions.

The CHAIRMAN. I presume there could be no objection to that.

Mr. STAFFORD. Then, Mr. Chairman, I ask for recognition. I may be in the minority on this proposition now being considered by the committee, but I am not one of those who view with alarm any encroachment upon the privileges of litigants by the Federal judiciary. I know that it is popular in many branches to attack the Federal courts. There may be instances, and there are always exceptions in any branch of the Government, or in any branch of human endeavor, where criticism may be had, but it is my opinion that the great body of the Federal judiciary is above criticism. I may not have had as large an experience as some Members who have discussed this question, but in my limited experience and practice in my State I have never found the judges encroaching on the rights of the jury. In the State of Wisconsin we never had any limitation on the rights of the judges to instruct the jury upon the questions at issue. For one, I believe that juries should receive some instruction in regard to the facts. Many times they come for their first initiation in the trial of a case, and with this amendment you are going to hamstring them for the purpose of following a bugaboo.

Every litigant has his right of appeal in case there is any abuse; but if you pass this character of amendment you are going to add to the number of errors that would creep into the trial of causes. It is no longer the fashion of the latter-day saints to regard with favor our judiciary, but from the time of the establishment of the Government our fathers and those great statesmen who have succeeded them have believed that the present procedure and practice was not criticizable, but worked for the ends of justice.

Now, are you going to limit the judges so that they can not express any opinion on the facts to the jury? What is the judge in the trial of a case? He is an experienced man. Although trial by jury is a great institution, I am not certain that it works justice in all cases. Under the pending amendment you are taking away the right of the judge to take the case from the jury in case there is no legal evidence to support the case.

Mr. WINGO. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. STAFFORD. Yes.

Mr. WINGO. The gentleman does not mean to say that this amendment would take away from the judge the right to take a case from the jury when there was no evidence to support it?

Mr. STAFFORD. No real evidence to support the issues of the case; there may be testimony, but whether there be evidence or not, the second amendment would take that privilege away from the judge.

Mr. GARNER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. STAFFORD. Yes.

Mr. GARNER. Suppose it did take it away from the jury, could not the judge set aside the verdict?

Mr. STAFFORD. Then what is to be gained? There is nothing to be gained; it is a subterfuge. The judge should have the right in the first instance, if there is no real evidence to support the issue involved, to take the case away from the jury.

Mr. WINGO. If I understand the gentleman, he thinks the judge should be given the sole right to determine the weight and credibility of the testimony.

Mr. STAFFORD. He should be given the right to determine whether there is any evidence to support any of the issues. If there is any evidence to support the issue, then the case should go to the jury, but the judge should determine in the first instance whether there is any evidence to support the issue in question.

Mr. WINGO. Let me give the gentleman a concrete illustration. Suppose a witness on the stand, without any effort to impeach him, swears positively to a state of facts, which, if they be true, would unquestionably make out the innocence of the defendant or the plaintiff's case or the defendant's case. Does the gentleman think the judge should have the right to say "I do not believe that witness's testimony" and take the case from the jury?

Mr. STAFFORD. No; and that has not been established in any court of the Federal judiciary.

Mr. WINGO. Does the gentleman think that no Federal judge has gone that far?

Mr. STAFFORD. No; not to pass on the credibility of the witness, but simply to say whether there has been any evidence or not to support the issue.

Mr. WINGO. And that he never told a jury that their witness was not entitled to any credence?

Mr. STAFFORD. I answered the gentleman's question.

Mr. WINGO. Is not the correct rule, the better rule, this, as it is in most of the States: That the jury is the sole judge of the evidence, while the court gives them the law, and is not that the experience in those States that have prohibited the judge from singling out a particular fact and commenting on it to the jury?

Mr. STAFFORD. In my State there is no such limitation. I do not think these amendments should be passed haphazardly. They involve a change in procedure that has been established since the organization of our Government, and I do not think we ought on the spur of the moment to pass this character of an amendment.

Mr. CULLOP. Mr. Chairman, I think the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. STAFFORD] is clearly in error when he says that the court has more experience and is better able to pass upon a question of fact than 12 jurors. The Supreme Court of the United States, I will say to the gentleman, have said just the reverse. They have passed upon that question, and as the gentleman from Wisconsin does not want to come in conflict with the court, as it might feel distressed in the failure to have his approbation, I am, however, sure the decision the Supreme Court has rendered on this question will have his hearty support, and to be in accord with it he will give his support to these amendments. Now, let me read what the Supreme Court said on this subject:

It is in relation to these intermediate cases that the opposite rule prevails. Upon the facts proven in such cases it is a matter of judgment and discretion, of sound inference, what is the deduction to be drawn from the undisputed facts. Certain facts we may suppose to be clearly established from which one sensible, impartial man would infer that proper care had not been used, and that negligence exfsted; another man equally sensible and equally impartial would infer that proper care had been used and that there was no negligence. It is this class of cases and those akin to it that the law commits to the decision of a jury. Twelve men of the average of the community, comprising men of education and men of little education, men of learning, and men whose learning consists only in what they have themselves seen and heard—the merchant, the mechanic, the farmer, the laborer—these sit together, consult, apply their separate experience of the affairs of life to the facts proven, and draw a unanimous conclusion. This average judgment thus given it is the great effort of the law to obtain. It is assumed that 12 men know more of the common affairs of life than does one man; that they can draw wiser and safer conclusions from admitted facts thus occurring than can a single judge.

That is what the highest court of the land has said on this subject, and yet if the argument of the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. STAFFORD] were to prevail in his idea that right would not obtain to any litigant in the court, because he says a single judge is better qualified to decide a question of fact than 12 jurors.

Mr. Chairman, I know it is the favorite argument of gentlemen who want to protect these antiquated rules and arbitrary methods which work hardships and wrongs upon the litigants in court to assail every man who will ask for a remedy of these wrongs, for a rectification of these abuses, by standing up in the halls of Congress and charging that he is criticizing the Federal judges. If the gentleman only would be willing to admit it, he knows that many of them need criticism; that sometimes the Supreme Court administers to them in the rendition of its opinions in reversing their judgment severe criticisms, and it is only of recent occurrence that within a stone's throw of this Chamber the highest court in the world—the Supreme Court of the United States—rendered an opinion blistering a Federal judge for an erroneous opinion that he had made in the District of Columbia and for which in part there are impeachment proceedings now being heard. And yet the gentleman says that if we undertake to legislate to correct these evils we are criticizing the Federal judiciary. The highest court in the land is constantly criticizing the Federal judiciary. There is nothing wrong, if they have done wrong, in trying to pass laws that will compel them to do right, to conduct the trials berore them in the proper way and let the citizen who goes into the courts have his constitutional right of submitting questions of fact to a jury of his peers. Constantly the practice as it now prevails is denying these constitutional rights to the citizens of this country.

Under the Constitution there is a provision that the jury shall be the sole judge of the facts in civil cases and the sole judge of the law and the facts in criminal cases, and yet under the practice as it has grown up and has been perpetuated for years this constitutional right is denied the citizen, and his case is taken from the jury and the jury given no right or opportunity to pass upon it and say who testified to the truth and who did not. The highest court of the land has said that the best place to settle a question of fact and to settle it right is in the jury box—that 12 men, called from all walks of life, are better qualified to solve the question of fact than a single judge in the trial of a cause—and yet, because we want to correct this abuse, because we want to right this wrong, because we want to prevent this imposition upon litigants, they say we are attacking the Federal courts. We are not attacking the Federal courts. We are trying to protect them from criticism. We have a right to make the law which the Federal judge must obey as well as the citizen of this country, the law that he is called upon to administer, and we have the right to define the manner in which he shall administer it. It is the duty of Congress to pass such laws upon any subject its wisdom may direct, and that is all we are attempting to do here. We want to correct this abuse and remove this evil.

If this works a wrong on the defendant, we will be as liberal with the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. STAFFORD] as he is with us, and say to him the injured party can appeal to the higher court and have the wrong corrected. We never allow anyone to be more generous than we. The gentleman says that the plaintiff may appeal, and I say to him that we will be equally as liberal and let the defendant appeal, and let the plaintiff answer in the higher court to his appeal. Mr. Chairman, I hope the amendments will be adopted for the reason it will remove the cause which now exists for criticism, sometimes just and sometimes unjust. I can conceive of no more important topic for legislation than the adoption of any measure which will raise the courts above criticism. Furnish them every possible available means to elevate them above reproach, so that every citizen will repose confidence in every act they perform. The administration of justice is a sacred thing. Confidence in the courts once destroyed, and the basis of law and order has been dealt a deadly blow, and the security of our institutions shaken from turret to foundation. The courts should have every security possible thrown around them to shield them from criticism, and if we enact the law which affords such protection and any court fails to avail itself of its provisions, then criticism will be deserved and upon it should with severity fall.

Mr. WATKINS. Mr. Chairman, as I before stated, when the question was asked by the gentleman from Indiana, neither this amendment now being considered nor the substitute to the amendment was ever submitted to the committee for examination, and for that reason I am not authorized by the committee as its chairman to make any concessions whatever. I wish to say, however, that if any of these amendments are to be adopted, my individual preference would be for the substitutes, because, first, they are shorter and more concise, and being terse in form, and being clear of expression. I prefer the substitute to be adopted to the original amendment offered. So far as my own position on the question is concerned, without reference to what may be the desire of the committee of which I have the honor to be the chairman, I will state that I propose from an individual standpoint to cast my vote in favor of the substitute which has been offered, and I shall do so largely because of the fact that in my own State the law is similar, and it has met the general approval of the people throughout the State of Louisiana.

Mr. SCOTT. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WATKINS. Certainly.

Mr. SCOTT. May I ask the gentleman whether he includes in his expression "substitute" both of the sections that are offered?

Mr. WATKINS. Of course I prefer both of them, but the last can be considered separately from the first.

Mr. STAFFORD. The second will be considered later.

Mr. SCOTT. Mr. Chairman, a parliamentary inquiry.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. SCOTT. Are we to have debate on the second proposition after the first is disposed of?

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair understands they are entirely separate.

Mr. SAUNDERS. Mr. Chairman, I would like to have reported the substitute on which we are to vote.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, there are a good many Members who have come into the Chamber since the matter was first presented, and I ask unanimous consent that the original amendment and substitute be reported.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Wisconsin desires the original amendment reported?

Mr. STAFFORD. The original and the substitute, for the benefit of those Members who have come into the Chamber since this matter was presented.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, the original amendment and substitute will be reported.

The Clerk again reported the Cullop amendment 169a and the Vaughan substitute for 169a.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is upon the substitute.

Mr. CULLOP. Mr. Chairman, I desire to say that I am perfectly willing to accept the substitute for the original amendment.

The question was taken, and the substitute was agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN. The question now is upon the amendment as amended by the substitute.

The question was taken, and the amendment as amended was agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN. There is another amendment, 169b, and substitute for it, and, without objection, the Clerk will report them to the House.

The Clerk again reported the Cullop amendment, 169b, and the Vaughan substitute for 169b.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is upon the substitute.

Mr. SCOTT. Mr. Chairman, it seems to me that the substitute indicates merely an expression of the existing law, although I think it is extremely likely that it may receive an interpretation that goes much beyond that and would be very detrimental to orderly procedure of trials in common-law cases. It seems to me that the language is not well chosen. The issues are framed by the pleadings, not determined by the evidence. Wherever there is a lack or a failure of evidence to support any essential issue as furnished by the pleadings, the court, as a matter of law, should have the right to withdraw the case from the jury. Wherever there is evidence to support all of the issues as framed by the pleadings essential to a recovery, then under existing law the court does not have the right or the power to withdraw the case from the jury. This substitute, if enacted into law, can do nothing more than to confuse the existing statutes of procedure. It seems to me that it ought not to be adopted——

Mr. CULLOP. Will the gentleman yield for a question there?

Mr. SCOTT. Yes.

Mr. CULLOP. I presume the gentleman is speaking in reference to the practice in the gentleman's State?

Mr. SCOTT. I am speaking with reference to the practice in the Federal courts.

Mr. CULLOP. Of the gentleman's State?

Mr. SCOTT. No; in all the States.

Mr. CULLOP. Well, I beg to disagree with the gentleman upon that, for it is just the reverse in my State, absolutely. I have heard the judge in numerous trials tell the jury that such and such a witness testifying to so and so should not be regarded.

Mr. SCOTT. I am not speaking upon that proposition; that falls within the gentleman's amendment.

Mr. CULLOP. On the other proposition of taking a case from the jury, I have likewise, and I think it is the experience of many lawyers, others I know of, have heard the court say, upon the motion to instruct the jury for the defendant at the close of the plaintiff's evidence, "You have the evidence; I do not believe the witness."

Mr. SCOTT. That deals with the gentleman's amendment and the substitute we adopted a moment ago.

Mr. CULLOP. Now, this amendment prevents the court from doing that, and gives that plaintiff in court his constitutional right to have the facts submitted to the jury and decided, and not the court, and comes just within the very spirit and language of the decision I read of the Supreme Court of the United States upon that identical question. Now, if the gentleman's theory should prevail, courts can continue to do as they have been doing—make up their minds that they do not believe the testimony of a witness, and say to the jury that the jury shall not consider those things and thereby deprive the plaintiff of his rights by taking the case from the jury and directing it to return a verdict for the defendant without leaving the box.

Mr. SCOTT. Does the gentleman contend that in the State of Indiana in any trial in a Federal court where there is evidence offered and introduced tending to support every essential issue presented by the pleadings that the Federal court can take that case from the jury under the law?

Mr. CULLOP. Oh, the gentleman says "can not." Doubtless if an appeal was had the Supreme Court would do as it has been doing in the past, and because it could not do it. The gentleman's question reminds me a good deal of the fellow who sent for a lawyer to advise him in regard to being locked up in jail——

Mr. SCOTT. I can not yield——

Mr. CULLOP (continuing). And when the lawyer said, "They can not put you in jail on that charge," the fellow said, "Look here, Jim, they have already done it; what's the use of your talking that way?" They have done it, and we want to pass a law that prohibits them from repeating and doing any such things as that. That is the object of this amendment.

Mr. SCOTT. That story is just as interesting as it was the first time I ever heard it. [Laughter.] The fact remains that the gentleman's argument concedes that the law is now just as he would have it. What can you gain by repeating what already exists if it is now the law and the plaintiff on appeal can obtain his remedy and reverse the court? What advantage would you gain by repeating the same law in other words?

Mr. CULLOP. If the gentleman will permit me, I will answer. There is no statute now. It is simply the law as held by the court. You have got to go to the old laws with reference to getting a remedy. Now we propose to write the law into the statute so that the court must be bound by the statute in the first instance.

Mr. SCOTT. The gentleman is entirely mistaken. It is not only in the statute at the present time, but it is guaranteed in the Constitution at the present time—a common-law trial according to the rules of common law.

Mr. ALLEN. Will the gentleman yield for a moment?

Mr. SCOTT. I will.

Mr. ALLEN. Has not the court of appeals held in similar cases that if the judge came to the conclusion that it was a matter which would warrant him in giving a new trial in case of motions intervening there would be no error if he instructed a verdict?

Mr. SCOTT. That is the test. If there is a lack of evidence to support an essential fact the court in such a case would take the case from the jury, but if he inadvertently permitted it to go to the jury and then discovered the error he might grant a new trial. It is the one question. Unless this section 169 is read out of the statute after you adopt it, unless it is construed to be absolutely nothing, then it will deprive the court of the right to withdraw the case from the jury when an essential fact is without support in the evidence.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the substitute.

The substitute was agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN. The question now is on agreeing to the amendment as amended.

The amendment as amended was agreed to.

Mr. BARTLETT. Mr. Chairman, I have an amendment, which I have sent to the Clerk's desk.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

At the end of line 26, page 95, insert the following:

"In all cases of indirect contempt wherein the defendant is charged with contempt of court not committed in the presence of the court, or so near thereto as to interfere with the administration of justice, upon the demand of the defendant, the trial shall be by jury, as in criminal cases.

Mr. WATKINS. Mr. Chairman, I reserve a point of order on that. We have already passed that section.

Mr. BARTLETT. No; we have not.

Mr. WATKINS. We have already read section 169, and passed over that, and have incorporated two other sections.

Mr. BARTLETT. That amendment was sent up at the same time—I was recognized by the Chair, and sent the amendment up at the same time the gentleman from Indiana sent up his amendment.

Mr. WATKINS. Whether that is true or not, the gentleman did not insist on it. The amendments have already been considered, and two new sections have been put in the bill.

The CHAIRMAN. Has this amendment been offered before?

Mr. BARTLETT. Yes; and has been at the Clerk's desk all this time.

Mr. STAFFORD. It has never been reported before. I do not think the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. BARTLETT] will question that.

Mr. BARTLETT. No; it has not been reported before.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair understands——

Mr. LLOYD. Mr. Chairman, in order to settle the matter, I ask unanimous consent that we may recur to section 169, and then the gentleman can offer it.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

Mr. WATKINS. Mr. Chairman, this will create a very lengthy discussion. We saw from the argument in the House yesterday how much interest is taken in this matter, and I do not think it is necessary to load down the bill with matters of this kind. For that reason I object to going back to section 169.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman insist on his point of order?

Mr. WATKINS. Certainly.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair understands that section 169 has been passed and two additional sections have since been added. The Chair is willing to hear the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. BARTLETT] on the point of order, but the Chair is of the opinion that we have already passed section 169 and adopted two other sections.

Mr. BARTLETT. Very well. All right, sir. I will not be caught again by my modesty.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair thinks the point of order is well taken. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 170. Issues of fact in civil cases in any district court may be tried and determined by the court, without the intervention of a jury, whenever the parties or their attorneys of record file with the clerk a stipulation in writing waiving a jury. Upon the request of either of the parties the court shall submit in writing its findings of fact and conclusions of law therefrom, and the finding of the court upon the facts, whether general or special, shall have the same effect as the verdict of a jury.

Mr. BARTLETT. Mr. Chairman, I move to amend this section by inserting, after the word "jury," in line 5, page 96, section 170, the amendment which is at the Clerk's desk.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amend, on page 96, by inserting, after the word "jury," in line 5, the following:

In all cases of indirect contempt wherein the defendant is charged with contempt of court not committed in the presence of the court or so near thereto as to interfere with the administration of justice, upon the demand of the defendant the trial shall be by jury as in criminal cases.

Mr. BRYAN. That is a good amendment.

Mr. BARTLETT. Just a word. I do not propose to have any discussion on it. We had a discussion yesterday and the day before on the antitrust bill as to this, and as we are revising the law, and if that bill ever becomes the law, that provision will be in it, I apprehend, and we might as well anticipate what will be the law and put it in the revision of the law. But whether it becomes the law or not, the fact remains that a man charged with criminal contempt ought, upon his demand, to have the right of trial by jury.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The question was taken, and the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. WATKINS. Mr. Chairman, in section 169, line 23, the word "next" is used, and as two sections have been added since then it is necessary now to strike out that word "next" and insert "170," so that, after the word "section," strike out "next," and insert, after the word 'section," "170," so as to make it intelligible. I ask unanimous consent that that be done.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman asks unanimous consent that the amendment be made as suggested.

Mr. WATKINS. That the word "next," on line 23, page 95, be stricken out, and that, after the word "section," "170" be inserted.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment. Will it not be necessary to strike out the word "the" also?

Mr. WATKINS. Yes; both words.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amend, page 95, by striking out, in line 23, the words "the next" and inserting, after the word "section," the words "one hundred and seventy."

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. SCOTT. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment, which I send to the Clerk's desk.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment offered by the gentleman from Iowa.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 96, line 6, after the word "its," insert the word "special."

Mr. SCOTT. Mr. Chairman, the italicized words in this section, I presume, were intended to change some rule of law that now exists and possibly to do away with some defect.

The statute as it exists under the present interpretation, in cases where juries waived, permits the trial court, in his discretion, to return findings of fact, either general or special. The parties may file requests for a special finding of fact under existing law, but the court exercises its discretion as to whether or not it will return a special finding of facts.

Now, in case the court returns a special finding of fact on appeal, two matters of review may be brought up: First, on a special finding of fact, the court may review the question as to whether that special finding supports judgment; second, the court may review any ruling of the progress of the trial. If the finding is general, the appellate court, whether it is the Circuit Court of Appeals or the Supreme Court, is confined in its review to the rulings of the court in the progress of the trial.

Now, this amendment italicized in section 170 provides that upon request of either of the parties the court shall submit in writing its findings of fact and conclusions of law therefrom; and the findings of the court upon the facts, whether general or special, shall have the same effect as the verdict of the jury.

Now, the question occurs when the request provided for in this amendment is filed and presented: May not the court exercise its discretion as to whether the findings that are to be made shall be special or general findings? If the court may exercise its discretion in that respect, then no change has been wrought into existing law. If the word "special" be inserted before the word "finding" then the evil or the defect that now exists is cured. The court may be required to return special findings, which gives the party presenting the request the opportunity to have reviewed not only the rulings during the progress of the trial but the question of law as to whether the special findings made by the court support the judgment.

I would like to ask the chairman of the committee, for the information of myself and the House, whether, in his opinion, the purpose of this italicized amendment was to permit the party presenting it to have the opportunity of review in the upper court upon the question of law as to whether the findings support the judgment? I would like to have the attention of the chairman of the committee.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Louisiana [Mr. WATKINS] is being interrogated.

Mr. SCOTT. I have asked the courtesy of an opinion.

Mr. WATKINS. I will be glad to give it, if I can.

Mr. SCOTT. I will repeat what I said. I asked the gentleman whether it is the understanding of the gentleman's committee that this italicized amendment of existing law gives to either party the right to have reviewed the question of whether the findings made support the judgment of the court?

Mr. WATKINS. I think the expression "findings" there would cover special findings as well as general findings.

Mr. SCOTT. Yes; but what is to prevent the court from exercising its discretion in returning either a special finding or a general finding?

Mr. WATKINS. I would think the greater clause there, the greater privilege, the greater right, would include the lesser, and the expression there would be broader and would cover a special finding. I do not see any trouble about it all.

Mr. SCOTT. Perhaps the gentleman does not. But if the court has discretion to determine whether the findings shall be special or general, then you have not changed the law. You can have reviewed only one question, the rulings in the progress of the trial, if the finding is general, whereas if the court is compelled to return a special finding you have both classes of questions reviewed.

Mr. WATKINS. I have no objection to that.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Iowa has expired.

Mr. SCOTT. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for 5 minutes more.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the gentleman's request?

Mr. WATKINS. Reserving the right to object, Mr. Chairman, if the gentleman wants that 5 minutes' time for the purpose of convincing anybody of the propriety of the word "special" in there, I do not think he need take it. I do not think anybody objects to it at all; and for the sake of economy of time, to get a vote, if there is no objection to the word "special" being used, I will consent to a vote. I think it is a useless consumption of time to discuss it further. I do not desire to unnecessarily occupy the time of the House, but I do want the amendment agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. SCOTT] desire the floor?

Mr. SCOTT. I have no desire to occupy the time of the committee uselessly.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. Mr. Chairman, I desire to offer an amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Texas offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

"Provided, That in all cases, civil or criminal, the jury shall be the exclusive judges of the weight of the evidence and the credibility of the witnesses, but they must look to the charge of the court for the law of the case."

Mr. STAFFORD. I make the point that that is not germane. We have already considered that very proposition for an hour and a half. Perhaps the gentleman from Texas was not here at the time, but that has been gone over very thoroughly this afternoon, and has been virtually adopted.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. Then I withdraw the amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. If there be no objection, the amendment will be withdrawn, and the Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 171. The practice, pleadings, and forms and modes of proceeding in civil causes, other than equity and admiralty causes, in the district courts, shall conform, as near as may be, to the practice, pleadings, and forms and modes of proceeding existing at the time in like causes in the courts of record of the State within which such district courts are held, any rule of court to the contrary notwithstanding.

Mr. WINGO. Mr. Chairman, it seems to me I ought to suggest the absence of a quorum, in view of the fact that there are only three Republicans and two Progressives present, and the official record keeper of the Republican Party, the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. FESS] is not here.

Mr. MOORE. I call the attention of the gentleman to the fact that there is one more Republican here.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, I think comparisons are odious, unless the gentleman states the number of Democrats present.

Mr. MURDOCK. There are nine Democrats here.

Mr. FOSTER. More than that.

Mr. MURDOCK. Count them.

Mr. FOSTER. You count them.

Mr. STAFFORD If these small numbers present are going to be talked about here, I shall make the point of no quorum myself.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman make the point?

Mr. STAFFORD. I am not responsible for the gentleman making the statement he has just made.

Mr. WINGO. I do not want so heavy a responsibility, and I will not make the point now, but I will later.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman withdraws the point, and the Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 175. In suits commenced under the act of March 3, 1887, an act to provide for the bringing of suits against the Government of the United States, the jurisdiction of the district courts of the United States, including the right of exception and appeal, shall be governed by the law as to other cases, in so far as the same is applicable and not inconsistent with the provisions hereinafter contained; and the course of procedure shall be in accordance with the established rules of said court and of such additions and modifications thereof as said courts may adopt.

Mr. WATKINS. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Louisiana offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 98, line 1, strike out the section and insert in lieu thereof the following:

"In suits commenced under the twentieth paragraph of section 24 of the Judicial Code, and under section 145 of the Judicial Code, the jurisdiction of the district courts and of the Court of Claims of the United States, including the right of exception and appeal, shall be governed by the law as to other cases, in so far as the same is applicable and not inconsistent with the provisions hereinafter contained; and the course of procedure shall be in accordance with the established rules of said courts and of such additions and modifications thereof as said courts may adopt."

Mr. STAFFORD. I should like to inquire of the gentleman from Louisiana whether there is any material change in the amendment proposed by him from what is carried in the bill?

Mr. WATKINS. No. It includes the Court of Claims, together with the other courts.

Mr. STAFFORD. I thought perhaps that might be the object of it.

The amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 176. The plaintiff in any suit mentioned in the preceding section shall file a petition, duly verified, with the clerk of the district court in the district where the plaintiff resides. Such petition shall set forth the full name and residence of the plaintiff, the nature of his claim, and a succinct statement of the facts upon which the claim is based, the money or any other thing claimed, or the damages sought to be recovered, and praying the court for a judgment or decree upon the facts and law.

Mr. WATKINS. Mr. Chairman, I have another amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Louisiana offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 98, in line 13, after the word "clerk," insert the words "of the Court of Claims or."

Mr. WATKINS. Mr. Chairman, that simply makes that section conform to the other section, and includes the Court of Claims.

The amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 177. The plaintiff shall cause a copy of his petition filed under the preceding section to be served upon the district attorney of the United States in the district wherein suit is brought, and shall mail a copy of the same, by registered letter, to the Attorney General of the United States, and shall thereupon cause to be filed with the clerk of the court wherein suit is instituted an affidavit of such service and the mailing of such letter. It shall be the duty of the district attorney upon whom service of petition is made as aforesaid to appear and defend the interests of the Government in the suit, and within 60 days after the service of petition upon him, unless the time should be extended by order of the court made in the case, to file a plea, answer, or demurrer on the part of the Government, and to file a notice of any counterclaim, set-off, claim for damages, or other demand or defense whatsoever of the Government in the premises: Provided, That should the district attorney neglect or refuse to file the plea, answer, demurrer, or defense, as required, the plaintiff may proceed with the case under such rules as the court may adopt in the premises; but the plaintiff shall not have judgment or decree for his claim, or any part thereof, unless he shall establish the same by proof satisfactory to the court.

Mr. CULLOP. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment: In line 6, before the word "petition," insert the article "the." As it is now, it does not read right.

Mr. WATKINS. That is correct.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amend, page 99, by inserting before the word "petition," in line 6, the word "the."

The amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 178. In every suit mentioned in the last preceding section it shall be the duty of the court to cause a written opinion to be filed in the cause, setting forth the specific findings by the court of the facts therein and the conclusions of the court upon all questions of law involved in the case, and to render judgment thereon. If the suit be in equity or admiralty, the court shall proceed with the same according to the rules of such courts.

Mr. WATKINS. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

On page 99, line 18, after the word "in," strike out the words "the last preceding section" and insert the following: "Section 175."

Mr. WINGO. Mr. Chairman, I would like to ask the gentleman what the purpose of the amendment is.

Mr. WATKINS. To make it conform to section 175.

Mr. STAFFORD. Ought not written opinions to be filed in other cases than those mentioned in section 175?

Mr. WATKINS. Perhaps so; but if the gentleman makes any suggestions of any other cases, it might be considered.

Mr. STAFFORD. Before the amendment was offered the law requires the court to file opinions in writing in all cases. The purpose of this amendment seems to be to limit it to these suits in which the Government is a party.

Mr. WATKINS. If the gentleman desires it, I will have section 175 read. That will cover the point.

Mr. STAFFORD. If the gentleman is sure that it does not restrict it, that it carries out the intendment of the present law, I have no further question about it.

Mr. WATKINS. I think it does; I am satisfied with it.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Louisiana.

The amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 179. When the findings of fact and the law applicable thereto have been filed in any case as provided in the preceding section, and the judgment or decree is adverse to the Government, it shall be the duty of the district attorney to transmit to the Attorney General of the United States certified copies of all the papers filed in the cause, with a transcript of the testimony taken, the written findings of the court, and his written opinion as to the same; whereupon the Attorney General shall determine and direct whether an appeal or writ of error shall be taken or not; and when so directed the district attorney shall cause an appeal or writ of error to be perfected in accordance with the terms of the statutes and rules of practice governing the same: Provided, That no appeal or writ of error shall be allowed after six months from the judgment or decree in such suit. From the date of such final judgment or decree interest shall be computed thereon at the rate of 4 per cent per annum until the time when an appropriation is made for the payment of the judgment or decree.

Mr. CULLOP. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word in order to ask the chairman a question. Commencing with the proviso, it says that no appeal or writ of error shall be allowed after 6 months from the judgment or decree in such suit. Does not the gentleman think that that ought to be 12 months instead of 6?

Mr. WATKINS. No; I think 6 months is too long a time. I think 3 months or 60 days would be plenty of time.

Mr. CULLOP. In most of the States in which I have practiced they have given 12 months to perfect an appeal. It seems to me that 6 months is a very short time. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the word "six," in line 14, and insert the word "twelve."

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 100, in line 14, strike out the word "six" and insert the word "twelve."

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment.

The question was taken, and the amendment was rejected.

Mr. MOORE. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. Will the chairman kindly explain whether, beginning on line 13, we have any new law in reference to the interest paragraph?

Mr. WATKINS. No; it is the same old law.

Mr. MOORE. Four per cent interest on judgments is the interest now allowed by law.

Mr. BARTLETT. This deals with judgments against the Government.

Mr. MOORE. In certain cases interest is not allowed against the Government.

Mr. BARTLETT. Not until after judgment, and after judgment is had against the Government the interest runs at 4 per cent.

Mr. MOORE. That is existing law?

Mr. BARTLETT. It is.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 182. The Supreme Court shall have power to prescribe, from time to time, and in any manner not inconsistent with any law of the United States, the forms of writs and other process, the modes of framing and filing proceedings and pleadings, of taking and obtaining evidence, of obtaining discovery, of proceeding to obtain relief, of drawing up, entering, and enrolling decrees, and of proceeding before trustees appointed by the court, and generally to regulate the whole practice, to be used, in suits in equity or admiralty, by the district courts.

Mr. WATKINS. Mr. Chairman, at the end of line 25 is a period. I move to strike out the period and insert a comma after the word "admiralty."

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 100, line 25, after the word "admiralty" strike out the period and insert a comma.

The amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 180. When any vessel, goods, wares, or merchandise are seized by any officer of the customs, and prosecuted for forfeiture by virtue of any law respecting the revenue, or the registering and recording, or the enrolling and licensing of vessels, the court shall cause 14 days' notice to be given of such seizure and libel, by causing the substance of such libel, with the order of the court thereon setting forth the time and place appointed for trial, to be inserted in some newspaper published near the place of seizure, and by posting up the same in the most public manner for the space of 14 days at or near the place of trial; and proclamation shall be made in such manner as the court shall direct. If no person appears and claims such vessel, goods, wares, or merchandise, and gives bond to defend the prosecution thereof and to respond the cost in case he shall not support his claim, the court shall proceed to hear and determine the cause according to law.

Mr. MOORE. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out in lines 22 and 23 the words "some newspaper" and insert in lieu thereof the words "two daily newspapers."

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Pennsylvania offers an amendment which the Clerk will report.

Page 104, lines 22 and 23, strike out the words "some newspaper" and insert in lieu thereof the words "two daily newspapers."

Mr. MOORE. Mr. Chairman, I presume when this law was enacted providing for publication in "some newspaper" daily newspapers did not have the influence they have to-day nor the circulation. "Some newspaper" is indefinite, and would indicate a monthly, a weekly—a newspaper which might not give sufficient notice to the parties in interest. We are proceeding to-day in all modern communities with daily newspapers which are the common avenues of communication between the people; and it seems to me that a daily newspaper ought to be specified, because if there is one thing that can be done by litigants or by skillful attorneys sometimes to avoid notice being given to parties in interest it is to seek out some monthly or weekly newspaper and put the advertisement therein. I think frequently in certain cases it is found convenient in order that proceedings may go along unhampered to find a paper of small circulation or a periodical, not a daily newspaper, in which to bury the legal notice. For that reason I suggest that the words "two daily newspapers" be inserted in lieu of the indefinite "some newspaper." I do not object to having it in one newspaper, though it would be fairer to all parties to have two.

Mr. CULLOP. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MOORE. Certainly.

Mr. CULLOP. Suppose there was no daily newspaper there in which to insert it. This provides that it shall be inserted at the place where the libel took place. Suppose there was no daily newspaper there, or only one daily newspaper, or one weekly, would the litigant have to establish a daily newspaper there in order to make publications?

Mr. MOORE. Mr. Chairman, I question whether in these times an action would be brought anywhere where a district court is established where there is not a daily newspaper.

Mr. CULLOP. But this is not where the court is established; it is where the seizure is made.

Mr. MURDOCK. Near the place.

Mr. CULLOP. The gentleman is wanting an amendment put here that would make notice impossible, according to the terms of this statute, and it may occur under the terms of this statute as it is in some instances.

Mr. MOORE. The amendment could be framed slightly differently. It could be made to appear in the daily newspaper, if a daily newspaper were published there.

Mr. CULLOP. And then he would have notice given where nobody interested would see it or know what it was about.

Mr. MOORE. I want to avoid that very thing. I think it is fair to the defendant that he should have notice, and if it is put in "some newspaper" in that indefinite form that "some newspaper" may be a paper of no circulation at all or it may be a monthly or a weekly, which would never be seen by the parties interested.

Mr. WATKINS. Mr. Chairman, this law has been in existence for over a hundred years and has operated satisfactorily. I do not know of any criticism ever having been made of the law before, and it is a fact that in some places there might not be a daily newspaper, as suggested by the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. CULLOP], or ever a weekly newspaper. I do not think there is any danger at this late day of the law being used to the disadvantage of the defendant.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, I desire to make inquiry of the chairman of the committee in respect to another matter. It is now after 5 o'clock. There are only a handful of Members here, and I would like to inquire of the chairman of the committee how late he plans to run?

Mr. WATKINS. Mr. Chairman, I had hoped to be able to go until 6 o'clock, but it seems we are not making quite the headway I had hoped, and I will say I will move to rise about half past 5.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Pennsylvania.

The amendment was rejected.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 190. In all cases where debts are due from defaulting or delinquent postmasters, contractors, or other officers, agents, or employees of the Post Office Department, a warrant of attachment may issue against all real and personal property and legal and equitable rights belonging to such officer, agent, or employee, and his sureties, or either of them, in the following cases:

First. When such officer, agent, or employee, and his sureties, or either of them, is a nonresident of the district where such officer, agent, or employee was appointed, or has departed from such district for the purpose of permanently residing out of the same, or of defrauding the United States, or of avoiding the service of civil process.

Second. When such officer, agent, or employee, and his sureties, or either of them, has conveyed away or is about to convey away his property, or any part thereof, or has removed or is about to remove the same, or any part thereof, from the district wherein it is situate, with intent to defraud the United States.

When any such property has been removed certified copies of the warrant may be sent to the marshal of the district into which the same has been removed, under which certified copies he may seize said property and convey it to some convenient point within the jurisdiction of the court from which the warrant originally issued. Alias warrants may be issued in such cases upon due application, and the validity of the warrant first issued shall continue until the return day thereof.

Mr. SCOTT. Mr. Chairman, I desire to offer an amendment.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, I presume we are considering this bill by sections and not by paragraphs.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will finish reading the section.

The Clerk concluded the reading of the above.

Mr. SCOTT. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

On page 105, in line 14, after the word "employee," strike out "and" and insert "or."

Mr. SCOTT. Mr. Chairman, the purport of this amendment is to make it necessary before an attachment may issue against some surety that such surety fall within the provisions of the paragraph. In other words, that attachments shall not issue against the property of the surety and his property be tied up merely because of the nonresidence of the principal. In a suit brought in a district against an officer or an employee and his sureties a ground may exist for an attachment against the principal, but I think it is a hardship and without reason when the surety resides in the bailiwick and is present and his property there and he is solvent, that his property should be attached merely because another party to the suit is absent or has done some act that would justify the attachment of his property.

Mr. STAFFORD. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WATKINS. I want to be heard on this.

Mr. SCOTT. I will.

Mr. STAFFORD. As I understand, the Government is not to have the right to seize the property of sureties of a defaulting officer, agent, or employee unless there is no property of the principal in the district available for attachment.

Mr. SCOTT. No; that is not the point. An attachment is a writ that issues before judgment and usually for some cause that imperils the plaintiff's right to recovery.

Mr. STAFFORD. But in this case we are by statute giving the Government the right to attach in these cases of a defaulting postmaster, contractor, or other officer, agent, or employee of the Post Office Department.

Mr. SCOTT. Yes.

Mr. STAFFORD. Now, when they are nonresidents of the district, according to this first paragraph, then the Government will have the right to levy either upon the property, as I understand it, of these defaulting officials or contractors or upon that of the sureties.

Mr. SCOTT. Yes. Now, in the case of an attachment, I see no reason why, when the surety is present in the district, his property in sight, who is solvent and substantial, his property should be tied up by a writ of attachment because of a default of the principal, he not having done any act that imperils the right of the Government to recover. This section, as it stands, is contrary and at variance with the whole system of legislation with respect to attachments. There is no statute that permits an attachment against property because of an act done by some other man. He must have been guilty of the act which imperils the right to recovery.

Mr. MOORE. Does the gentleman want to relieve the surety of responsibility?

Mr. SCOTT. No; it does not relieve him at all; his property may be levied upon when judgment is obtained, but this giving the right of attachment previous to judgment might cause great damage and inconvenience to business men who are perfectly solvent.

Mr. STAFFORD. The gentleman will realize this writ is only to apply when either of these delinquent and defaulting officers of the Government or contractors are removing their property, or when the sureties are removing their property, or attempting to take that status which will not insure protection to the Government. Why should not we give the Government the right to proceed against the surety of a defaulting official where the surety himself is attempting to move out of the district or attempting to move some of his property from the district?

Mr. SCOTT. Oh, there will be authority in case my amendment is adopted.

Mr. STAFFORD. I am doubtful, perhaps without cause.

Mr. SCOTT. The only difference would be the writ of attachment would not run against the property of the surety merely because some other party has violated the provisions and conditions.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

Mr. WATKINS. Mr. Chairman, if I am not mistaken in the verbiage of the amendment, it will have exactly the opposite effect to that which the gentleman contemplates. I ask that the Clerk will report the amendment again.

The CHAIRMAN The Clerk will report the amendment.

The amendment was again reported.

Mr. WATKINS. Mr. Chairman, the argument of the gentleman is that the word "or" would be a safeguard, whereas the word "and" requires that both the principal and the surety, or either of them, should be a nonresident.

Mr. SCOTT. The word following before the word "employee."

Mr. WATKINS. That is the "or," is it?

Mr. SCOTT. I was going to suggest to the gentleman that inasmuch as the word "or" precedes the word "employee" it prevents the construction which the gentleman is giving.

Mr. WATKINS. No; you are mistaken about that. The words "officer, agent, or employee" refer to the same class of people, and the word "and" joins together the words "sureties" and "or either of them."

Mr. SCOTT. The language is "when such officer, agent, or employee." That is, the defaulting officer or his sureties, or either of them, is a nonresident. Now, if any of them are in his district or in the territory or jurisdiction of the court, then the law is satisfied; but if all of them are absent, then the provision comes in.

Mr. WATKINS. Well, as it stands now, if either of them is a nonresident, the writ may run against any of them.

But the comma after the word "employee," the words "officer, agent, or employee," referring to the debtors to the Government, or "defaulters," as the case may be, are one class of persons and the comma after the word "employee" disconnected from the "and" makes it clear that the gentleman's interpretation is wrong, and I ask that the amendment be voted down.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

Mr. WINGO. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. This is a very important amendment, as I understand it.

The CHAIRMAN. There is an amendment pending now, the Chair understands.

Mr. WINGO. I move to strike out the last word.

Mr. WATKINS. Talk on the amendment.

Mr. WINGO. Then I will talk on the amendment. I feel constrained to take part in the debate on account of the attractiveness of it and the importance of the subject. As I understand, the amendment is to strike out the word "or" and substitute the word "and," or strike out the word "and" and substitute "or," as the case may be. The amendment is important, but I have noticed that it is not important enough to lure back to his labors the distinguished timekeeper of the Republican Party, the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. FESS], although it has attracted several distinguished Members from the other end of the Capitol.

Mr. MOORE. So long as the gentleman is good enough to call attention to this, will he also note the absence of the official timekeeper on the other side, the gentleman from Connecticut [Mr. DONOVAN]? By doing so he will retain the equilibrium.

Mr. WINGO. I am anxious to retain the equilibrium, and will make the notation suggested by the gentleman from Pennsylvania. Now, I hope we will not be delayed longer by this important amendment. I understand it has been suggested that we adjourn at half past 5 o'clock. I hope when we get back into the House we will take a recess until 8 o'clock and work from 8 until 11 o'clock, so that we can get through. I think we can get unanimous consent, because the workers are here and the drones are not, provided we can avoid the rule which prevents recess on Calendar Wednesdays.

Mr. MURDOCK. That is a pretty serious reflection on the Congress, when he says that the drones are not here and the workers are, because there are so few men present.

Mr. MOORE. Will the gentleman take cognizance of the fact that there is no baseball game, and therefore there must be some other reason for the absence of the gentlemen from the other side.

Mr. MURDOCK. There is a concert outside.

Mr. WINGO. I suppose the few Democrats who are absent have joined the many Republicans who are out at the concert. Of course, there are something less than 200 on the Democratic side, it is true, but the ones here include the faithful workers—the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. LLOYD] and the gentleman from Louisiana [Mr. WATKINS] and other faithful ones.

Now to get back to my proposition, and it is this: These Members do not have to do this work. And why not? If we go back into the House, take a recess until 8 o'clock, and then work until 11, and thereby expedite the public business, this would not interfere with those gentlemen who voted against my motion this morning and immediately left. They will not be here.

Mr. STAFFORD. Why not make the suggestion that we rise now and then have the House move to take a recess?

Mr. WINGO. We want to get as far as we can, as there is grave doubt whether the Speaker can entertain a motion to recess on Calendar Wednesday.

Mr. MOORE. Will not the gentleman kindly note, before he takes his seat, the presence and activity of the distinguished Speaker of the House?

Mr. WINGO. He is always present. [Applause.]

Mr. MOORE. Will not the gentleman also kindly note the presence of Mr. STAFFORD, of Wisconsin?

Mr. WINGO. I object to going further in an enumeration——

Mr. MURDOCK. It is impossible to omit Mr. STAFFORD [laughter]——

Mr. WINGO. The gentleman awhile ago stated that comparisons are odious, and I feel that individual designations under the circumstances might be equally odious. [Laughter.]

Mr. BARTON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WINGO. Yes.

Mr. BARTON. You ought to have mentioned the other 8. [Laughter.]

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. SCOTT].

The question was taken, and the amendment was rejected.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 193. At any time within 20 days before the return day of such warrant the party whose property is attached may, on giving notice to the district attorney of his intention, file a plea in abatement, traversing the allegations of the affidavit, or denying the ownership of the property attached to be in the defendants or either of them. In such case the court may, upon application of either party, order an immediate trial by jury of the issues raised by the affidavit and plea; but the parties may by consent waive a trial by jury, in which case the court shall decide the issues raised. Any party claiming ownership of the property attached and a specific return thereof shall be confined to the remedy herein afforded, but his right to an action of trespass, or other action for damages, shall not be impaired hereby.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. Mr. Chairman, I want to call the attention of the gentleman from Louisiana [Mr. WATKINS] to the word "hereby," in line 16, page 107. It ought to be "thereby." That is in section 193. I think it should read "shall not be impaired thereby."

Mr. WATKINS. Mr. Chairman, I see that the original law has it "hereby." I presume it is right, although I do not think it is good grammar. I shall not make any motion with respect to it.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 194. When the property attached is sold on any interlocutory order of the court or is producing any revenue, the money arising from such sale or revenue shall be invested in securities of the United States, under the order of the court, and all accretions shall be held subject to the orders of the same.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. STAFFORD] moves to strike out the last word.

Mr. STAFFORD. Do I understand the chairman of the committee to disagree to the suggestion of the gentleman from Texas [Mr. STEPHENS]?

Mr. WATKINS. Yes; it refers to the provisions of section 193, and "hereby" is the proper word there.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 195. Immediately upon the execution of any such warrant of attachment the marshal shall cause due publication thereof to be made in the case of absconding debtors for two months and of nonresidents for four months. The publication shall be made in some newspaper published in the district where the property is situate, and the details thereof shall be regulated by the order under which the warrant is issued.

Mr. STAFFORD. Would not this be a good place to rise?

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair calls the attention of the gentleman from Louisiana to the fact that "marshal" is spelled with a double "l" on page 107, line 24.

Mr. WATKINS. I move, Mr. Chairman, that the final "l" be stricken out.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 196. After the first publication of such notice of attachment as required by law, every person indebted to, or having possession of any property belonging to, the said defendants, or either of them, and having knowledge of such notice, shall account and answer for the amount of such debt and the value of such property; and any disposal or attempt to dispose of any such property, to the injury of the United States, shall be illegal and void. When the person indebted to, or having possession of the property of, such defendants, or either of them, is known to the district attorney or marshal, such officer shall see that personal notice of the attachment is served upon such person; but the want of such notice shall not invalidate the attachment.

Mr. WATKINS. Mr. Chairman, I move that the committee do now rise.

Mr. BRYAN. Mr. Chairman, I hope the gentleman will withhold that motion for a moment, and let a brief telegram that I have sent to the desk be read. It is only about 40 words.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Louisiana [Mr. WATKINS] withhold his motion to rise?

Mr. WATKINS. If it is anything that sheds light on the subject under discussion I will.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the motion to rise.

The motion was agreed to.

The committee accordingly rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. RUSSELL, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that committee had had under consideration the bill (H. R. 15578) to codify, revise, and amend the laws relating to the judiciary, and had come to no resolution thereon.

ENROLLED BILL SIGNED.

Mr. ASHBROOK, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that they had examined and found truly enrolled bill of the following title, when the Speaker signed the same:

H. R. 15190. An act to amend section 103 of the act entitled "An act to codify, revise, and amend the laws relating to the judiciary," approved March 3, 1911, as amended by the act of Congress approved March 3, 1913.

IRRIGATION-EXTENSION BILL.

Mr. BRYAN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the brief telegraphic message that I send to the Clerk's desk be read.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Washington [Mr. BRYAN] asks unanimous consent to have read a brief message. Is there objection?

Mr. KINDEL. Reserving the right to object, Mr. Speaker, I would like to know what that telegram is about.

The SPEAKER. The only way to find out is to read it.

Mr. BRYAN. If the gentleman will let me state what it is about, I think he will not object. It is a very urgent message from the Commercial Club of Prosser, Wash., urging the passage of Senate bill 4638, the irrigation bill, that has been passed over. The farmers of the Yakima Valley urgently desire its passage.

Mr. Speaker, I ask that it be extended in the RECORD without being read.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Washington asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD by having the telegram inserted. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Following is the telegram referred to:

Hon. J. W. BRYAN,
Representative, Washington, D. C.:

Prosser Commercial Club urges the passage at this session of Congress of the irrigation-extension bill (S. 4628), in the interests of the Reclamation Service and the small farmers, 80 to 90 per cent of whom, in the Yakima Valley, can not possibly meet payments required by present law.

PROSSER COMMERCIAL CLUB,
By L. L. LYNN.

DISPOSITION OF USELESS PAPERS.

The SPEAKER laid before the House the following communication:

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES,
June 3, 1914.

The Vice President appointed Mr. PAGE and Mr. LANE members of the joint select committee on the part of the Senate, as provided for in the act of February 16, 1889, as amended by the act of March 2, 1895, entitled "An act to authorize and provide for the disposition of useless papers in the executive departments," for the disposition of useless papers in the Treasury Department.

Attest:

JAMES M. BAKER, Secretary.

INVALID PENSIONS.

Mr. RUSSELL. Mr. Speaker, I call up the conference report on the bill (S. 4552) granting pensions and increase of pensions to certain soldiers and sailors of the Civil War and certain widows and dependent relatives of such soldiers and sailors.

Mr. STAFFORD. May I inquire whether the conference report has been printed under the rule?

Mr. RUSSELL. It has been printed under the rule.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will read the conference report.

The Clerk read the conference report, as follows:

CONFERENCE REPORT (NO. 713).

ADJOURNMENT.

Mr. WATKINS. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House do now adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; accordingly (at 5 o'clock and 40 minutes p. m.) the House adjourned until Thursday, June 4, 1914, at 11 o'clock a. m.

EXECUTIVE COMMUNICATIONS.

Under clause 2 of Rule XXIV, executive communications were taken from the Speaker's table and referred as follows:

1. A letter from the Secretary of War, transmitting reports of the several bureaus and divisions of the War Department, giving a list of papers of their respective offices not needed or useful in the transaction of current business and which have no permanent value or historical interest (H. Doc. No. 1005); to the Joint Select Committee on Disposition of Useless Papers and ordered to be printed.

2. A letter from the Acting Secretary of the Treasury, transmitting schedules and lists of papers and documents on the files of the Office of the Auditor for the Navy Department, the offices of collectors of internal revenue, and in the office of the collector of customs, Duluth, Minn. (H. Doc. No. 1006); to the Joint Select Committee on Disposition of Useless Papers and ordered to be printed.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES ON PUBLIC BILLS AND RESOLUTIONS.

Under clause 2 of Rule XIII, bills and resolutions were severally reported from committees, delivered to the Clerk, and referred to the several calendars therein named, as follows:

Mr. HAYDEN, from the Committee on the Public Lands, to which was referred the bill (H. R. 15907) authorizing the survey and sale of certain lands in Coconino County, Ariz., to the occupants thereof, reported the same with amendment, accompanied by a report (No. 759), which said bill and report were referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union.

He also, from the same committee, to which was referred the bill (H. R. 11318) authorizing the sale of lands in Lyman County, S. Dak., reported the same with amendment, accompanied by a report (No. 760), which said bill and report were referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union.

PUBLIC BILLS, RESOLUTIONS, AND MEMORIALS.

Under clause 3 of Rule XXII, bills, resolutions, and memorials were introduced and severally referred as follows:

By Mr. JOHNSON of Washington: A bill (H. R. 17011) providing for the establishment on an island of the insular or territorial possessions of the United States a home for lepers; to the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce.

By Mr. DUPRÉ: A bill (H. R. 17012) to amend and reenact section 861 of the Revised Statutes of the United States, relative to the mode of proof in common-law actions; to the Committee on the Judiciary.

By Mr. HAYES: A bill (H. R. 17013) to provide for the erection of a monument at the summit of Fremonts Peak, Cal., to commemorate the unfurling of the flag of the United States upon that spot by Gen. Fremont at the outbreak of the Mexican War; to the Committee on the Library.

Also, a bill (H. R. 17014) for the erection and maintenance of a steam fog whistle on Point Pinos, Cal.; to the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce.

Also, a bill (H. R. 17015) to establish a lighthouse of the first order on Point Pinos, Cal.; to the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce.

By Mr. HAYDEN: A bill (H. R. 17016) authorizing the construction of the San Carlos irrigation project, and for other purposes; to the Committee on Indian Affairs.

By Mr. MACDONALD: A bill (H. R. 17017) to provide for the establishment of a national employment bureau under the direction and supervision of the Secretary of Labor; to the Committee on Labor.

By Mr. BRITTEN: A bill (H. R. 17018) to provide for the erection of a national leprosarium; to the Committee on Appropriations.

By Mr. ROBERTS of Massachusetts: A bill (H. R. 17019) donating land in the city of Malden, Mass., for park purposes; to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

By Mr. BUCHANAN of Illinois: A bill (H. R. 17020) to amend an act entitled "An act relating to the liability of common carriers by railroad to their employees in certain cases," approved April 22, 1908, and amended April 5, 1910; to the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce.

By Mr. SHARP: Joint resolution (H. J. Res. 273) requesting the President of the United States to invite foreign Governments to participate in the International Congress on Education; to the Committee on Foreign Affairs.

PRIVATE BILLS AND RESOLUTIONS.

Under clause 1 of Rule XXII, private bills and resolutions were introduced and severally referred as follows:

By Mr. ALLEN: A bill (H. R. 17021) granting an increase of pension to Mary Johnson; to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

SENATE.

THURSDAY, June 4, 1914.

The Senate met at 11 o'clock a. m.

The Chaplain, Rev. Forrest J. Prettyman, D. D., offered the following prayer:

Almighty God, we lift our hearts to Thee. As we open our eyes to the light of every new day, with its blessed ministry, with its far-reaching invitations to service, so we open to Thee our hearts at this morning hour. We pray Thee to look upon us with fatherly pity, compassion, and mercy. Minister to us with the riches of Thy grace. Sanctify to us the experiences that we gain day by day, and give to us knowledge out of the history of the past, that we may not only know but comprehend the needs of men and minister the trust Thou hast committed to us in the interest of all. For Christ's sake. Amen.

The Secretary proceeded to read the Journal of yesterday's proceedings, when, on request of Mr. JAMES and by unanimous consent, the further reading was dispensed with and the Journal was approved.

Mr. JAMES. Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary will call the roll.

The Secretary called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Ashurst	Gallinger	O'Gorman	Sterling
Brady	Goff	Page	Stone
Brandegee	Hughes	Perkins	Sutherland
Bryan	James	Pomerene	Thomas
Burton	Jones	Reed	Thompson
Catron	Kenyon	Shafroth	Thornton
Chamberlain	Kern	Sheppard	Tillman
Chilton	Lane	Sherman	Townsend
Clapp	Lippitt	Simmons	Vardaman
Clark, Wyo.	Myers	Smith, Ga.	West
Colt	Nelson	Smith, Mich.	White
Crawford	Newlands	Smith, S. C.	Works
Cummins	Norris	Smoot

Mr. CHILTON. I wish to announce that the Senator from New Mexico [Mr. FALL] is necessarily absent and that he is paired with me.

Mr. WHITE. I wish to announce that my colleague [Mr. BANKHEAD] is unavoidably absent and that he is paired with the Senator from West Virginia [Mr. GOFF]. This announcement I make to continue during the day.

Mr. KERN. I wish to announce the unavoidable absence of the senior Senator from Arkansas [Mr. CLARKE], the junior Senator from Arkansas [Mr. ROBINSON], the Senator from Maine [Mr. JOHNSON], and the Senator from Alabama [Mr. BANKHEAD], all of whom are paired. This announcement may stand for the day.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Fifty-one Senators have answered to their names. A quorum is present.

POST-OFFICE EMPLOYEES.

Mr. STONE. Mr. President, on Monday last the Postmaster General made a reply to Senate resolution 373. The report of the Postmaster General is lying upon the Vice President's table. I ask that it be now taken up, and I wish to move——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection?

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. We can not hear.

Mr. CUMMINS. We have not been able to hear what the request is.

Mr. STONE. I call up the report of the Postmaster General made on Monday last in response to Senate resolution 373, which is lying on the Vice President's table. I wish to move that it be printed as a Senate document, and upon that motion I desire to submit a brief statement.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection? The Chair hears none.

Mr. STONE. I do this for the reason that so much has been said about the subject matter of the resolution it ought not to be passed by by merely printing the reply of the Postmaster General in the RECORD.

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Missouri yield to the Senator from North Carolina?

Mr. STONE. I do.

Mr. SIMMONS. I desire to inquire of the Senator from Missouri if, in case the matter leads to any general discussion, he will ask consent that it be laid aside?

Mr. STONE. Oh, I——

Mr. SIMMONS. I am not at all objecting to the Senator making his statement, but I apprehend that possibly it might precipitate a general discussion which would last for quite a time. I will make a parliamentary inquiry of the Chair. At any time may I interpose an objection and demand the regular order if it leads to a long debate?

The VICE PRESIDENT. There is not any doubt that during the morning business it is the right of a Senator to demand the regular order.

Mr. SMOOT. Then, Mr. President, if that is to be the policy of the Senator from North Carolina, as I understand from his statement he intends to take a Senator off his feet, I think the best course to pursue is to have it understood right now and to object to proceeding with this matter any further.

Mr. SIMMONS. The Senator from Missouri had stated that he wanted to make a brief statement. I did not desire to interfere with his making a brief statement, but if it is going to lead to debate, then I would want to interpose an objection.

Mr. SMOOT. I will say to the Senator now that there will be some debate upon the question, and I would not like the Senator to have a misunderstanding about it.

Mr. STONE. What is it that the Senator from North Carolina is specially interested in at this moment?

Mr. SIMMONS. My desire is that the Senate shall proceed with the consideration of the canal-tolls bill as soon as possible, and I did not wish that to be displaced by a lengthy debate upon the report of the Postmaster General.

Mr. STONE. Mr. President, if I can not proceed at this time, then I will proceed to make the statement I have to make when the first opportunity occurs to-day; so no time will be saved.

Mr. SIMMONS. I am not going to object to the Senator making a statement, but I am going to object if it leads to prolonged debate.

Mr. SMOOT. If that is the case, then, Mr. President, I think the best——

Mr. REED. Mr. President, I should like to ask for some kind of order.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair would be very glad if the Senate would be in such a condition of order that the Chair could hear what a Senator is saying.

Mr. SMOOT. I desire to state that if the position taken by the Senator from North Carolina means that there is to be a statement upon one side and not a statement upon the other, I, too, would prefer that the Senator from Missouri should make his statement when the canal-tolls bill is under consideration, and then we can also, upon that measure, make whatever statements we have to make. Therefore, Mr. President, I object, if that is to be the policy of the Senator from North Carolina.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. I ask for the regular order.

DISPOSITION OF USELESS PAPERS.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The regular order having been called for, the Chair lays before the Senate a communication from the Secretary of War, transmitting reports of the chiefs of the several bureaus and divisions of the War Department giving a list of papers in their respective offices not needed or useful in the transaction of current business and which have no permanent value or historical interest. The communication and accompanying papers will be referred to the Joint Select Committee on the Disposition of Useless Papers in the Executive Departments, and the Chair appoints the Senator from Vermont [Mr. PAGE] and the Senator from Oregon [Mr. LANE] the committee on the part of the Senate. The Secretary will notify the House of Representatives of the appointment thereof.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by J. C. South, its Chief Clerk, announced that the House agrees to the reports of the committees of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the Houses to the following bills:

S. 4167. An act granting pensions and increase of pensions to certain soldiers and sailors of the Regular Army and Navy, and of wars other than the Civil War, and to certain widows and dependent relatives of such soldiers and sailors;

S. 4168. An act granting pensions and increase of pensions to certain soldiers and sailors of the Civil War and certain widows and dependent relatives of such soldiers and sailors;

S. 4260. An act granting pensions and increase of pensions to certain soldiers and sailors of the Regular Army and Navy, and of wars other than the Civil War, and to certain widows and dependent relatives of such soldiers and sailors;

S. 4352. An act granting pensions and increase of pensions to certain soldiers and sailors of the Civil War and certain widows and dependent relatives of such soldiers and sailors;

S. 4353. An act granting pensions and increase of pensions to certain soldiers and sailors of the Regular Army and Navy, and of wars other than the Civil War, and to certain widows and dependent relatives of such soldiers and sailors;

S. 4552. An act granting pensions and increase of pensions to certain soldiers and sailors of the Civil War and certain widows and dependent relatives of such soldiers and sailors; and

S. 4657. An act granting pensions and increase of pensions to certain soldiers and sailors of the Regular Army and Navy, and of wars other than the Civil War, and to certain widows and dependent relatives of such soldiers and sailors.

ENROLLED BILL SIGNED.

The message also announced that the Speaker of the House had signed the enrolled bill (H. R. 15190) to amend section 103 of the act entitled "An act to codify, revise, and amend the laws relating to the judiciary," approved March 3, 1911, as amended by the act of Congress approved March 3, 1913.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

The VICE PRESIDENT presented petitions of sundry citizens of Malvern and West Sunbury, in the State of Pennsylvania; of Fair Haven and Jewett, in the State of Ohio; of Owatonna, Minn.; of Long Branch, N. J.; of Denton, Tex.; of Birmingham, Iowa; of Caledonia, N. Y.; and of Hobart, Okla., praying for the adoption of an amendment to the Constitution to prohibit polygamy, which were referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. CLAPP presented petitions of sundry citizens of Minnesota, praying for the adoption of an amendment to the Constitution to prohibit the manufacture, sale, and importation of intoxicating beverages, which were referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

He also presented memorials of sundry citizens of Minnesota, remonstrating against the adoption of an amendment to the Constitution to prohibit the manufacture, sale, and importation of intoxicating beverages, which were referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. NELSON presented petitions of sundry citizens of Minnesota, praying for the adoption of an amendment to the Constitution to prohibit the manufacture, sale, and importation of intoxicating beverages, which were referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

He also presented memorials of sundry citizens of Minnesota, remonstrating against the adoption of an amendment to the Constitution to prohibit the manufacture, sale, and importation of intoxicating beverages, which were referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. CATRON presented memorials of sundry citizens of New Mexico, remonstrating against the adoption of an amendment to the Constitution to prohibit the manufacture, sale, and importation of intoxicating beverages, which were referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. TILLMAN presented a petition of sundry citizens of Congaree, S. C., praying for national prohibition, which was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. COLT. I present resolutions adopted by the Legislature of Rhode Island, which I ask may be printed in the RECORD and referred to the Committee on Commerce.

There being no objection, the resolutions were referred to the Committee on Commerce and ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

IN THE GENERAL ASSEMBLY OF THE STATE OF RHODE ISLAND.

Joint resolution favoring bill S. 2337, Sixty-third Congress, second session, "To create the coast guard by combining therein the existing Life-Saving Service and Revenue-Cutter Service."

Whereas the maintenance of the highest standard of efficiency in the saving of life and property from shipwreck is of great importance to the commercial and shipping interests of the State of Rhode Island; and

Whereas the United States Senate has passed and there is now pending in the House of Representatives a bill (S. 2337) to create the coast guard by combining therein the existing Life-Saving Service and Revenue-Cutter Service, which will assure greater efficiency by bringing together for more concerted effort in the saving of life and property from shipwreck two important branches of the Government service charged with that duty, one operating from the shore and the other on the seas and the Great Lakes; and

Whereas the existing provisions of law for retirement, longevity pay, and allowances for the officers and men of the Revenue-Cutter Service are by the bill referred to justly extended to the superintendents, keepers, and surfmen in the Life-Saving Service: Therefore be it

Resolved by the General Assembly of the State of Rhode Island, That the Representatives of the State of Rhode Island in the Congress of the United States be, and hereby are, earnestly requested to give their ardent support to bill S. 2337 and to use their efforts to secure its early passage by the House of Representatives of the United States; and be it further

Resolved, That a copy of these resolutions be sent to each Representative in Congress from the State of Rhode Island and to the chairman of the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce of the House of Representatives, and to the General Superintendent United States Life-Saving Service.

STATE OF RHODE ISLAND,
OFFICE OF THE SECRETARY OF STATE,
Providence, May 6, 1914.

I hereby certify the foregoing to be a true copy of the original resolution approved by his excellency the governor on the 6th day of May, A. D. 1914.

In testimony whereof I have hereunto set my hand and affixed the seal of the State aforesaid the date first above written.

[SEAL.] J. FRED PARKER,
Secretary of State.

Mr. COLT presented petitions of sundry citizens of Coventry, Providence, and Newport, all in the State of Rhode Island, praying for national prohibition, which were referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. BRANDEGEE presented resolutions adopted by Local Union No. 137, United Brotherhood of Carpenters and Joiners of America, of Norwich, Conn., favoring the enactment of legislation to make lawful certain agreements between employees and laborers and persons engaged in agriculture or horticulture and to limit the issuing of injunctions in certain cases, which were referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. PAGE presented the memorial of Dexter M. Jones, of Orange County, Vt., remonstrating against the adoption of an amendment to the Constitution to prohibit the manufacture, sale, and importation of intoxicating beverages, which was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. NORRIS presented a petition of sundry citizens of Arnold, Nebr., praying for the adoption of an amendment to the Constitution to prohibit the manufacture, sale, and importation of intoxicating beverages, which was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

He also presented memorials of sundry citizens of Shelby, Nebr., remonstrating against the adoption of an amendment to the Constitution to prohibit the manufacture, sale, and importation of intoxicating beverages, which were referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. SHIVELY presented a petition of the congregation of the Trinity Methodist Episcopal Church, of Elkhart, Ind., praying for the adoption of an amendment to the Constitution to prohibit polygamy, which was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

He also presented a memorial of Captain Kiser Circle, No. 31, Ladies of the Grand Army of the Republic, of West Point, Ind., remonstrating against any change in the American flag, which was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

He also presented a petition of the congregation of the Trinity Methodist Episcopal Church, of Elkhart, Ind., praying for the enactment of legislation to provide Federal censorship of motion pictures, which was referred to the Committee on Education and Labor.

Mr. SMITH of Maryland presented petitions of sundry citizens of Baltimore, Md., praying for national prohibition, which were referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. LODGE presented a petition of Bunker Hill Camp, No. 38, United Spanish War Veterans, of Charlestown, Mass., and a petition of the Board of Selectmen of Adams, Mass., praying for the enactment of legislation to provide pensions for civil-service employees, which were referred to the Committee on Civil Service and Retrenchment.

He also presented a petition of Mount Hermon Commandery, No. 261, Ancient and Illustrious Knights of Malta, of Whitman, Mass., praying for the enactment of legislation to further restrict immigration, which was ordered to lie on the table.

Mr. KERN presented a memorial of the Central Labor Union of Elkhart, Ind., and a memorial of Local Branch, Glass Bottle Blowers' Association, of Terre Haute, Ind., remonstrating against national prohibition, which were referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

He also presented a memorial of Captain Kiser Circle, No. 31, Ladies of the Grand Army of the Republic, of West Point, Ind., remonstrating against any change in the American flag, which was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. JOHNSON presented a memorial of W. S. Heath Circle, No. 13, Ladies of the Grand Army of the Republic, of Waterville, Me., remonstrating against any change being made in the American flag, which was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

He also presented a petition of Welcome Lodge, Independent Order of Good Templars, of Biddeford, Me., and a petition of sundry citizens of South Paris, Me., praying for national prohibition, which were referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. TOWNSEND presented a memorial of the Grand Rapids Association of Commerce, of Michigan, remonstrating against the enactment of legislation to create an interstate trade commission, which was referred to the Committee on Interstate Commerce.

Mr. TOWNSEND. I send to the desk to have read a letter in the form of a petition from the president of the Cadillac Motor Car Co. on the legislation enacted and proposed by this Congress.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and the Secretary will read.

Mr. REED. I move that the communication be referred to the appropriate committee.

Mr. TOWNSEND. I did not understand the motion of the Senator from Missouri.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the reading of the communication?

Mr. REED. I am objecting, and asking that the communication may be referred to the appropriate committee. It has come to this, Mr. President, that a Senator is not allowed to take the floor and utter an observation upon a pertinent matter. If that is to be the rule of the Senate, we had better quit having read desultory communications that are sent in by everybody who is inspired with a notion of taking his pen in hand. If we are going to be so strict, let us apply it all along the line.

Mr. TOWNSEND. I desire to state to the Senator that this is a memorial in the form of a petition directed to me as United States Senator in reference to proposed legislation and with especial attention to industrial measures now pending. I can, of course, read the communication in my own time on an occasion when it will be in order. It is a two-page letter, and I think it is entirely pertinent.

Mr. REED. If the letter is of that character, if it is not one of the kind of letters that have been so frequently read lately criticizing people, and if it is simply a petition to Congress, or a petition to Congress addressed to a Senator, I shall not object to it.

Mr. TOWNSEND. It is no attack upon anybody, but a criticism of the general legislation of this Congress, both Democratic and Republican, in reference to legislation affecting business men.

Mr. REED. I withdraw the objection.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary will read the communication.

The Secretary read as follows:

CADILLAC MOTOR CAR CO.,
Detroit, Mich., June 1, 1914.

Hon. CHARLES E. TOWNSEND,
United States Senate, Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: I am loyal to my country and during a long and busy life have conscientiously done what I could to promote its welfare. Because of that interest I urge you to exert all your influence to bring the present Congress to a speedy close.

Members of Congress and administrative officers are evidently shut-eyed to the conditions which have developed within the country, and are therefore sublimely unconscious of the fact——

Mr. REED. Mr. President, this is not at all the character of communication I was given to understand it was, and I object to the further reading of it.

The VICE PRESIDENT. There is objection to the further reading of the letter.

Mr. TOWNSEND. I will withdraw the letter and present it at the proper time.

WILLIAM CRONLY.

Mr. HUGHES, from the Committee on Pensions, to which was referred the bill (S. 5731) for the relief of William Cronly, asked to be discharged from its further consideration and that it be referred to the Committee on Military Affairs, which was agreed to.

RETURN OF CASES TO COURT OF CLAIMS.

Mr. BRYAN, from the Committee on Claims, reported the following resolution (S. Res. 386), which was considered by unanimous consent and agreed to:

Resolved, That in compliance with the request of the assistant clerk of the Court of Claims, pursuant to an order of the court, under date of June 2, 1914, the Secretary of the Senate be, and he is hereby, instructed to return to the Court of Claims the order of dismissal in the following cases, namely, estate of William A. Watkins, deceased, against the United States, No. 14117; John R. McGinniss against the United States, No. 14105; and the estate of Minor Knowlton, deceased, against the United States, No. 15002, subnumbered 9, and the said court is hereby authorized to proceed in said case as if no return therein had been made to the Senate.

BILLS INTRODUCED.

Bills were introduced, read the first time, and, by unanimous consent, the second time, and referred as follows:

By Mr. JONES:

A bill (S. 5732) repealing a certain section contained in the urgent deficiency act approved December 22, 1911; to the Committee on Claims.

By Mr. CLAPP:

A bill (S. 5733) granting an increase of pension to Thomas W. Eckert; to the Committee on Pensions.

By Mr. THOMPSON:

A bill (S. 5734) to extend the provisions of an act entitled "An act to provide for an enlarged homestead," approved February 19, 1909, to the State of Kansas; to the Committee on Public Lands.

By Mr. WEST (by request):

A bill (S. 5735) for the relief of Annie F. Neil; to the Committee on Claims.

By Mr. SAULSBURY:

A bill (S. 5736) for the relief of the Delaware Transportation Co., of Wilmington, Del.; to the Committee on Claims.

By Mr. SHIVELY:

A bill (S. 5737) granting an increase of pension to Samuel A. Leazer (with accompanying papers); to the Committee on Pensions.

By Mr. KERN:

A bill (S. 5738) for the relief of Simon Bollinger (with accompanying papers); to the Committee on Claims.

AMENDMENT TO SUNDRY CIVIL APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. SMOOT submitted an amendment proposing to appropriate $75,000 for making additional tests of the coals in different parts of the Bering River coal field, Alaska, intended to be proposed by him to the sundry civil appropriation bill, which was referred to the Committee on Appropriations and ordered to be printed.

REMEDIES FOR HOG CHOLERA (S. DOC. NO. 489).

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, I rise for the purpose of asking unanimous consent to have printed as a Senate document an address delivered by the junior Senator from Iowa [Mr. KENYON] on the 26th day of January, 1914, on the subject of the prevention of and providing remedies for hog cholera. In this address the Senator from Iowa incorporated a vast amount of valuable information. There are a great many requests for it, even from the Agricultural Department, but more particularly from the West and the Middle West.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the request of the Senator from Nebraska? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

TRANSPORTATION OF PARCEL-POST PACKAGES.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair lays before the Senate a resolution coming over from a preceding day, which will be stated.

The SECRETARY. Senate resolution 363, providing that the Joint Committee on Postage on Second-Class Mail Matter, and so forth, be requested to advise the Senate when they will be able to report.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I desire that the resolution go over until Saturday next, Mr. President. A report on the subject will probably be presented to-day or to-morrow.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, the resolution will go over until Saturday.

LIABILITY OF COMMON CARRIERS.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair lays before the Senate a resolution coming over from a preceding day, which will be read.

The Secretary read the resolution (S. Res. 384) submitted by Mr. CUMMINS on the 1st instant, as follows:

Resolved, That immediately after the final disposition of the bill now the unfinished business the Senate take up for consideration S. 4522, to amend the interstate-commerce act relating to liability of common carriers.

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President, in accordance with the understanding of yesterday morning, I ask unanimous consent to take up at this time Senate bill 4522, being the bill referred to in the resolution just read.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection?

Mr. KERN. Mr. President, I think we should proceed with the consideration of the Panama Canal tolls bill. I therefore object, and I shall continue to object, to any other business intervening until the Panama Canal tolls bill is disposed of.

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President, I have already said on more than one occasion that I do not desire to delay the disposition of the Panama Canal tolls bill, but it comes on regularly, according to the rules of the Senate, at 1 o'clock. I supposed it was understood yesterday morning that I might have this bill taken up this morning; but the objection being made, I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of Senate bill 4522, notwithstanding the objection.

Mr. KERN. Mr. President, I do not quite understand to what the Senator from Iowa refers in speaking of the understanding of yesterday. There may have been an understanding had in my absence, but——

Mr. CUMMINS. I refer to the statement made by the Senator from Georgia [Mr. SMITH], to which, as I remember, there was no dissent. There was no other understanding than that on yesterday morning he stated, I am sure in the utmost good faith, that if the bill to which I refer went over until this morning there would probably be no objection to its consideration after the disposition of morning business.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. And, Mr. President, I added that I hoped we could agree on the amendments and pass the bill at once. If the Senator from Missouri [Mr. REED] has been able to agree with the Senator from Iowa [Mr. CUMMINS] upon the amendment to the portion of the bill which they had under consideration, I believe we can consider the bill and dispose of it in 15 minutes.

Mr. CUMMINS. I have had some conversation with the Senator from Missouri. I think that we desire to reach the same end, but I have had no conference with him with regard to the form of any proposed amendment which he may desire to offer.

Mr. SHAFROTH. I hope there will be no objection to the consideration of the measure at the present time. I feel that if this measure should become the unfinished business it would supersede notices which have been given, and that, it seems to me, would not be fair. The Senator from Iowa says he thinks he can end the matter in a short time—probably in half an hour. If that is the case, it seems to me we had better let him proceed.

Mr. KERN. Mr. President, of course the Senator from Iowa understands that I am in entire sympathy with the bill——

Mr. CUMMINS. I have no doubt of that.

Mr. KERN. And after reading from the RECORD what occurred yesterday morning, I withdraw the objection I have made.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (S. 4522) to amend an act entitled "An act to amend an act entitled 'An act to regulate commerce,' approved February 4, 1887, and all acts amendatory thereof, and to enlarge the powers of the Interstate Commerce Commission," approved June 29, 1906.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on the amendment offered by the Senator from Georgia [Mr. SMITH] to the amendment of the committee, which the Secretary will state.

The SECRETARY. On page 3, line 12, it is proposed to amend the committee amendment by striking out the word "caused" and inserting the word "transported."

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Mr. President, I desire to ask the Senator from Utah [Mr. SUTHERLAND], who had on yesterday the authorities with him, to call the attention of the Senate to the decision of the Court of Appeals of Georgia, construing the language of the Carmack amendment.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. Mr. President, the amendment offered by the Senator from Georgia, as I suggested when it was offered, would probably have the effect of broadening the liability of the common carrier beyond that imposed by the common law. I have since taken occasion to look at some of the cases on the subject, construing the provisions of the Carmack amendment. There is a case recently decided by the Supreme Court of Georgia, reported in Sixty-fifth Southeastern Reporter, page 308, the case of Louisville & Nashville Railroad Co. against Warfield & Lee, a decision rendered by Judge Powell, who, the Senator from Georgia tells me, is a most excellent lawyer and judge. In commenting upon the language of the Carmack amendment that court says:

> This view does not commend itself to our judgment. As we endeavored to point out in the Crenshaw case, supra, we think that Congress intended to adopt, as against the initial carrier in interstate shipments, the ordinary common-law liability, and to forbid the common-law right to contract for special exemptions therefrom. It is true the statute speaks of losses and damages "caused" by the carrier; but it must be kept in mind that the law was dealing with carriers, a class upon which already rested, by general law, an affirmative duty to receive goods, to transport them safely, and to protect them from outside interference. When used of a person or other subject charged with an affirmative duty of care and diligence, or of good conduct, so to speak, the word "caused" implies not only active misconduct and deeds of commission, but also passive neglect, deeds of omission, and failures to exercise duties faithfully. (Carroll v. Allen, 20 R. I., 144, 37 Atl., 704; Comitez v. Parkerson (C. C.), 50 Fed., 170, 171.) Any injury that a common carrier permits to befall the property while in its custody, otherwise than through the act of God or the public enemy, is in a juridic sense caused by it.

That case seems to be very plainly in point, and it emphatically holds that the provisions of the Carmack amendment simply enforce the common-law liability of the common carrier; that is, that the words "caused by it," used in the act, do not have the effect of in any way limiting the liability of the carrier. I find the same conclusion was arrived at by the Interstate Commerce Commission in a case reported in Thirteenth Interstate Commerce Commission Reports, at page 552. That was a case where the question was precisely presented to the Interstate Commerce Commission. I read from that case:

> In the absence of express stipulation the liability of a common carrier is not limited to loss occasioned by its negligence or other misconduct. The law has cast upon it an extraordinary responsibility; it is to a large extent an insurer of the goods intrusted to it for carriage. The rule, roughly stated, is that a common carrier is liable for all losses not occasioned by the act of God or the public enemy.

I may pause at that point to say that that was the rule of the old common law—the only exceptions were those two, namely, the act of God or the act of the public enemy; but those exceptions have been extended by later decisions, and by a majority of the cases in the United States the law now recognizes three other exceptions in addition to those two. They were all accurately stated by the Senator from Georgia the other day.

> But the carrier's right to relieve itself to some extent from this complete responsibility by special agreement or notice has long been recognized. It may strip itself of its insurer's liability and remain responsible only for its negligence and other misconduct. (York Manufacturing Co. v. I. C. R. R. Co., 3 Wall., 107; N. Y. C. R. R. Co. v. Lockwood, 17 Wall., 357.)
> The law on this point is well settled, and a careful study of the provisions of the Hepburn Act will show that the carrier's right in this respect has not been abrogated. The law reads that the carrier shall be liable "for any loss, damage, or injury to such property caused by it * * * and no contract, receipt, rule, or regulation shall exempt such common carrier, railroad, or transportation company from the liability hereby imposed." The scope of this prohibition must turn largely upon the construction to be placed upon the word "caused." The word "caused" is not susceptible of a narrow interpretation—it is broad enough to comprehend all losses due to the carrier's misconduct, whether positive or negative in character. But it can not possibly be extended to cover losses due to causes beyond the carrier's control. We are necessarily driven to the conclusion, therefore, that the law places no restriction upon the carrier's efforts to exempt itself from liability for losses which occur without fault on its part. We are of opinion, in short, that in the absence of agreement or notice the carrier's liability is governed by the ordinary common-law rule; but that a stipulation for exemption from liability for losses due to causes beyond the carrier's control is open to no legal objection.

The Supreme Court of the United States has had frequent occasion to pass upon the statute; but I shall only stop to call the attention of the Senate to two of those decisions, and that very briefly. In Two hundred and twenty-sixth United States, at page 506, the Supreme Court said:

> What is the liability imposed upon the carrier? It is a liability to any holder of the bill of lading which the primary carrier is required to issue "for any loss, damage, or injury to such property caused by it," or by any connecting carrier to whom the goods are delivered. The suggestion that an absolute liability exists for every loss, damage, or injury, from any and every cause, would be to make such a carrier an absolute insurer and liable for unavoidable loss or damage, though due to uncontrollable forces. That this was the intent of Congress is not conceivable. To give such emphasis to the words "any loss or damage" would be to ignore the qualifying words "caused by it." The liability thus imposed is limited to "any loss, injury, or damage caused by it or a succeeding carrier to whom the property may be delivered."

And the court adds:

> And plainly implies a liability for some default in its common-law duty as a common carrier.

Under that decision the court holds that the words "caused by it" have a useful place in the statute. If they were not there, the plain implication of the decision is that the liability of the carrier would be extended beyond the rule of the common law, and that the effect of those words in the statute is to limit the liability of the carrier to that of the common law.

The danger which would arise from the adoption of the amendment proposed by the Senator from Georgia or that which is now proposed by the Senator from Ohio [Mr. POMERENE] would be that we would leave out of the statute these limiting words, which simply declare the common-law liability of the carrier, and extend the liability of the carrier to the cases which were excepted by the common law; that is, the carrier under that sort of an amendment would be liable for an injury or loss of goods due to the act of God or the act of the public enemy, the seizure of the goods upon process of a court, inherent defects of the goods, and those things which are recognized by the common law as constituting exceptions to its liability.

The only remaining case that I call attention to is a case reported in Two hundred and twenty-seventh United States, at page 672, where the court in a single sentence very tersely determines the meaning of the statute. The court says:

The liability imposed by the statute is the liability imposed by the common law upon a common carrier, and may be limited or qualified by special contract with the shipper, provided the limitation or qualification be just and reasonable and does not exempt from loss or responsibility due to negligence.

The effect of the bill which is now proposed by the Senator from Iowa is to continue the provision of law respecting the common-law liability of the carrier, but to remove the condition which now exists in the statute under which the common carrier is permitted to exempt itself from liability by special agreement.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Mr. President, I still think the language in the original Carmack Act, using the term "caused by it," was perhaps a little unfortunate; that language might have been used which would have prevented any possible doubt that the act intended to continue the common-law liability of the carrier, which is that of insurer, subject to the five limitations that have been stated, beginning with the act of God and the public enemy, which are two of them.

It seems, however, that the language has been construed, and that the courts have declined to narrow the liability on account of this language. With the view that the language is not intended to carry any narrowing effect as to the liability of the common carrier, but that the liability is to remain that of insurer subject to the recognized exceptions—beginning, as I have before stated, with the act of God and the public enemy—I shall not insist upon the amendment.

The amendment I proposed might, in view of the construction of this language, itself give rise to a doubt as to what was intended by the act, and I think probably it is best to leave it just where it is.

The VICE PRESIDENT. As the Chair understands, then, the Senator withdraws his amendment, and the question is upon agreeing to the committee amendment.

Mr. TOWNSEND. Mr. President, what I shall have to submit does not apply particularly to this bill, although it perhaps may be construed as in the general list of measures mentioned by my correspondent. I endeavored to place it before the Senate before the Senator from Iowa called up the pending bill, but objection was made and I am taking advantage of my first opportunity.

I have here a letter which I received this morning from the president of the Cadillac Motor Car Co., of Detroit, which is as follows:

CADILLAC MOTOR CAR CO.,
Detroit, Mich., June 1, 1914.

Hon. CHARLES E. TOWNSEND,
United States Senate, Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: I am loyal to my country, and during a long and busy life have conscientiously done what I could to promote its welfare. Because of that interest I urge you to exert all your influence to bring the present Congress to a speedy close.

Members of Congress and administrative officers are evidently shut-eyed to the conditions which have developed within the country, and are therefore sublimely unconscious of the fact that market values are shrinking, wheels of industry are either slowing down or are silent, millions of loyal and willing employees are out of work, and a sense of instability has palsied all effort, while Congress courts the ranters, the theorists, the agitators, and outrages the tariff, the currency, the interstate commerce, and every established principle upon which the Nation's prosperity has been built.

There is nothing in our country to warrant the present distress but a nation-wide distrust of Washington, and it is time that Congress looked into a mirror to find out who threw the wrench into the machinery. The present erratic smash-and-bust policy has already bred a work poverty which administrative apologists can not conceal and which, if allowed to continue, will remain in history as the outstanding event of this period of American life. If Congress has any more damage to do, let it be done speedily, for not until after this Congress has ceased to exist can a merchant, manufacturer, or employer venture to gather together the things which remain, that upon them he may reconstruct his business.

I do not charge the administration or Congress with being insincere or dishonest, but it is now patent to thinking men that both are terribly mistaken.

Its theories in regard to the questions of tariff, antitrust regulation, capital and labor, and the so-called big business are such that business and our industries are rapidly approaching "closed-shop" conditions, not as advocated by the American Federation of Labor but rather a "closed shop" in the sense of drawing the fires and locking the doors.

Congress has been in continuous session now for more than one and a half years. If Congress continues this orgy of hallucination with its "Pandora box," its unlimited bills for "regulating" business, and its other vicious and iconoclastic legislation, then the "big business" and the "capital and labor" problems will be solved indeed, for there will be no "big business," no available capital.

The shrinkage in railroad, industrial, and real estate securities and values during the past few years shows a greater destruction of all real values than this country suffered at the hands of our destructive Civil War. It is time Washington awoke to the fact that the present Congress and administration are making rapid progress toward classifying themselves in history as the greatest and most potent destructive and ruinous force our country has yet produced.

All the elements of prosperity are with the country except the administration. We should now be on the high wave of prosperity, as we have the glad promise of abundant crops and plenty of money to use in business enterprises. Instead, the baleful influence of Washington like a black pall hangs over the Nation, and capital, always sensitive and conservative, upon which the country depends for initiating business, hides in the cyclone cellar and waits till the breaking of the storm. Having a prospect of a let up in this senseless campaign of destruction, good judgment would prompt the great wheels of commerce and constructive business to go ahead at full speed, instead of having factories running short time, closing down, or failing entirely, as at present. There is something in the situation that certainly calls to memory Nero and his fiddle.

The Nation has had enough of this legislation. It now needs industrial peace and prosperity. Believing that confidence can not be restored until after this Congress has passed into history, I ask you, as one of my Representatives in the National Legislature, to do your utmost to bring about this speedy adjournment, and urging this, I add that I do not think that anything in Washington is of more importance to the country.

Very truly, yours,

HENRY M. LELAND.

I present this letter, Mr. President, because I know from having talked with many business men in the country, without any regard at all to partisan politics, that they feel that Congress is not contributing to the welfare and prosperity of the people at the present time. This Congress has been in session now, as is stated by Mr. Leland, for a year and a half continuously. It has been in forced session. It has been legislating many times against the will of a majority of the Senators themselves.

I concur in the sentiment uttered in this letter to the effect that we should get through with our business and go home. Democrats and the Republicans are alike interested in the return of prosperity. It can not and will not return so long as we are injecting uncertainties into the business conditions of the country. Speculative and illy considered legislation is dangerous to progress and prosperity.

Mr. STONE and Mr. LODGE addressed the Chair.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Missouri.

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President, will the Senator from Missouri yield to me for just a moment?

Mr. STONE. I will.

Mr. CUMMINS. I regret more than I can express that the Senator from Michigan has chosen this opportunity to read the letter which has just been read. If by the reading of the letter he defeats the bill which is now before the Senate, which is intended mainly for the benefit of the farmers of this country in the shipment of their live stock, I believe he will also regret it.

I appeal to Senators who may desire to reply to the Senator from Michigan to take some other opportunity to do so, and allow the Senate to have sufficient time to consider and pass this bill. There will be abundance of time to discuss that matter; but when the hands of the clock reach 1 o'clock, if I have not then succeeded in securing a vote upon this bill I may never succeed in doing so.

Mr. STONE. Mr. President, I think what I rose to lay before the Senate would be very pertinent at this juncture, following the letter read by the Senator from Michigan and the remarks which he made. I fully appreciate, however, the force of what the Senator from Iowa has said, and I shall yield to his suggestion and lay before the Senate at a later hour what I have in my hand.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Are there further amendments to the committee amendment?

Mr. SHEPPARD. Mr. President, I understand the amendment of the Senator from Georgia is not now pending.

The VICE PRESIDENT. It has been withdrawn.

Mr. SHEPPARD. I have a few amendments which I wish to offer to the bill.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Are they amendments to the committee amendment?

Mr. SHEPPARD. They are not.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Then the question is on agreeing to the amendment of the committee.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, I send to the desk an amendment which I ask to have read.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair will first put the question on the committee amendment under consideration.

Mr. REED. But, Mr. President, this directly strikes at the committee amendment.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Yes; but it is the rule of the Senate that the committee has the right to perfect the text before there is a motion to strike out.

Mr. NELSON. Mr. President, will the Senator from Missouri yield to me?

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Missouri yield to the Senator from Minnesota?

Mr. REED. I do.

Mr. NELSON. I take it that the proposition the Chair is submitting is in respect to the amendment commencing on line 11, page 3?

The VICE PRESIDENT. Line 11, page 3. That is before the amendment offered by the Senator from Missouri.

Mr. REED. Oh, I misunderstood——

Mr. NELSON. And the question is on the adoption of that particular amendment? Am I correct?

The VICE PRESIDENT. That is the question—the amendment on page 3, beginning on line 11.

Mr. REED. I understood the Chair to submit the question whether there were any further amendments to any of the committee amendments.

The VICE PRESIDENT. To this particular committee amendment.

Mr. REED. I was in error.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the committee amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Missouri now presents an amendment to the committee amendment, which will be stated.

The SECRETARY. It is proposed to amend by striking out all after the enacting clause down to and including the word "void," on page 3, line 22.

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President, does the Senator from Missouri desire to strike out all after the enacting clause down to and including line 22, on page 3? That strikes out the entire bill.

Mr. REED. No; it does not. It strikes out all of section 1, after the word "void," in line 22, on page 3.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary will again state the amendment.

The SECRETARY. It is proposed to strike out all of section 1, after the word "void," in line 22, on page 3.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, just one word in regard to this proposition.

At the common law a carrier was liable for the loss of goods; but it appears that at common law it might, by a reasonable contract entered into for a sufficient reason, limit its liability. It could not entirely escape liability, but it might limit its liability, provided the limitation was reasonable.

Following along after that doctrine was fully settled in this country, the legislatures of various States passed statutes declaring void all contracts limiting liability, and declaring that the shipper should be liable for the actual value of the goods. When the Carmack amendment was offered, undoubtedly the purpose of the author was to preserve intact those statutory regulations of the States; but the courts have decided in a long line of decisions—that is, the United States Supreme Court—that the effect of the Carmack amendment and the effect of the legislation to which it was amendatory has been for Congress to take over the whole subject of regulating contracts for interstate shipment, and that the old common law is preserved, and that the railroads may limit their liability. Accordingly, the railroads and all transportation companies have adopted once more the plan of absolutely limiting their liability.

The evil of such a system is perfectly manifest. The shipper has no real option when he brings his goods and a contract or a bill of lading is handed to him with an arbitrary value stated in it, and if he protests against the value he must pay an excessively high rate.

Accordingly I think that this legislation ought to stop at the point I have indicated in the bill, for up to that point there is an absolute prohibition against limiting liability. I think we ought to adopt the rule which was in vogue in many of our States for many years and which was nullified by this national legislation, namely, that a carrier must be liable if he loses the goods, and liable not according to an arbitrary value he has set forth in a printed bill of lading or otherwise put into a contract; for instance, in the printed conditions of a railroad ticket limiting liability upon baggage. I think we ought simply to adopt here the rule which was in vogue for many years in many of the States, which absolutely prohibited any limitation and let the carrier when goods are consigned to him take care of them, and if he does not take care of them pay for them.

So the effect of this amendment is to strike out all qualifications and to leave the carrier liable for the damage that he may occasion.

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President, with the general view stated by the Senator from Missouri I concur, but there are instances in which I think it would be right to allow a limitation upon recovery—not a limitation upon liability, but a limitation upon the amount of recovery. The Interstate Commerce Commission possibly has the power to deal with it now. The evil results very largely from the effort upon the part of the railway companies to exact a rate for the full value in cases in which the full value is recoverable; that is unreasonable for the additional risk.

We had this bill before the Interstate Commerce Commission. Two members of the commission appeared before the committee and testified or gave their opinions with a great deal of fullness. If before the railroad company could limit the recovery upon any property carried by it the rate for the increased risk incident to full value had been submitted to the Interstate Commerce Commission and that commission had definitely and affirmatively passed upon the question and decided what rate was fair and reasonable for the recovery of full value, this trouble probably never would have arisen.

It is said by members of the commission, and said by others who appeared before us, that many merchants desire to bring their goods to a common carrier and take a low rate that is based upon the transportation of goods of a low value. That is to say, they would rather take the risk themselves than to pay the higher rate. It was on account of these considerations that the Interstate Commerce Commission urged our committee to except from the prohibition those instances in which the commission had or might thereafter affirmatively, after an investigation, fix a rate based upon the value of the property transported. The truth is that the Interstate Commerce Commission or some member of it wrote the exception which is found in the bill, and we incorporated it because it seemed to be the view of these men, who have had long experience and training in the matter, that there should be that exception.

Now, with regard to the other exception, namely, where the goods are hidden from view simply, I think the Senator from Missouri is entirely right, and so far as I can do so I am willing to accept the amendment which he proposed the other day and which will be found in a memorandum that I handed to the Senator from Minnesota, namely, to eliminate the exception covering goods that are simply hidden from view, leaving the prohibition with just one exception, namely, the instance in which the Interstate Commerce Commission has affirmatively fixed a rate based upon value.

I fear if the amendment now proposed by the Senator from Missouri were to prevail the relief I hope may be afforded to those who are not wholly but most largely interested would not be secured.

Mr. NORRIS. I wish to ask the Senator a question.

Mr. CUMMINS. I yield to the Senator from Nebraska.

Mr. NORRIS. Bearing out the Senator's suggestion, I wish to ask him for his opinion in regard to an amendment that it seems to me would go a long way toward bringing about the settlement of the dispute along the lines suggested. On page 4, in line 1, if the word "or" were stricken out and the word "and" inserted in lieu of it, would not that reach the difficulty?

Mr. CUMMINS. No; not entirely. That would limit the power of the Interstate Commerce Commission to make a rate dependent on value unless the rate is upon an article hidden from view.

Mr. NORRIS. Why should it not be so limited?

Mr. CUMMINS. For the reason I tried to state yesterday. As an illustration—and this illustration was given to us during the hearing—a man desires to ship a very valuable horse, one that is worth $25,000. The rate that would be put upon that horse by the railroad company if the railroad company were to assume the full risk and be liable for full value would be prohibitive. But I think it is entirely fair that the Interstate Commerce Commission shall in such an instance be permitted to say what the rate shall be upon various values which may be agreed upon between the shipper and the railroad company.

Mr. NORRIS. Does the Senator think that if the change was made as suggested by me the Interstate Commerce Commission would be prohibited from fixing a different rate?

Mr. CUMMINS. What I propose, and I thought it was just what the Senator from Missouri originally suggested, is to change the exception so that it would read in this way:

Provided, however, That, except as to ordinary live stock, if with respect to such property so offered and received for transportation, express authorization has been heretofore granted or shall be hereafter granted by the Interstate Commerce Commission for the establishment and maintenance of rates for the transportation thereof, dependent upon the value of the property shipped, and so forth.

Then we have just one exception, namely, the intervention of the affirmative power of the Interstate Commerce Commission affixing what it would believe to be a reasonable rate for a certain value, and from that power is excepted ordinary live stock.

I hope, therefore, just for the sake of safety and the success of the bill, that the amendment proposed by the Senator from Missouri will not be adopted.

Mr. REED. The Senator said he thought the amendment I offered would imperil the bill. I take it he does not mean to say that the amendment I offered would not carry out the ideas he has, but he means to say it would imperil the passage of the bill.

Mr. CUMMINS. That is all.

Mr. REED. If it is passed in the form I propose and the bill should become a law, it would constitute an absolute protection to the shippers.

Mr. CUMMINS. Undoubtedly. I do not mean to say that it would render the bill ineffective, but I fear that with the view many people entertain with regard to the subject, and especially in consideration of the position taken by the Interstate Commerce Commission, it would be almost impossible to secure the passage of the bill in the House.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, of course I do not want to criticize the Interstate Commerce Commission, because that commission has been wearing a halo so long that it would be an act of violence to in any manner disturb it; but I am unwilling to concede to the Interstate Commerce Commission the right to control legislation in the Congress of the United States. I am unwilling to concede to it a veto power upon the action which the Senate may take or which the House of Representatives may see fit to take. If there is any objection to the amendment which I have offered which goes to its merits, if it be not sound, and if those considerations are offered here in the Senate, I am very sure that they will control the action of the Senate. They will control my action, at least, if I am capable of understanding their import.

But I believe two propositions are indisputable. One is that it is the business of the Interstate Commerce Commission to enforce the laws of Congress coming within the purview of its authority, and the other is that the Congress of the United States ought to enact legislation to the best of its ability, regardless of departmental interference or control, and I am getting to the opinion that we might extend that declaration of independence beyond mere departments.

I think this amendment will cut out the possibility of the legalizing in part of a wrong which has for many years existed. Do not understand me as criticizing the Senator from Iowa, because the Senator from Iowa is endeavoring to give us a partial remedy. In so far as the bill goes as presented it is an advantage. I think, however, we are in a position to get a complete remedy and at the same time to be just to the shippers.

The difficulty when we come to consider a question of this kind is that we are likely to overlook the hardships of conditions. It is true if a man wanted to consign to the care of another man his goods and if the price he charged for caring for the goods was dependent upon the value of the goods it might be entirely reasonable for these two parties to contract with reference to the value and to agree upon what the value should be, to stipulate, if you please, for liquidated damages; and that is the reason which is constantly advanced by these transportation companies. But while that rule is perfectly fair between individuals it can become the instrumentality of great oppression and wrong when it is employed by the great transportation companies of the country.

To illustrate, these contracts are printed somewhere upon a bill of lading or upon a telegraph blank. A man goes to an office and wants to send a telegram and he writes the telegram. There is not one out of a thousand people who ever read the conditions printed upon the telegraph blank, but there printed, practically hidden away from view, are conditions which cut off or attempt to cut off the right of recovery or to limit it to the mere value paid for transporting the message. The sender of the message has no option. He must send his message; he must send it in haste; he has no time to stop and make special contracts and agreements or arrangements. The result is he is practically forced to accept the blank that is tendered him and to take it with the conditions.

That serves to illustrate a similar condition in shipments. A man takes his goods to a depot. They are exposed to view. The agent sees them. The agent hands him a blank in which there is printed "These goods are valued at $50 unless it is expressly stipulated otherwise." That is made out in the form of a bill of lading and handed to him. It is not read by the shipper, but when he seeks to recover he finds that the railroad company by virtue of having handed him that blank which somewhere or other he signed, not intending to sign the contract or the blank or the printed matter but simply to sign his name as a shipper of goods, that because of the construction given the Carmack Act the contract of the railroad company has been vitalized and every State statute limiting this power of corporations has been stricken down.

I repeat that until the Supreme Court annulled the statutes of these States by declaring that the Carmack amendment had cut the life out of the statutes, in State after State statutes existed just as this statute will read if we here enact it. In other words, when a railroad company takes your goods or mine, it must respond for their value or it must deliver the goods. It can not put a limit upon the amount you can recover. I have sent for the decision, which I have not yet read, a decision i. which, I understand, the Supreme Court has held that a limitation of $100 upon recovery for a package lost will be enforced, although the solitary contract, if you can call it a contract, was some printed matter upon the passenger's ticket which he never read and was never called upon in the exercise of ordinary diligence and care to read. I have not read that opinion, and I therefore do not want to be understood as stating absolutely that that is its import; but my information is to that effect.

Mr. President, I do not care whether the Interstate Commerce Commission likes it or dislikes it; I do not care whether the Interstate Commerce Commission are opposed to or in favor of a remedial statute such as this will be if the amendment I offer prevails. I am not fearful, if the Senate passes this bill, that the Interstate Commerce Commission can go into the other branch of Congress and there defeat it. If the Interstate Commerce Commission is engaged in any such business as that, I want to know it; and when I become convinced that it is engaged in such business as that, I shall be ready to vote for its dissolution.

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President, I shall not prolong the debate a moment, for I am very anxious to get through with the consideration of this bill by 1 o'clock; but I desire to suggest to the Senator from Missouri that he has overlooked the fact that the last proviso in section 1 of the bill is a part of the present law, and a very essential part of the present law. I am sure that he does not desire to strike that out.

Mr. REED. Well, Mr. President, if that last proviso was not written anywhere, it would exist as a matter of law. It is not necessary to specify that you are reserving your legal rights. The proviso referred to by the Senator from Iowa reads:

Provided further, That nothing in this section shall deprive any holder of such receipt or bill of lading of any remedy or right of action which he has under the existing law.

There is nothing in the section that purports to deprive him of that, and it is not necessary to recite a right which he has, and which has not been taken away, unless there is something calculated to give that impression.

Mr. CUMMINS. But, Mr. President, it is in the present law; and if we strike it out the courts might give some significance to our action in so doing. It is perfectly easy to limit the amendment.

Mr. REED. Well, Mr. President, out of consideration for the views of the Senator from Iowa—and I think when he has a doubt I ought also to have one in regard to a matter of this kind—I will, with the permission of the Senate, modify my amendment.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair has uniformly held that the committee reporting a bill have the right to perfect it before a motion to strike out is made; and the Chair is impressed with the view that before putting the question on the amendment proposed by the Senator from Missouri [Mr. REED], the amendment proposed by the committee at the top of page 4 should first be put to the Senate.

Mr. REED. Well, Mr. President, nobody has raised that point.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair was about to put the question on the committee amendment, so that the amendment of the Senator from Missouri would then be in order.

Mr. REED. If this amendment is defeated, I then wish to offer an amendment perfecting and changing the language of the committee amendment; that is the difficulty. I trust, as the time is short and we desire to get to a vote, that that may be permitted. Since this matter has been discussed and a vote taken upon it, I have modified my amendment so as to leave in the bill the last proviso just referred to.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The amendment as proposed to be modified by the Senator from Missouri will be stated.

The SECRETARY. In section 1, page 3, line 22, after the word "void," it is proposed to strike out the words down to and including the word "stated," on page 4, line 12.

Mr. CRAWFORD. Mr. President, I merely wish to say that, while I shall not vote for the amendment offered by the Senator from Missouri [Mr. REED] because the Senator from Iowa [Mr.

CUMMINS] feels that it makes such a change in the bill that it might endanger its passage, if it were not for that fact I would support the amendment, because it seems to me we are giving too much power to the Interstate Commerce Commission in regulating traffic.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair will put the question on the amendment of the Senator from Missouri. [Putting the question.] The noes seem to have it.

Mr. REED. I ask for a roll call on the amendment.

The yeas and nays were ordered, and the Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. GOFF (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the senior Senator from Alabama [Mr. BANKHEAD], and therefore withhold my vote.

Mr. PERKINS (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the junior Senator from North Carolina [Mr. OVERMAN]. In his absence from the Chamber I withhold my vote.

Mr. SIMMONS (when his name was called). I wish to inquire if the junior Senator from Minnesota [Mr. CLAPP] has voted?

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair is informed that he has not.

Mr. SIMMONS. I am paired with that Senator; but I transfer that pair to the Senator from Tennessee [Mr. SHIELDS] and vote "nay."

Mr. SUTHERLAND (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. CLARKE], who is absent, and on that account I withhold my vote.

Mr. THOMAS (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the senior Senator from New York [Mr. ROOT], and therefore withhold my vote.

Mr. WARREN (when his name was called). I have a pair with the Senator from Florida [Mr. FLETCHER], and therefore withhold my vote.

Mr. SMITH of Arizona (when the name of Mr. WILLIAMS was called). The Senator from Mississippi [Mr. WILLIAMS] is necessarily absent. He is paired with the Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. PENROSE].

The roll call was concluded.

Mr. JAMES. I transfer the pair I have with the junior Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. WEEKS] to the junior Senator from Arkansas [Mr. ROBINSON] and vote. I vote "yea."

Mr. THOMAS. I transfer my pair with the senior Senator from New York [Mr. ROOT] to the senior Senator from Indiana [Mr. SHIVELY] and vote "yea."

Mr. CHILTON. I have a pair with the Senator from New Mexico [Mr. FALL], which I transfer to the Senator from Ohio [Mr. POMERENE] and vote. I vote "yea."

Mr. GALLINGER. I desire to announce the pair between the junior Senator from Maine [Mr. BURLEIGH] and the junior Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. HOLLIS].

I also desire to announce the pair between the Senator from Washington [Mr. JONES] and the Senator from New Jersey [Mr. MARTINE].

Mr. SUTHERLAND. I transfer my pair with the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. CLARKE] to the Senator from Illinois [Mr. SHERMAN] and vote "nay."

Mr. SWANSON. I desire to announce the pair of the Senator from Maryland [Mr. SMITH] with the Senator from Vermont [Mr. DILLINGHAM]. Both Senators are unavoidably detained from the Senate.

The result was announced—yeas 26, nays 38, as follows:

YEAS—26.

Ashurst	Lewis	Sheppard	Tillman
Borah	Martin, Va.	Smith, Ga.	Vardaman
Chilton	Norris	Smith, S. C.	Walsh

So Mr. REED's amendment to the amendment of the committee was rejected.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question recurs on agreeing to the amendment proposed by the committee.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, it may be of interest to Senators who have voted on this amendment to know this fact: The Senator from Iowa stated that the amendment was entirely satisfactory to him and that it would meet the objects he had in view, but that he would vote against it because he feared the bill could not become a law if the amendment were adopted. That, of course, must have meant opposition in the other branch of Congress.

Now, it may throw some light upon the future amendments to know that in the other body where the opposition was deemed possible the committee has already reported the proposition favorably just as it would have stood if my amendment had been adopted a few minutes ago instead of being turned down; so I do not think there is any danger of defeat there. At least, the surface indications do not point in that direction.

Mr. President, I sought to have adopted an amendment which would make the carriers of this country absolutely liable for goods they lost and would take away from them the right of arbitrarily limiting the value of goods. That amendment has failed. I now send to the desk an amendment which I ask to have read.

Mr. KENYON. Mr. President, may I ask the Senator a question?

Mr. REED. Certainly.

Mr. KENYON. I should like to ask the Senator if he had this information as to the action of the House committee before the vote was taken?

Mr. REED. I did not. A copy of the bill was handed to me on the floor of the Senate since the vote was taken.

Mr. KENYON. My vote was cast on the statement that had been made. I favored the amendment of the Senator from Missouri, but I felt that it might imperil the bill.

Mr. REED. Perhaps the Senator would feel like moving to reconsider the vote. I should thank him if he would. I can not move it myself.

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President, I think we first ought to inquire into the accuracy of the statement. I do not so understand the bill, if we may be permitted to refer to it, which has been reported in the House.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, I was handed this bill by a Senator, with the statement that the bill had been reported favorably. I have not the report, but I am relying entirely upon the statement of one of our Senators, who I know spoke in the best of faith.

Mr. CUMMINS. May I ask the Senator from Missouri whether it is the same bill, and whether he has examined it in order to discover whether what he stated a few moments ago is accurate, namely, that the very thing that we have refused to do has been done or reported favorably in the House? I think, I am sure, that no such bill has been reported in the House. A bill has been reported there, but, in my opinion, it does not afford anything like the remedy that this bill will afford if it is passed as reported by the committee.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, the bill which was handed to me, and which my informant stated had been favorably reported, contains the language I am about to read, and which will be found on page 15. If the Senators will follow the language of the bill we are now considering, which was offered by the Senator from Iowa, I think they will find the language identical:

That any common carrier, railroad, or transportation company receiving property for transportation from a point in one State to a point in another State shall issue a receipt or bill of lading therefor, and shall be liable to the lawful holder thereof for any loss, damage, or injury to such property caused by it or by any common carrier, railroad, or transportation company to which such property may be delivered, or over whose line or lines such property may pass, and no contract, receipt, rule, or regulation shall exempt such common carrier, railroad, or transportation company from the liability hereby imposed: Provided, That nothing in this section shall deprive any holder of such receipt or bill of lading of any remedy or right of action which he has under existing law.

That the common carrier, railroad, or transportation company issuing such receipt or bill of lading shall be entitled to recover from the common carrier, railroad, or transportation company on whose line the loss, damage, or injury shall have been sustained the amount of such loss, damage, or injury as it may be required to pay to the owners of such property, as may be evidenced by any receipt, judgment, or transcript thereof.

The bill which I hold in my hand was referred on May 15 to the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce and ordered to be printed. On May 16 it was committed to the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union and ordered to be printed. I know nothing about whether it has been favorably reported except the statement of the Senator to which I have referred, and which I know was made in good faith.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. Mr. President, a point of order.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator will state his point of order.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. It seems to me this entire discussion with reference to what has occurred in the other House is entirely out of order. The general rule is stated in Jefferson's Manual, page 96:

It is a breach of order in debate to notice what has been said on the same subject in the other House, or the particular votes or majorities on it there, because the opinion of each House should be left to its own independency, not to be influenced by the proceedings of the other; and the quoting them might beget reflections leading to a misunderstanding between the two Houses.

I had always understood it to be a general parliamentary rule, universally observed in this body, that the proceedings of the other House were not to be referred to in the way they have been referred to here in an attempt to influence the action of the Senate, because the action of the Senate and the action of the House are to be entirely independent of one another. I think, under that point of order, this discussion is out of order.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair is of the opinion that it is the unwritten law of the Senate that any reference to what has been done in the House of Representatives for the purpose of controlling the action of the Senate is out of order; but the Chair remembers that the statements made this morning were called out entirely by the statement that it was clear that the other House would not concur in the action of the Senate. The Chair does not believe the statements were made with the intention of influencing the conduct of the Senate.

The question is on agreeing to the amendment proposed by the Senator from Missouri, which the Secretary will state.

The SECRETARY. On page 3, beginning on line 22, after the word "void," it is proposed to strike out all down to and including the word "stated," on page 4, line 12, and in lieu thereof to insert:

Provided, however, That if the goods are hidden from view by wrapping, boxing, or other means, and the carrier is not notified as to the character of the goods, the carrier may require the shipper to specifically state in writing the value of the goods, and the carrier shall not be liable beyond the amount so specifically stated, in which case the Interstate Commerce Commission may establish and maintain rates for transportation dependent upon the value of the property shipped as specifically stated in writing by the shipper. Such rates shall be published as are other rate schedules.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the Senator from Missouri.

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President, I do not believe the amendment is as good as the bill reported by the committee, changed as we have several times suggested, but I am so desirous of having a vote on the bill before 1 o'clock that I do not intend to oppose the amendment.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the committee amendment, known as section 2, which will be stated.

The SECRETARY. It is proposed to add at the end of the bill a new section, as follows:

SEC. 2. That this act shall take effect and be in force from 90 days after its passage.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. SHEPPARD. Mr. President, I will state that the amendments I send to the desk are acceptable to the Senator from Iowa.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The amendments proposed by the Senator from Texas will be stated.

The SECRETARY. On page 2, line 20, after the word "State," where it first appears in the line, it is proposed to insert the words "or Territory or the District of Columbia."

The amendment was agreed to.

The SECRETARY. After the word "State," where it occurs the second time in line 20, it is proposed to insert a comma and the words "Territory, District of Columbia, or a foreign country."

The amendment was agreed to.

The SECRETARY. One page 3, line 1, it is proposed to strike out the word "or" and insert, after the word "regulation," the words "or other limitation of any character whatsoever."

Mr. CUMMINS. The committee has no objection to that.

The amendment was agreed to.

The SECRETARY. On page 3, line 8——

The VICE PRESIDENT. The next amendment is in a committee amendment which has been already agreed to. Is there any objection to reconsidering the committee amendment? The Chair hears none, and the vote whereby the committee amendment was adopted is reconsidered.

The SECRETARY. On page 3, line 8, in the committee amendment, after the words "District of Columbia," it is proposed to insert the words "or to a foreign country."

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

The amendment as amended was agreed to.

The SECRETARY. On page 3, line 10, after the words "bill of lading," it is proposed to insert the words "or to any party entitled to recover thereon, whether such receipt or bill of lading has been issued or not."

The amendment was agreed to.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair will say to the Senator from Texas that the next amendment would come within the amendment of the Senator from Missouri [Mr. REED], which has been agreed to, and that part of the bill has been stricken out.

Mr. LODGE. It is not in order at this time.

Mr. CUMMINS. The amendment just suggested becomes unnecessary, and indeed impossible, in view of the action of the Senate in adopting the amendment of the Senator from Missouri.

Mr. SHEPPARD. I then withdraw the amendment.

The SECRETARY. On page 4, at the end of line 15, it is proposed to insert the following words:

Provided further, That it shall be unlawful for any common carrier to provide by rule, contract, regulation, or otherwise a shorter period for giving notice of claims than 90 days, and for the filing of claims for a shorter period than four months, and for the institution of suits than two years: Provided, however, That if the loss, damage, or injury complained of was due to delay or damage while being loaded or unloaded, or damaged in transit by carelessness or negligence, then no notice of claim nor filing of claim shall be required as a condition precedent to recovery.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendments were concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

Mr. CUMMINS. I desire to withdraw the resolution submitted by me on this subject.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, the resolution is withdrawn. Morning business is closed, and the calendar under Rule VIII is in order.

THE CALENDAR.

The first business on the calendar was the bill (S. 1240) to establish the legislative reference bureau of the Library of Congress.

Mr. LODGE. I ask that the bill may be passed over.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The bill will be passed over.

Mr. O'GORMAN obtained the floor.

THE INCOME TAX.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Mr. President, the Senator from New York has consented to yield to me for a moment.

A few days ago I introduced a joint resolution relieving persons subject to the income tax from the penalties incident to failure to make their returns before the 1st of March. I suppose every Senator has heard from many of his constituents, who, on account of the fact that it was a new law and they did not understand it, have made a mistake and failed to get in their returns. The statute is absolutely compulsory. The department would relieve them from the penalty in most of the instances, but it has not the authority to do so.

I have introduced a joint resolution, which was referred to the Finance Committee, simply relieving from the penalty those who made their returns by the 1st of June and who did not designedly disregard the law. Every member of the Committee on Finance who has considered the joint resolution has agreed to it and approved it; and I think we might well pass it and send it right over to the House.

Mr. GALLINGER. Does it specify the length of time they may have?

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Up to the 1st of June. They must have made their returns by the 1st day of this month.

Mr. GALLINGER. But how much longer does it give them?

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. It gives them no longer time. Nearly all of them have made their returns, but they did not get them in by the 1st of March. I learned from the department that there were hundreds of returns that came in a few days after the 1st of March, by one little accident or another, and I have simply named the 1st of June.

Mr. GALLINGER. That is all right.

Mr. TOWNSEND. Mr. President, may I ask the Senator if this would allow the Commissioner of Internal Revenue or the Government to refund the fines that have been paid? I am informed that a number of them have been paid.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Fines that have already been paid?

Mr. TOWNSEND. That have already been paid. It ought to cover those cases.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I think so, too.

Mr. TOWNSEND. I should like to have it surely cover all those cases. I think the joint resolution ought to pass at once, but——

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I think that amendment can be put on it very easily. It never occurred to me that any of them had been already paid, because they had until the last of June to make the payment.

Mr. O'GORMAN. Mr. President, I think the joint resolution referred to by the Senator from Georgia will encounter no obstruction or opposition; but, in my judgment, it ought to be amended in the manner indicated by the Senator from Michigan [Mr. TOWNSEND]. If such an amendment is put on, the joint resolution can be taken up at any time during the afternoon, and it will take only a moment to put it through. Meanwhile I ask that the tolls bill may be laid before the Senate.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I will withdraw the joint resolution for the present and prepare a short amendment to that effect, and ask unanimous consent a little later on to take it up and pass it this afternoon.

LAND IN HAMPDEN COUNTY, MASS.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, I will ask the Senator from New York to withhold his motion for just a moment. I am very anxious to have passed a bill that was reported yesterday from the Committee on Public Lands, simply to grant a quitclaim deed to some land that was deeded to the Government in 1825.

Mr. O'GORMAN. I withhold my motion temporarily.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there any objection to the consideration of the bill referred to by the Senator from Massachusetts? The Chair hears none.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill (H. R. 3334) authorizing the quitclaiming of the interest of the United States in certain land situated in Hampden County, Mass., which was read as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of War is hereby authorized and directed, by quitclaim deed for and on behalf of the United States, to convey to John D. McKnight and William H. McKnight, or their heirs and assigns forever, all right, title, and interest it may have in and to all of that plat or parcel of ground described as containing 40 rods of land, together with a right of way "situated in Springfield in Hatch's pasture, so called, near Garden Brook," Hampden County, Mass., and acquired by the United States through the deed of Solomon Hatch, dated September 14, 1825, recorded September 15, 1825, in book 75, at page 186, of the records of Hampden County.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

PANAMA CANAL TOLLS.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The hour of 1 o'clock having arrived, the Chair lays before the Senate the unfinished business, which is House bill 14385.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. 14385) to amend section 5 of an act to provide for the opening, maintenance, protection, and operation of the Panama Canal and the sanitation of the Canal Zone, approved August 24, 1912.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on the amendment offered by the committee.

Mr. NORRIS. To that amendment I offer the following substitute.

The VICE PRESIDENT. It will be read.

The SECRETARY. As a substitute for the amendment of the committee, at the end of the bill, insert the following proviso:

Provided, That the passage of this act shall not be construed as a surrender of the right claimed by the United States Government to regulate the traffic passing through the Panama Canal by giving to vessels engaged in the coastwise trade of the United States and other vessels of the United States and its citizens either partial or total exemption from the payment of tolls when passing through said canal.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, I have no desire to discuss this particular question now. I understand that the Senator from Iowa [Mr. CUMMINS] wants to proceed.

Mr. CUMMINS. I had it in my mind to make some observations upon this subject, but I want to submit them in connection with the amendment which I have offered to the bill. However, I am rather inclined to prefer to say what I have to say, at least upon one phase of the subject, before a vote is taken upon the substitute offered by the Senator from Nebraska.

Mr. NORRIS. I anticipated, I will say, that there are probably several other Senators who will want to debate this amendment. I have no desire, of course, to crowd it to a vote now, although I am ready to discuss it. Before we vote upon it I expect to discuss it at sufficient length to make its meaning and application plain.

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President, although I shall defer the consideration of the treaty generally until the amendment I have proposed is before the Senate, there is a preliminary matter upon which I desire to say a few words.

I was impressed yesterday with a statement in the argument of the Senator from Idaho [Mr. BORAH], and it is his address which leads me to the suggestions I am about to make. He said that there are Senators here who, contrary to the general rule which prevails everywhere, and which has prevailed from time immemorial, intend to solve any doubt with regard to the interpretation of the treaty against their own country. I do not intend to reiterate what he said so eloquently and so forcibly, but I do desire to say that his statement comprised but half the truth.

It seems that there are Senators and there are persons in the United States who are determined to give the treaty an interpretation vastly more unfavorable to the United States than has ever been suggested directly or indirectly by Great Britain. It is an amazing, extraordinary spectacle now presented not only to the American people, but to the people of the whole world. We are about to give to Great Britain rights that she does not claim under this treaty. We are about to surrender to her privileges upon which she has never insisted. We are about to abandon a portion of the sovereignty of the United States that has never been challenged by any nation in so far as I know.

This is an extraordinary, unusual, unprecedented position upon the part of some of our own people, and I am not a partisan about this, because these people, in so far as they are Senators, sit on this side of the Chamber as well as upon that side, and in so far as they are not within these walls are indiscriminately Republicans and Democrats.

I must not be understood as trying to awaken any party feeling. The consideration of this subject ought to be lifted high and far above any partisan rancor or partisan differences of opinion. In view of the fact that the debate is practically ended and everything that can be said upon either side has been said, I am about to inquire with a little care and somewhat analytically just what Great Britain has demanded of the United States. I am about to inquire into her construction of the treaty and the reasons that she gives for the conclusions to which she has come.

I am not one of the Senators or persons to whom the distinguished Senator from New York [Mr. ROOT] referred the other day when he implied that there were men who believed that the attitude of Great Britain was insolent or unfriendly. I rather admire the attitude of Great Britain. Great Britain is a strong, resolute nation. She is now and she always has been. She takes all that she can and she keeps all she takes. Her attitude here in insisting upon her rights as she views them arouses nothing in my mind but admiration and respect.

The only regret I have is that the people of this country are not as resolute in defending their privileges and their rights and their interests as Great Britain is determined in asserting and defending that construction of the treaty which she believes to be essential to the welfare of the British commerce.

Great Britain deliberately and designedly created the situation out of which grew the Clayton-Bulwer treaty. Finding the United States in a position of weakness she so manipulated the affairs of Central America, or her relation to the affairs of Central America, that it became apparently wise to enter into the obligations of this treaty.

I do not in the least think that Great Britain ever intended to cooperate in the building of a canal through Central America or over the territory of Panama. I do not believe that she intended more than to put the United States in such a position that when a canal should be built we must ask her consent to carry on the enterprise. It was one of the farsighted acts of the great British statesmen, and although they probably did not see and could not have seen the conditions of 1901, the foresight of Great Britain did result in precisely the thing which it was hoped would come about.

Not more than five or six years after Great Britain had thus surrounded the United States with this mesh of obligation she took her position toward the Suez Canal. What was it? It was an attitude of inflexible opposition, and for 10 years the influence of Great Britain prevented even the beginning of that mighty work.

Why did Great Britain interpose every obstacle that the wit of man could conceive and her vast influence with the nations of Europe could create in opposition to the building of the Suez Canal? Because she wanted no waterway between Europe and the British possessions in the East Indies. But finally her opposition was overcome, and what then resulted? Before the canal was fairly opened she began that series of maneuvers which resulted in not only the ownership of the majority or a controlling interest in the stock of the maritime canal built in Egypt, but resulted in such a domination and control of Egypt herself that the canal became practically an English canal, as it is to this day.

I shall not attempt to weigh the moral quality of all that England has done in order to strengthen her position in the world and to promote the welfare of her commerce, but I will not be heard to criticize her for the energetic and persistent efforts she has always made to lift up and build up what she believes to be the interests of her own people.

It seems to me, Mr. President, that dealing with such a nation, keenly alive to its own welfare, keenly intelligent in perceiving every right or every shadow of right she has, Americans might well be content in confining their gratuities and their magnanimity within the limits of her demands. And yet what we are asked to do passes far beyond the English demand. We have voiced in this country an interpretation of the treaty that never came from English lips, and we are, I fear, about to surrender to her a most vital portion of our sovereignty that she has never impeached.

It is worth while, in view of that startling situation, to inquire with some particularity after this long debate just what England does ask of the United States. Even if we are to yield to her—that is, if we are to comply with that decent regard for the opinions of mankind which has been so often mentioned in the debate—if in order to hold our place in the family of nations and hold the respect of people of honor the world over we are to do what seems to be necessary in order to fully satisfy the whole demand of the remainder of the world, it is worth while to know and to have clearly in mind what that demand is.

I do not pretend to have discovered any new interpretation of this history or any new chapter in this history, but I think the attitude of England has been somewhat obscured in this long debate, and therefore I intend to call the attention of the Senate to it.

In 1912 the canal act was under consideration. It had been somewhat debated and the views of various Members of Congress had been stated with some fullness and clearness. So on the 8th day of July, 1912, Mr. Innes, then the representative of the British Government in Washington, communicated the views of his Government to our Secretary of State. I desire to read briefly from this communication, having in view what I have just stated, my desire to ascertain just what England wants the United States to do, or, rather, just what she insists the United States should do:

The proposals—

That is, the proposals of the bill that was then pending in Congress—may be summed up as follows:

(1) To exempt all American shipping from the tolls.
(2) To refund to all American ships the tolls which they may have paid.

Neither of these proposals was contained in the bill as it finally passed.

(3) To exempt American ships engaged in the coastwise trade; (4) to repay the tolls to American ships engaged in the coastwise trade.

Of these proposals the bill finally adopted but one, namely, the exemption of American ships engaged in the coastwise trade. Mr. Innes says:

The proposal to exempt all American shipping from the payment of the tolls would, in the opinion of His Majesty's Government, involve an infraction of the treaty; nor is there, in their opinion, any difference in principle between charging tolls only to refund them and remitting tolls altogether.

There seems to have been some change in the English view with regard to that matter, and especially is there an emphatic insistence in this Chamber that while it would be dishonorable and a plain, palpable violation of our obligation to exempt coastwise shipping from tolls, it would be entirely consistent with the highest standards of honor and be entirely in harmony with the provisions of the treaty to impose a charge upon coastwise shipping as it entered the harbor of Colon and to repay to that shipping the charges so imposed as the vessel emerged from the harbor at Balboa. That is a matter for future consideration.

The result is the same in either case, and the adoption of the alternative method of refunding the tolls in preference to that of remitting them, while perhaps complying with the letter of the treaty, would still contravene its spirit.

We have not done that as yet.

It has been argued that a refund of the tolls would merely be equivalent to a subsidy and that there is nothing in the Hay-Pauncefote treaty which limits the right of the United States to subsidize its shipping. It is true that there is nothing in that treaty to prevent the United States from subsidizing its shipping, and if it granted a subsidy His Majesty's Government could not be in a position to complain. But there is a great distinction between a general subsidy, either to shipping at large or to shipping engaged in any given trade, and a subsidy calculated particularly with reference to the amount of user of the canal by the subsidized lines or vessels. If such a subsidy were granted it would not, in the opinion of His Majesty's Government, be in accordance with the obligations of the treaty.

We provided for no subsidy, save by way of exemption, and therefore to the point I have now gone there is nothing in the protest presented by Mr. Innes that is in conflict with the bill as we actually passed it. He now proceeds:

As to the proposal that exemption shall be given to vessels engaged in the coastwise trade, a more difficult question arises. If the trade should be so regulated as to make it certain that only bona fide coastwise traffic which is reserved for United States vessels would be benefited by this exemption, it may be that no objection could be taken. But it appears to my Government—

Mark now the real protest, the real objection—

But it appears to my Government that it would be impossible to frame regulations which would prevent the exemption from resulting, in fact, in a preference to United States shipping, and consequently in an infraction of the treaty.

I have now read all that part of the protest which relates to the subject.

Mr. President, I should like some Senator more potential, more eloquent, more powerful than I am to tell the people of the United States just what England objects to in this letter; that is, just what we have done that is in conflict with this letter. We have not given any ship a subsidy or a refund of tolls. We have exempted certain ships from tolls, and Mr. Innes says substantially that we have a right to exempt them from tolls, provided the regulations under which the commerce is conducted are so drawn and so enforced that the exemption applies only to coastwise commerce.

We have not as yet adopted the regulations concerning coastwise traffic through the Panama Canal. The time has not come for the promulgation of regulations concerning this commerce. We have not attempted to frame those provisions, those restrictions which would confine our exemption to coastwise commerce.

Then tell me what is it that we have done in conflict with the first protest of Great Britain against the United States with reference to this treaty. It is utterly impossible to do it. There is no Senator with wit enough, there is no Senator with intellect so keen that he can point out a single phrase of the canal act as finally passed that is in conflict with the letter written by Mr. Innes in July, 1912, and which was intended to warn the American President and the American Congress of the real position of Great Britain.

It is full of observations regarding things that we did not do, and it may be that the legislation was very materially affected by this communication. But I repeat, we did nothing in the passage of the act which can by any possibility be construed into a repudiation or into a refusal to observe the protests made by Great Britain in 1912. I now come, however, to another phase of it, and probably a more interesting one.

The bill was passed on the 24th of August, 1912. What did the bill provide? It provided, first, that the President of the United States could, if he desired to do it, discriminate between ships of the United States engaged in foreign commerce and foreign ships engaged in similar commerce. That subject was not even suggested in the letter filed by Mr. Innes in July. The bill provided, second, that coastwise ships should be exempt from all tolls. That is precisely what Mr. Innes said in July that we had a right to do, although he said he believed it would be found difficult, if not impossible, to frame regulations that would confine that exemption within its true and proper limits; but we have never reached the question of regulation; we have never attempted to make regulations having for their object the restriction of ships doing coastwise commerce to that commerce and to no other. It will be time enough to listen to Great Britain with regard to that subject when these regulations are promulgated and it is discovered that they are not efficient in protecting foreign commerce from the effects of the discrimination in favor of domestic commerce.

But we did one thing more. We exempted the ships of the Republic of Panama. Mr. Innes did not protest against that, although Lord Grey subsequently does protest against it. I have not heard a word from any Senator, and my friend from New York [Mr. ROOT] has never suggested, that we ought to be of so sensitive honor as to yield to the anticipatory demand of Great Britain with regard to the ships of Panama. Why is it that if we are to yield to Great Britain at her suggestion and adopt her construction of the treaty with regard to other things we should not yield to her construction with regard to the ships of Panama?

The bill did two further things. It forbade ships owned and controlled by railways doing business in the canal. England has protested against that with much more emphasis and much more certainty than she has protested against the exemption of our coastwise commerce, as I shall presently show.

But we did one thing more. We said that ships controlled by a trust, ships controlled by a combination in violation of law, should not pass through the canal. England has protested against that in an anticipatory way, just as she has protested against the regulation concerning coastwise commerce. Why does not the President of the United States ask us to repeal that part of the law? Why does he not ask us to repeal the part of the law relating to the ships of Panama? Why does he not ask us to repeal the part which forbids the use of this canal by ships controlled by railway companies competing for the traffic of the country? I confess that I am utterly unable to understand that patriotism which selects just one thing that England would like to have removed from the law. I say she would like to have it removed from the law; I have no doubt of that; but she has not demanded that it be removed from the law; she has not said that our treaty requires that it shall be removed from the law. I have no doubt, however, that she would like to have it removed from the law. If we are courting the favor of the world, if it is necessary in order to stand well with the world that we pay this extreme deference to the opinions of men of other nations, why shall we not repeal that part which allows Panama's ships to go through free? Why shall we not repeal that part of it which forbids railroad-owned ships and forbids ships controlled by a trust in violation of law to pass through at all?

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. SMITH of Michigan in the chair). Does the Senator from Iowa yield to the Senator from Idaho?

Mr. CUMMINS. I do.

Mr. BORAH. Perhaps the plan is to take it in broken doses. We have no right to assume that if the precedent shall be established with reference to the first, that later there will not be a demand with reference to the others.

Mr. CUMMINS. I never thought of that. Possibly those who are so insistent about the repeal of this exemption and so insistent about winning the good will of the world by the surrender of our rights, will eventually demand that we also modify the law in those respects. I can only treat of it, however, as we have it before us now.

I have now referred to the bill as it passed Congress. After it passed Congress, and about contemporaneously with the proclamation issued by President Taft fixing the tolls, a letter from Lord Grey was communicated to the United States, in which the English position is somewhat shifted, at least it is very much elaborated. I ask your attention now to the final protest or demand made by Great Britain with regard to this subject. If, after I have done that, it has not been conclusively shown that the Senators who are standing here day after day insisting that to exempt coastwise vessels of commerce from the payment of tolls is a plain violation of the treaty are insisting upon something that never entered the mind of a British statesman, I have lost the power of understanding my mother tongue. I can not understand why we want to do something for Great Britain in order to maintain our honor, which Great Britain does not seem to think we need to do in order to comply with this treaty. I am speaking now, of course, mainly to those whose votes will be influenced by the suggestion or the argument that we must heed the views of the world with regard to this matter, and especially that we must construe this agreement, the Hay-Pauncefote treaty, in the way that our adversaries construe it; that to make Great Britain feel that we are willing to fulfill every obligation into which we have entered we must adopt her construction of the treaty.

Now, mark you, I read again from the same volume, the one that has been printed by order of the Senate, a letter which was written on the 9th of December, 1912, and which will be found at page 85 of the Diplomatic History of the Panama Canal. After reciting the history of the relations between Great Britain and the United States growing out of the Clayton-Bulwer treaty—a subject on which I may have something to say later—I come to that part of the letter which points out the objection which Great Britain has to the law which we passed, and to repeal a part of which this bill is now before us.

It remains to consider—

Says Lord Grey on page 90:

> It remains to consider whether the Panama Canal act, in its present form, conflicts with the treaty rights to which His Majesty's Government maintain they are entitled.
> Under section 5 of the act the President is given, within certain defined limits, the right to fix the tolls, but no tolls are to be levied upon ships engaged in the coastwise trade of the United States, and the tolls, when based upon net registered tonnage for ships of commerce, are not to exceed $1.25 per net registered ton, nor be less, other than for vessels of the United States and its citizens, than the estimated proportionate cost of the actual maintenance and operation of the canal. There is also an exception for the exemptions granted by article 19 of the convention with Panama of 1903.

England couples in the same sentence and under the same objection the authority given by the act to the President to establish a different rate of toll upon our foreign commerce from that which is attached to the ships of other countries and the exemption in favor of the vessels of war belonging to the Republic of Panama. They are put together; they stand together in the opinion of Great Britain.

I have no doubt that giving to the President of the United States the power to attach a different charge for our ships engaged in foreign commerce than is attached to foreign ships engaged in the same kind of commerce is a violation of this treaty, provided we are bound by the rules concerning which so much has been said, and it is very plain that England protested against the power thus given to the President of the United States, and, under her view of the treaty, she had a right to protest; but bear in mind that in the very breath in which she protested against that, she protested against the exemption of the ships belonging to the Republic of Panama.

Now, I proceed with this category of objections:

> The effect of these provisions is that vessels engaged in the coastwise trade will contribute nothing to the upkeep of the canal. Similarly vessels belonging to the Government of the Republic of Panama will, in pursuance of the treaty of 1903, contribute nothing to the upkeep of the canal. Again, in the cases where tolls are levied, the tolls in the case of ships belonging to the United States and its citizens may be fixed at a lower rate than in the case of foreign ships and may be less than the estimated proportionate cost of the actual maintenance and operation of the canal.

This reasoning was upon an entirely erroneous basis. In the proclamation issued by the President and upon the information then possessed by the President, all the ships that were expected to pass through the canal were taken into consideration in determining the tolls that should be charged to foreign ships, and foreign ships were not required to pay any part of the cost of maintenance or operation or interest upon the investment that could be justly attributed to the passage of either the ships of Panama or our coastwise vessels. That, of course, has been made perfectly clear since that time; and the protest or objection of Great Britain in this respect is entirely without foundation.

Now, mark this:

> In the second place, the exemption will, in the opinion of His Majesty's Government, be a violation of the equal treatment secured by the treaty, as it will put the "coastwise trade" in a preferential position as regards other shipping.

Here is a reference to the exemption in the law of coastwise trade. Is there any objection to it as coastwise trade? No. England never has in any way even suggested that we had not a right to exempt our real coastwise trade from the payment of tolls; but Lord Grey proceeds:

> Coastwise trade can not be circumscribed so completely that benefits conferred upon it will not affect vessels engaged in the foreign trade.

That is the objection that England has to the exemption of coastwise vessels—not that we have not a right to deal with them as we like; but we must so deal with them that their exemption will not affect vessels engaged in the foreign trade; that is to say, so that it will not affect their foreign commerce.

> To take an example, if cargo intended for a United States port beyond the canal, either from east or west, and shipped on board a foreign ship could be sent to its destination more cheaply, through the operation of the proposed exemption, by being landed at a United States port before reaching the canal, and then sent on as coastwise trade, shippers would benefit by adopting this course in preference to sending the goods direct to their destination through the canal on board the foreign ship.

If our exemption results in that, if our regulations do not prevent that evasion, or, rather, that abuse, of the coastwise privilege, then, of course, a coastwise ship would stand, in the estimation of Great Britain, upon exactly the same basis as a ship engaged in foreign commerce; but if we can by regulation prevent that result, this record is free and clear of any protest or any objection on the part of Great Britain, and it has never been claimed by her most enthusiastic and ardent supporters or her most patriotic and loyal statesmen that, as to coastwise trade itself, we have not a right to deal with it as we like and that it is within the provisions of this treaty.

I see that the Senator from Georgia [Mr. SMITH] is now in his seat, and I have this to say with regard to his argument yesterday as to the difference between ships or the owners of ships and commerce. In all the correspondence with Great Britain in the two protests or arguments which have been made by Great Britain, there is never the suggestion of the distinction relied upon by the Senator from Georgia. Great Britain does not claim that there is any discrimination against the people of Canada because our coastwise vessels carrying trade between ports of the United States pass through the Panama Canal free. It is impossible to extort or to wring any such interpretation out of the communications between the two countries.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Iowa yield to the Senator from Georgia?

Mr. CUMMINS. In just a moment. I am not entering just at this moment into an argument upon the merits of that difference, if there be one; I am only calling the attention of the Senator from Georgia to the fact that Great Britain, in informing us why we should not insist upon this law, has not made the distinction; and, in my opinion, she has not done so, because there is no room for that distinction in the Hay-Pauncefote treaty. I now gladly yield to the Senator from Georgia.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Mr. President, I do not desire to inject into the Senator's speech any discussion of that subject. I only want to say this: I do not understand, even when we forced our construction of the Welland Canal treaty, that Canada and Great Britain conceded that we were right; they yielded to our contention. My insistence was simply that the construction that we had placed upon that treaty would be entirely applicable to this one. That was the line of thought which I presented.

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President, I understood the general trend of the argument of the Senator from Georgia, but I could not help thinking when he made it that just before his speech came the very eloquent oration of the Senator from North Carolina [Mr. SIMMONS], in which he based his change of opinion upon the "flood of light" which had poured in upon this subject since 1912. I suppose that the same flood of light may illuminate the American mind and the American conscience with respect to our contention in regard to the Welland Canal; and if Senators upon the other side of the Chamber especially, can change their minds in two years with regard to the meaning of words and the interpretation of a treaty; if they can change their minds with regard to our rights under the treaty and what we should insist upon, can we not do the same thing when we are sought to be held up to the standard of the insistence with regard to the Welland Canal?

I will not enter into the argument as to the Welland Canal. I think that there can be a very clear distinction made, and it has been made in part; but even if we did do it in regard to the Welland Canal and were wrong, why should we not be right now? Why should we be bound by that precedent any more than the Senator from Georgia is bound by his precedent in 1912, and especially any more than the Senator from North Carolina should be bound by his declarations in the great debate of that year?

I have no criticism upon a man or a nation that changes his or its mind. I am assuming that many of the Senators on the other side of this Chamber have reconsidered their judgment and have changed their convictions either because of additional reflection or because of additional evidence—of facts brought to light which were not known then. It does them the very highest credit to frankly confess their error in 1912 and to take up the path which their best judgment requires them now to follow; but you can not say in the same breath that Blaine or Harrison or Cleveland insisted upon the right thing in the Welland Canal simply because they did insist upon it, and adopt that as a guide in the construction of this treaty, any more than you can hold your own record inviolate against change at this time. You have changed, nearly all of you, and, as I have said, far be it from me to disparage or discourage the tendency to be illuminated by new floods of light. I am glad that you are able occasionally to see the sunshine in all its clearness; and I am glad when any man is courageous enough to stand up here and say that he did not know in 1912 that we were granting a subsidy to coastwise ships, but subsequent reflection has convinced him that we were. That is the courageous thing to do, though I do not think that anybody ever doubted that this favor to coastwise ships is a subsidy. It was stated in 1901 that it was a subsidy. John Hay understood that it was a subsidy, if there was any favor granted. Secretary Knox understood that it was a subsidy when he exchanged letters with Lord Grey in 1912; and that it is a subsidy, in the broad sense of that word, no intelligent man can deny; and that it was just as plainly a subsidy in 1912 as it is in 1914 no intelligent man will deny; and I find it hard to discover the "flood of light" which makes the meaning of that word any clearer now than it was then.

I proceed, however. I have now given one of the reasons which the British Government set forth in objection to exemption from tolls upon coastwise traffic. The second one is:

> Again, although certain privileges are granted to vessels engaged in an exclusively coastwise trade, His Majesty's Government are given to understand that there is nothing in the laws of the United States which prevents any United States ship from combining foreign commerce with coastwise trade, and consequently from entering into direct competition with foreign vessels while remaining "prima facie" entitled to the privilege of free passage through the canal. Moreover, any restriction which may be deemed to be now applicable might at any time be removed by legislation, or even, perhaps, by mere changes in the regulations.

There is the second reason given by the British Government for what I call the anticipatory protest against coastwise exemption. It is that there is nothing in our law that will prevent a coastwise ship from entering a foreign port and doing business between that port and an American port.

I assume that there is nothing in our law that will prevent a ship from so carrying on commerce; but that does not touch the question. The regulations which are provided for in the canal act are the vital things regarding coastwise trade. While I do not at all agree with the construction of the treaty that is insisted upon here—namely, that we can not deal with our ships, either foreign or domestic, as we please—yet, assuming that we can not discriminate in favor of our foreign trade, why can we not discriminate in favor of our domestic trade?

England grants that we can; England concedes it, and she simply insists that when we do exempt the coastwise trade we must so exempt it that the trade of foreign countries can not be discriminated against under the pretext that the ship is engaged in coastwise trade. If, however, we provide in the regulations against the first contingency, which I mentioned a few moments ago, and if we provide against the second contingency—namely, that a ship enjoying the exemption which we have here provided shall not enter a foreign port and do business upon the voyage during which she receives the exemption, between a foreign port and a domestic port—we have answered the objection of Great Britain, because her protest is not against the exemption of coastwise trade; it is against the abuse to which that exemption may lead. She simply asks the United States to "see to it that these ships of yours which are passed through the canal without charge shall not engage in foreign trade, and that the cargo which they bear shall not be so manipulated that it will be really a cargo destined from a foreign country to our country, or destined from our country to a foreign country." This is all that Great Britain has asked.

I have now considered all that the British Government has said with regard to our coastwise trade, and I again challenge contradiction of my interpretation of these communications. You will search in vain for any objection on the part of Great Britain to the exemption from tolls of our coastwise trade. You will find, however, in these communications the claim that this law which does exempt coastwise trade can not be administered so that it will not really exempt foreign trade as well as coastwise trade.

If we are able to frame regulations that will hold this trade within its limits, then, if we refuse to exempt our coastwise vessels, we shall have done something that our adversary—and I am speaking of Great Britain as our adversary in a purely contractual way—has not asked us to do and we shall have put upon this treaty a construction against the United States which never has been demanded by the other high party to the obligation.

I can not understand why, in the consideration of a treaty right, Americans can bring the approval of their consciences to insist upon an interpretation of the treaty that destroys an interest in the United States which our friends across the sea admit is not required by the terms of the treaty. I have yet to hear any explanation of that situation and that view taken by any Senator.

The senior Senator from Georgia [Mr. SMITH] says that he has no doubt that neither the coastwise trade nor the foreign trade can be exempted under this treaty, and the senior Senator from New York [Mr. ROOT] says the same thing. I know they are sincere about that. Now, England agrees with you with regard to the foreign trade. She has objected to the power that we have given to the President to discriminate in charges between our foreign trade and her foreign trade; but England, looking upon this treaty with an eye single to her own interests, at least unprejudiced so far as her own people are concerned, does not say, as the Senator from Georgia declares or as the Senator from New York declares, that we can not exempt our coastwise trade, and that is an excess of sensitiveness that I confess I do not appreciate.

Knowing Great Britain as we do, understanding her history as we understand it, valuing her friendship as we value it, appreciating the intellectuality of her statesmen as we have reason to appreciate it, it seems to me that it might be well for us at least to go no farther in the construction of this treaty against ourselves than is required by the insistence of that great country, and she has admitted diplomatically, as clearly as the English language can admit anything, that we may exempt our coastwise trade from tolls.

Now, mark you, I am not saying here nor at any time that I believe that any ship engaged in business for profit ought to pass through the canal free. I shall show hereafter, at least to my own satisfaction, that no ship ought to pass through the canal free. That, however, is a domestic question. That means simply a consideration of the rights of our own people. What we are now doing is to consider what the treaty means. This debate has pointed our action toward an interpretation of the treaty, as was seen by the message of the President which brought about the consideration of the bill.

Mr. WORKS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Iowa yield to the Senator from California?

Mr. CUMMINS. I do.

Mr. WORKS. Before the Senator passes to that subject I should like to ask him whether, in his judgment, the ships passing through other canals owned or constructed by the Government should pass free of tolls? In other words, why should there be any discrimination in that respect as between other canals and the Panama Canal?

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President, I intend to answer that question fully later on, but I answer it now by saying that every subsidy must be considered in and of itself. No subsidy is warranted unless it results in the general good. It is a violation of the fundamental principles of government to take from the Public Treasury any sum of money and expend it save for the public good.

We are subsidizing people and things all the time. The last Agricultural appropriation bill, amounting to $20,000,000, contained at least $10,000,000 of pure subsidies. We thought those subsidies were warranted because we believed that, although intended for and although resulting in the profit of a particular class of our citizens, yet in the end they promote the general, common good. If I believed that to exempt coastwise ships from any toll whatsoever in passing through the Panama Canal would result in the general good, I should not hesitate to grant them the subsidies that would be involved in that transaction.

When it comes to the consideration of vessels passing through tht Sault Ste. Marie Canal, or passing over our rivers, or into our harbors, if we allow them to use these facilities without payment, which is the equivalent of a subsidy, and that free use does not promote the common good—if the benefit which arises out of the use is not so generally diffused among all the people as to give them practically and substantially an even share in the advantage or benefit—we ought not to do it.

I am not prepared to say, Mr. President, that we ought to allow ships to pass through the Sault Ste. Marie Canal without tolls. I do not know. I have not investigated the subject sufficiently to have a definite or final opinion with regard to the matter. I have, however, examined this particular subject of the Panama Canal sufficiently to believe that the American commerce that passes through it should bear its fair proportion of the expense of the service that the United States renders to it. At another time I shall attempt to show what proportion of the expense of the service, or what proportion of the investment and the cost of maintenance and operation, ought to be charged upon our commerce and what proportion ought to be charged to the people generally, because the canal was built, the money was spent in its construction, and will be spent in its maintenance and operation, largely for the national defense. Therefore that part of it which has been or shall be spent for the national defense ought not to be charged upon commerce; and it is just as unfair to charge American ships the same toll that is charged to foreign ships as it is to allow American ships to pass through without any charge whatsoever.

Mr. WORKS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Iowa yield to the Senator from California?

Mr. CUMMINS. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. WORKS. The Senator has not answered my question.

Mr. CUMMINS. Nor can I.

Mr. WORKS. I hope the Senator may be able to do so at some future time. If, however, the Senator insists that ships passing through the Panama Canal should be required to pay tolls, and has not investigated the question whether other ships passing through other canals should do the same thing, I think it is about time that he should investigate those figures, because it is certainly an injustice to exact tolls from ships passing through the Panama Canal and relieve our ships passing through other canals from that charge, as a matter of principle.

Mr. CUMMINS. That may very well be, Mr. President, and I express no opinion upon it; but it is not a question of principle anywhere at any time. It is simply a question whether the service that we are rendering the ships at the Sault Ste. Marie Canal is for the general good. I do not know whether it is or not. I do not know whether it is so promotive of the general good as to warrant the free passage of those ships. I have not entered into the subject. It may be that the Senator from California is entirely right about it; but you can not announce as a general principle that all expenditures of the public money are for the general good. Each case must stand upon its own foundation.

Mr. KERN. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. SMITH of Michigan in the chair). Does the Senator from Iowa yield to the Senator from Indiana?

Mr. CUMMINS. I do.

Mr. KERN. A number of Members on both sides of the Chamber have expressed a desire that there should be an adjournment had at this time in order that they may attend the exercises at Arlington this afternoon, which are to be participated in by the ex-soldiers of the late war on both sides, it being the first occasion, I think, where the soldiers of the two contending armies of long ago have had a reunion in the National Capital. In deference to that desire, I move that the Senate adjourn until 11 o'clock to-morrow morning.

Mr. O'GORMAN. I ask that the canal-tolls bill may be temporarily laid aside.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection? The Chair hears none.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Mr. President, before that is done——

Mr. KERN. I withhold the motion for the present.

THE INCOME TAX.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I ask permission to report Senate joint resolution 155, to which I referred earlier in the day, and which relieves those subject to the income tax of its penalties for not making a return before the 1st of March. There is not a Senator who has not an interest in it, and we would have put it through this morning, but it was suggested that an addition should be made. I have prepared this addition:

And penalties which have been paid are hereby remitted and directed to be returned.

I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the joint resolution.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the joint resolution?

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the joint resolution (S. J. Res. 155) to remit under certain conditions and for the year 1914 the penalties provided by the act approved October 3, 1913, for failure to properly return the income tax provided for in said act in cases where said returns are completed by June 1, 1914.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I send to the desk an amendment, which I ask to have read.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment will be stated.

The SECRETARY. It is proposed to add at the end of the joint resolution the following:

And penalties which have been paid are hereby remitted and directed to be returned.

So as to make the joint resolution read:

Whereas the income tax has gone into effect for the first time during the present year; and

Whereas through misapprehension of the law many parties have failed to make their proper returns prior to March 1, 1914: Therefore be it

Resolved, etc., That the penalties provided by the act approved October 3, 1913, for failure to properly return the income tax provided for in said act, be, and the same are hereby, remitted for the present year in all cases where said returns are completed by June 1 of the present year, and where the failure to make said returns was not due to a purpose willfully to refrain from making the same; and penalties which have been paid are hereby remitted and directed to be returned.

The amendment was agreed to.

The joint resolution was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment was concurred in.

The joint resolution was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

Mr. KERN. I renew my motion, with the understanding that it may be necessary to have a session to-morrow night, in order to make up for the time lost this afternoon.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. A motion to adjourn is not debatable.

Mr. CUMMINS. There is no agreement about it.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The motion is not debatable. The Chair will put the motion.

The motion was agreed to; and (at 2 o'clock and 25 minutes p. m.) the Senate adjourned until to-morrow, Friday, June 5, 1914, at 11 o'clock a. m.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

THURSDAY, June 4, 1914.

The House met at 11 o'clock a. m.

The Chaplain, Rev. Henry N. Couden, D. D., offered the following prayer:

We lift up our hearts in gratitude to Thee, our Father in heaven, that we are living in the opening years of the twentieth century; that we are citizens of the United States of America; that the religion which fills our breasts inspires to nobler life and holier living; that pessimism invites defeat, while optimism insures victory; that love, the crown of all humanity, will outlast the stars and live on forever in immortal youth. So may we trust, so may we hope, so may we aspire. In the spirit of the Lord Jesus Christ. Amen.

The Journal of the proceedings of yesterday was read and approved.

PRINTING OF PETITIONS.

Mr. WILLIS. Mr. Speaker, I desire to submit a parliamentary inquiry, or, rather, to propound a question to the Speaker.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. WILLIS. Mr. Speaker, I notice, in examining the RECORD, that differences seem to obtain in the practice of different Members in the way in which they present petitions and have them printed in the RECORD. All Members, of course, receive petitions signed by a large number of people, and I notice that some Members present them in a particular form, simply giving the name of the person who heads the list of the petitioners and giving the subject about which the petition is presented, and stating generally the number of other people who sign the petition, while other Members have printed in the RECORD the names of all of the signers of the petition. I desire to inquire of the Speaker what the proper practice is in that particular?

The SPEAKER. The practice is to put the petitions in the basket, with any kind of indorsement thereon which the Member may desire.

Mr. MURDOCK. Mr. Speaker, will the Chair permit me to interrupt him?

The SPEAKER. Certainly.

Mr. MURDOCK. Mr. Speaker, I desire to say that I went through this agony a short time ago, and I found that one can get from the office of the Clerk little slips, and whatever the Member writes on that slip which accompanies the petition is printed in the RECORD.

Mr. WILLIS. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman from Kansas yield?

Mr. MURDOCK. Certainly.

Mr. WILLIS. I understand about that. There is no difficulty about that whatever. I have written whatever I desired on the jacket which I always have prepared with the petition, and that is always printed, but I am trying to ascertain what the proper practice is.

Mr. MURDOCK. I have found that that is not the case, that I could not get into the RECORD what I wrote on the jacket.

Mr. WILLIS. I suggest that the gentleman probably wrote something that he ought not to have written.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will give his own experience about the matter. He started in at first to make an individual indorsement on each one of these petitions, but there were so many that it imposed on the clerks too much work, so he fastened them together and wrote on the back, "Petition from John Jones and several others."

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, I noticed in the RECORD the other day, and I do not know how often that may have occurred, where some gentleman presented a petition from certain persons, giving the list of names a column long. I think that is a gross abuse of the use of the RECORD. It is an impossibility to maintain the RECORD and have the name of every person attached to a petition printed in the RECORD, as a part of the index, practically, of the petition.

Mr. BARNHART. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MANN. Certainly.

Mr. BARNHART. That probably occurred because some Member on the floor rose and asked unanimous consent to have it done.

Mr. MANN. No; that is not the case at all. This was a petition presented through the basket, and I think the Committee on Printing ought to stop it.

Mr. BARNHART. I do not understand how the Committee on Printing has any authority to do that.

Mr. MANN. The Committee on Printing has control over the printing of these matters in the RECORD.

Mr. BARNHART. Yes; but they are presented and printed before the Printing Committee knows anything about it, and so long as there is no rule established against it there is no way of preventing a man from printing, as you say occurs in the RECORD, a long list of names of petitioners and also a speech some 10 pages long consisting mostly of what somebody said about somebody somewhere.

Mr. WILLIS. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BARNHART. Certainly.

Mr. WILLIS. What we are talking about here is not what is put into the RECORD under leave to print by unanimous consent, but the printing of a large number of names of signers to petitions, and if the gentleman will look in the RECORD he will discover in a recent copy that there was a full column of names printed.

Mr. BARNHART. I saw it.

Mr. WILLIS. If every other Member of the House did the same thing and printed the names of all of his constituents, as he might like to do, there would not be anything in the RECORD except names. For example, in the last Congress I presented a petition with nearly 2,000 names on it; this, if printed in full, would have filled many pages of the RECORD. However, in that instance I followed my usual practice in presenting petitions and gave only the name of the person heading the petition, the number of signers, and the substance of the petition. What is the opinion of the gentleman as to the proper practice?

Mr. BARNHART. The proper practice when a petition is introduced is to write out on a slip and attach it to the petition something to the effect that these are petitions for or against so-and-so from citizens of so-and-so.

Mr. WILLIS. In the "so-and-so" does the gentleman mean to state the names of all of the signers or to simply give the number?

Mr. BARNHART. Of course, he should not print the names of the signers; but there is no means by which a Member of Congress can be regulated in his disposition to abuse the privilege of the RECORD. That is up to the individual.

Mr. WILLIS. The gentleman does consider the printing of a column of names an abuse of the privilege?

Mr. BARNHART. Certainly; and so does every other Member, including the gentleman from Ohio.

Mr. WILLIS. I quite agree with the gentleman.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, that is not the privilege of a Member at all. A Member does not decide the caption under which these are printed, except as a matter of common consent on the part of the printing clerk. There are in this morning's RECORD petitions with names nearly a column long. I had not noticed that until a moment ago, but a few days ago the same Member inserted petitions with names a column long. I have a petition in my office that would cover several pages of names in the RECORD. Does the gentleman from Indiana mean to say that every Member has the right to have all of these names printed in the RECORD?

Mr. BARNHART. The gentleman from Indiana is not prepared to say, for he is not advised of any rule of the House which prevents it. Along the lines of the same general abuse of the RECORD I recall that a few weeks ago one Member of this House utilized 26 pages of the RECORD to print in full every bill that he has introduced since the beginning of this session.

Mr. MANN. Well, the gentleman is talking about leave to print, and that is not what we are talking about. These petitions are indexed; they are under title; the printing clerk determines that and determines it, or should determine it, under the direction of the Committee on Printing or the Speaker.

The SPEAKER. Those of us who have been here any considerable length of time remember on one occasion—I have forgotten what it was about—there were petitions brought in here on one subject that took six or eight men to carry them in, and if all those names had been printed it would have taken five or six hundred pages in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD.

Mr. FESS. Will the gentleman from Indiana yield?

Mr. BARNHART. I yield.

Mr. FESS. I have received from some parts of my district a resolution printed on postal cards, with a blank left to put in the name, and I think I have received as many as 150 of those in one mail, all sent out at once, the gentleman understands. My practice is to put these together, bind them together, and put on the slip for the direction of the clerk, "Petition on so-and-so, signed by so-and-so and others."

Mr. BARNHART. Well, my idea of that is it is a better way, when a petition is introduced, to say on a memorandum slip attached petition in favor of whatever the subject matter may be, from citizens of Kokomo, Keokuk, Kalamazoo, and so on. That is the shortest method of listing and labeling.

Mr. FESS. Suppose the resolutions are on postal cards and you have got a thousand of them?

Mr. BARNHART. They are from a certain post office or certain post offices, and this plan would cover all succinctly.

The SPEAKER. Put on the back "John Smith et al."

Mr. MURDOCK. Mr. Speaker, while this matter is up I want to propound an inquiry to the Speaker for my own information, and I think it will inform the House. We have a temporary CONGRESSIONAL RECORD and a permanent CONGRESSIONAL RECORD. How long after the temporary RECORD is the permanent RECORD made up? I ask the question because in the RECORD this morning——

The SPEAKER. It used to be four days.

Mr. MANN. It is about 10 days.

The SPEAKER. But they have stretched it now gradually until it is about a week or more, but it is a good deal safer to get it in in the four days.

Mr. MURDOCK. In this morning's RECORD is a speech made by the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. GLASS] on the currency conference report on December 22, 1913. How can that get into the permanent RECORD?

Mr. MANN. It can get in the appendix.

The SPEAKER. It goes automatically into the permanent RECORD.

Mr. MURDOCK. But the permanent RECORD in this case has been printed months ago.

Mr. MANN. It goes in the appendix.

The SPEAKER. It goes in the appendix.

Mr. MURDOCK. The Speaker says that you do get it into some sort of a permanent RECORD in spite of the rule about the four days.

Mr. MANN. There is no rule about it.

Mr. MURDOCK. Well, the practice.

The SPEAKER. The four days' limit, or whatever it is now—it has been stretched, as I said before—was intended to give a chance for revision, straightening out the grammar, spelling, and so on.

Mr. MURDOCK. And if you do not get it in within the time limit, it goes into the appendix.

The SPEAKER. If you do get in the revised remarks within the limit, it goes in first as in the temporary RECORD, and if you leave it out past the time they make up the permanent RECORD, it goes in the appendix. That is the only place it could go. I know that I undertook to hunt up one of the greatest speeches that was ever made in the Senate, one by the Hon. James S. Green, of Missouri, a speech on the Le Compton constitution, and I hunted it up for a week before I could find it, and I had to go way back in an appendix somewhere to find it.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. Tulley, one of its clerks, announced that the Senate had passed, with amendments, bill of the following title, in which the concurrence of the House of Representatives was requested:

H. R. 14034. An act making appropriations for the Naval Service for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1915, and for other purposes.

The message also announced that the Senate had passed joint resolution of the following title, in which the concurrence of the House of Representatives was requested:

S. J. Res. 148. Joint resolution authorizing the President to extend invitations to foreign Governments to participate, through their accredited diplomatic agents to the United States, in the National Star-Spangled Banner Centennial Celebration.

SENATE BILL REFERRED.

Under clause 2 of Rule XXIV, Senate bill of the following title was taken from the Speaker's table and referred to its appropriate committee, as indicated below:

S. 4741. An act for the protection of the water supply of the city of Salt Lake City, Utah; to the Committee on the Public Lands.

SPEECH OF HON. JAMES M. MONROE.

Mr. LINTHICUM. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD by inserting a speech of Hon. James M. Monroe, of Annapolis, delivered at the Maryland Agricultural College on the 30th of May, 1914, wherein he depicts the organization and establishment of the first agricultural college in this country.

Mr. BARNHART. Mr. Speaker, I object.

REGULATION OF RAILWAY STOCKS AND BONDS.

The SPEAKER. The House automatically resolves itself——

Mr. ADAMSON. Before doing that, Mr. Speaker, I would like to ask the House to make an agreement in reference to the session. General debate will not quite be ended at 5.30, but it will be soon after the committee resumes its session after the recess, and I ask unanimous consent that we may proceed with the reading under the five-minute rule until not later than 11 o'clock to-night.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Georgia asks unanimous consent to modify the rule under which we are operating to the extent that when the committee resumes its session at 8 o'clock when general debate is finished the committee may proceed with the five-minute debate until not later than 11 o'clock.

Mr. STEVENS of Minnesota. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I would ask the gentleman how he calculates the time when general debate will be exhausted?

Mr. ADAMSON. My understanding is there are about seven hours remaining on the two sides, and that will carry us beyond 6 o'clock.

Mr. STEVENS of Minnesota. Mr. Speaker, I do not believe the House would care to take up this bill under the five-minute rule in the evening; it is too important.

Mr. ADAMSON. There is a general desire to complete this bill this week, and I heartily concur in that desire myself.

Mr. STEVENS of Minnesota. Mr. Speaker, the bill has only one section, and the five-minute debate can not be very extensive if the committee does not desire it to be so.

Mr. ADAMSON. I do not wish to ask the House to burden itself with any inconvenience at all, but I would be glad to get along with the bill. You do not know how long the five-minute reading is going to last.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, I would like to get through with this bill as soon as possible, and hoped that we might get a vote to-morrow, but I do not believe it is desirable to have the bill considered under the five-minute rule to-night. I think the gentleman would do a favor to the House if he would ask unanimous consent that there be no evening session, whether he finishes his general debate to-night or not.

Mr. ADAMSON. Mr. Speaker, inasmuch as my first request does not seem to meet with favor, I am going to withdraw it, and in lieu thereof make the request that general debate be concluded before we adjourn, and then we will have no recess.

Mr. MURDOCK. Then not take up the bill under the five-minute rule to-day?

Mr. ADAMSON. No evening session.

Mr. MURDOCK. What the gentleman wants to do is to dispense with that part of the rule of the House adjourning at 5.30 until 8 o'clock p. m.?

Mr. ADAMSON. To dispense with the recess.

Mr. BARNHART. Mr. Speaker, this is probably one of the most important bills in behalf of human welfare on which I have ever voted or ever shall vote, and I beg the indulgence of Members while I briefly speak of a personal matter. There is a very attractive event ahead of me for Saturday evening at 8 o'clock, in Indiana, one of the most important of the pleasant ones of my life, and which takes me home. It is to meet a manly son and a splendid girl at a bridal altar and welcome her to my family circle; and much as I want to have the honor of voting for this antitrust legislation I am going to witness the start in life of these two young people and wish them God's blessing, vote or no vote, as the bill is going to pass by an overwhelming majority, anyhow. And so, Mr. Speaker, if there is any criticism of the request of the gentleman from Georgia in charge of the bill, let me hear it. If the proposed hastening of the passage of these bills would be in any way detrimental to wholesome results, I would not have suggested it. Instead, I believe a little more hurry up by Congress would be applauded by the country.

That, however, is neither here nor there. I asked the chairman of the committee if he thought it possible to hold an evening session, so that we could reach a vote to-morrow. He graciously said that he would be glad to do anything to that end that he could. I have been here a number of years, you have all been kind to me, and this is an important bill to me, but I do not wish to urge any special favor. However, if we could commence this evening under the five-minute rule, so that we might have a vote to-morrow, I would like very much to do so. But if this is not in harmony with the judgment of those interested in making this legislation the best possible, I cheerfully abide your pleasure.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, I worked very hard the other day to hurry through the Clayton bill in order to accommodate the gentleman from Indiana as to his event, for which I got soundly scolded on this side of the House. I do not see how it is possible to dispose of this bill at an evening session to-night. Surely some one would make the point of no quorum, and there would not be a quorum here.

Mr. ADAMSON. We might authorize the gentleman to vote by proxy, and let him go on and celebrate his glad event.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Georgia [Mr. ADAMSON] asks unanimous consent to modify the rule under which we are operating, to the extent that we take a recess at not later than half past 5, be done away with, that there be no night session, and that we continue the debate on this bill until general debate is finished before adjournment.

Mr. MANN. I suggest that the gentleman do not ask the last. The gentleman has it in his power to continue general debate if the other is set aside, but there might be some emergency.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman asks unanimous consent, then, to modify the rule so as to do away with taking a recess at not later than half past 5.

Mr. ADAMSON. All I desire is to complete general debate before we adjourn to-day.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

The House resolves itself automatically into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the bill H. R. 16586, and the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. HULL] will take the chair.

The CHAIRMAN. The House is in Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the bill H. R. 16586 and other bills embraced in the special order of the House. The Clerk will report the bill.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (H. R. 16586) to amend section 20 of an act to regulate commerce.

Mr. ADAMSON. Mr. Chairman, will you kindly announce how the time stands?

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Georgia [Mr. ADAMSON] has consumed an hour and 41 minutes and the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. STEVENS] 1 hour and 8 minutes.

Mr. ADAMSON. Mr. Chairman, I hope the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. STEVENS] will consume some time now. However, the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GORDON] desires me to yield to him one-half minute.

Mr. GORDON. Mr. Chairman, I avail myself of the privilege under the rules to extend my remarks in the RECORD.

Mr. ADAMSON. Mr. Chairman, I hope the gentleman from Minnesota will proceed.

Mr. STEVENS of Minnesota. Mr. Chairman, I yield one hour to the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. ESCH].

Mr. ESCH. Mr. Chairman, the question of Federal control over capitalization of interstate carriers is not a new one. It has been in the public mind for many years, but agitation has thus far failed to crystallize into legal enactment. It was a question which had grown to sufficient importance to challenge the attention of the committee appointed by the Senate in 1885, presided over by Senator Cullom. Even at that early date it was complained "that the capitalization and bonded indebtedness of the railroads largely exceeded the actual cost of their construction or present value, and that unreasonable rates are charged in the effort to pay dividends on watered stock and interest on bonds improperly issued." This committee, whose labors resulted in the original interstate-commerce act, approved February 4, 1887, declared as follows:

This pernicious practice (fictitious capitalization, popularly known as stock watering) has unquestionably done more to create and keep alive a popular feeling of hostility against the railroads of the United States than any other one cause. It has imposed a serious and continuous illegitimate burden upon commerce. Excessive capitalization operates as a mortgage upon the industry of the country.

Notwithstanding these findings of the Cullom committee, the original interstate-commerce act contained no remedial legislation looking to the control of capitalization, nor was consideration given to the subject in the Hepburn Act of 1906. The Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce, in reporting to the House the Mann-Elkins Act of 1910, amending the original interstate-commerce act, recommended provisions giving to the Interstate Commerce Commission large powers over combinations, mergers, and consolidations of interstate carriers and control over the issuance of their securities. These provisions were adopted by the House, but were stricken out by the Senate, and in their place was substituted a provision authorizing the President to appoint a commission "to investigate questions pertaining to the issuance of stocks and bonds by railroad corporations, subject to the provisions of the act to regulate commerce, and the power of Congress to regulate or affect the same, and to report thereon." The result of this provision was the Railroad Securities Commission, of which President Hadley, of Yale, was the chairman. In its report, rendered in November, 1911, the commission closed with the following recommendation:

Upon the whole, your commission believes that accurate knowledge of the facts concerning the issue of securities and the expenditure of their profits is a matter of most importance. It is the one thing on which the Federal Government can effectively insist to-day; it is the fundamental thing which must serve as a basis for whatever additional regulation may be desirable in the future.

But the commission went no further than to recommend completest publicity as to the financial transactions on the part of the carriers.

During the last 10 years many bills have been introduced in Senate and House seeking to give to the Interstate Commerce Commission control over capitalization, and during the same period many of the States have created railroad or public utilities commissions and given them control over the issue of stocks and bonds of common carriers, subject to their jurisdiction. The action of the several States in this particular has disclosed the inadequacy of their powers in handling a subject broad as the country itself. It has also disclosed the possibilities of conflict of jurisdiction. Unless the jurisdiction given to the Interstate Commerce Commission under legislation looking to the control of capitalization of interstate carriers is exclusive, conflict of jurisdiction can not be avoided, and instead of having one tribunal with one set of standards we would have as many tribunals administering as many different standards as there are States.

The necessity of this legislation, referred to by the Cullom committee over a quarter of a century ago, has been pointed out repeatedly by Presidents in their messages, by the Interstate Commerce Commission, and by parties in their platforms. In his annual message of December, 1904, President Roosevelt uttered these significant words:

The Government must in increasing degree supervise and regulate the workings of the railways engaged in interstate commerce, and such increased supervision is the only alternative to an increase of the present evils on the one hand or a still more radical policy on the other.

The Republican platform of 1908 contained this declaration:

We favor such national legislation and supervision as will prevent the overissue of stocks and bonds in the future by interstate carriers.

A declaration almost similar in verbiage occurs in the Democratic platform of 1912. The Progressive platform of 1912, while making no specific declaration on this subject, favors such legislation in spirit at least. In consonance with his party's platform declaration of 1908, President Taft, in his special message dated January 7, 1911, declared as follows:

I recommend that the law be amended so as to provide that from and after the date of its passage no railroad company subject to the interstate-commerce act shall, directly or indirectly, acquire any interests of any kind in capital stock, or purchase or lease any railroad of any other corporation which competes with it respecting business to which the interstate-commerce act applies.

He further recommended the enactment of a law—providing that no railroad corporation subject to the interstate-commerce act shall hereafter for any purpose connected with or relating to any part of its business governed by said act issue any capital stock without previous or simultaneous payment to it of not less than the par value of such stock, or any bonds or other obligations (except notes maturing not more than one year from the date of their issue), without the previous or simultaneous payment to such corporation of not less than the par value of such bonds or other obligations, or, if issued at less than their par value, then not without such payment of the reasonable market value of such bonds or obligations as ascertained by the Interstate Commerce Commission; and that no property, services, or other thing than money shall be taken in payment to such carrier corporation of the par or other required price of such stock, bond, or other obligation, except at the fair value of such property, services, or other thing as ascertained by the commission; and that such act shall also contain provisions to prevent the abuse by the improvident or improper issue of notes maturing at a period not exceeding 12 months from date, in such manner as to commit the commission to the approval of a larger amount of stock or bonds in order to retire such notes than should legitimately have been required. Such act should also provide for the approval by the Interstate Commerce Commission of the amount of stock and bonds to be issued by any railroad company subject to this act upon any reorganization, pursuant to judicial sale or other legal proceedings, in order to prevent the issue of stock and bonds to an amount in excess of the fair value of the property which is the subject of such reorganization.

While the Hepburn Act of 1906, supplemented by the Mann-Elkins Act of 1910, strengthened the control of the Government over the interstate carriers so as to declare "the just and reasonable rate to be charged," these acts do not contain the standards by means of which such rate can be invariably fixed. In other words, they did not supply the yardstick of measurement. The courts can always be appealed to to set aside the confiscatory rate. There remains, therefore, a field of legislation as yet unoccupied, namely, such grants of power to the commission as would aid it and guide it in reaching just conclusions as to the reasonableness of rates. The physical valuation of all railroad property and control of stock and bond issues of interstate carriers will furnish such aid and guidance. Physical valuation, as a result of legislation enacted in the last Congress, is now in progress. It is not my purpose to discuss the merits of physical valuation of railroad property, as one of the conditions precedent to the just and wise determination of a contested rate or charge. Suffice it to say that in all other transactions the cost of the plant bears a close relationship to the price of its output.

These two factors, physical valuation and stock and bond control, will supply data upon which the reasonableness of a rate can be more accurately determined. In justification of such legislation, I cite the opinion of Justice Harlan in the leading case of Smyth v. Ames (169 U. S., 546), commonly known as the Nebraska case:

> The basis of all calculations as to the reasonableness of rates to be charged by a corporation maintaining a highway under legislative sanction must be the fair value of the property being used by it for the convenience of the public. And in order to ascertain that value, the orginal cost of construction, the amount expended in permanent improvements, the amount and market value of its bonds and stock, the present as compared with the original cost of construction, the probable earning capacity of the property under the particular rates prescribed by statute, and the sum required to meet operating expenses, are all matters for consideration and are to be given such weight as may be just and right in each case. We do not say that there may not be other matters to be regarded in estimating the value of the property. What the company is entitled to ask is a fair return upon the value of that which it employs for the public convenience. On the other hand, what the public is entitled to demand is that no more be exacted from it for the use of a public highway than the services rendered by it are reasonably worth.

If, then, according to the Supreme Court, the market value of stocks and bonds of a carrier are to be considered in determining the reasonableness of a rate, legislation which will give to some Federal authority, like the Interstate Commerce Commission, the right to demand full publicity as to the issue of stocks and bonds and full publicity as to the method in which the proceeds derived from the sale of such stocks and bonds shall be expended is absolutely necessary, as is also legislation regulating the control of such issues.

STOCK WATERING.

The declarations in the party platforms and the recommendations of the President and the tardy consideration by Congress are the direct results of the rapid and enormous increase in the capitalization, especially during the last decade, of the telegraph, telephone, cable, express, sleeping-car and railroad companies of the country. President Roosevelt, with an insight as remarkable as it was accurate, in his message in 1905, used these trenchant words:

> Of these abuses perhaps the chief, although by no means the only one, is overcapitalization—generally itself the result of dishonest promotion—because of the myriad evils it brings in its train; for such capitalization often means an inflation that invites business panic; it always conceals the true relation of the profit earned to the capital actually invested, and it creates a burden of interest payments which is a fertile cause of improper reduction in or limitation of wages; it damages the small investor discourages thrift, and encourages gambling and speculation; while, perhaps, worst of all is the trickiness and dishonesty which it implies—for harm to morals is worse than any possible harm to material interests, and the debauchery of politics and business by great dishonest corporations is far worse than any actual material evil they do the public.

According to the Statistics of Railroads, a Government publication, the cost per mile of road, based on the total issue of stocks and bonds and miscellaneous obligations, for the period prior to 1890, was $60,340; for the period from 1890 to 1900, $86,909; and for the year 1910 it was $93,400. According to this publication, the actual cost of building and equipment of railroads in the United States in 1900 did not exceed $30,000 per mile. This figure, low as it seems in comparison with the cost as based on the total issue of stocks and bonds and miscellaneous obligations, is too high, according to the latest valuations made by commissions in the States of Michigan, Texas, and Wisconsin.

Stock watering, as defined by the Industrial Commission in its final report published in 1902, "is the issuing of securities that do not represent money invested in the property; water includes all that is put into the property except actual money." Such hydraulics have characterized the financing of common carriers more than any other of our corporate interests, although some of our largest industrial and manufacturing stocks show like dropsical tendencies.

Stock watering is resorted to for several reasons:

First. To encourage investment by appealing to the gambling spirit in investors, who secure stocks at great discounts and often free as a bonus with bonds.

Second. To secure an initial profit by sale of new stock.

Third. To conceal regular profits by keeping down the rate of dividend by issuing additional bonds.

The practice is indefensible on business as well as moral grounds. Better pay high dividends than water stock, for dividends can be reduced during lean years, but lower dividends on excessive capitalization can not then be still further lowered without discontent. Excessive capitalization gives excuse to maintain high rates and fares, and labor's demands for a higher wage go unheard.

The ways of stock and bond inflation have been devious and many. In the early seventies, in the palmy days of Drew, Gould, and Fisk, the stock of the Erie was increased from $17,000,000 to $78,000,000 for no other purpose than to manipulate the stock market.

Another device was the organizing of dummy companies. Members of a strong company organize a dummy corporation to build a new road. The latter authorizes a bond issue sufficient to build the road, and a stock issue of equal amount. The stronger parent company then issues its own securities to an amount necessary to build the road, and with the proceeds takes over the bonds of the dummy company and receives the stock as a bonus. Here, although there are issues of securities, the proceeds of the bonds of the dummy company alone bring the new road into being, but the people pay interest on all three. This device was used by Huntington in the construction days of the Southern Pacific, and has not been unknown in very recent Pacific railroad history, as the career of the Western Pacific Railway Co. fully attests.

Again, directors of a railroad company would purchase other railroad properties, and sell them to their own at exorbitant prices, or they would authorize the gift of stock as a bonus for bonds they desired to float.

The latest methods of stock watering make the earlier methods seem coarse. Now, we have stock dividends and melon cutting—like the Wells-Fargo Express Co. some time ago declaring a 300 per cent cash dividend overnight out of accumulated surplus.

Consolidation of properties, with consequent issues of new stock; substitution of stock issues for funded debt, as when 8 per cent stock is substituted for 4 per cent bonds, whereby the absorption of increased earnings in the future is facilitated; the funding of contingent liabilities by issues of interest-bearing scrip, instead of meeting them out of earnings—all have been employed to justify or extenuate increases of corporate liabilities.

Concrete examples of this evil practice are found in the recent reorganization of the Chicago & Alton Railway Co. Prior to 1898 this road, under conservative management and with average dividends of over 8 per cent, had total liabilities amounting to about $34,000,000. In that year a syndicate, consisting of Messrs. Harriman, Schiff, Gould, and Stillman, bought the stock, paying $200 a share for the preferred and $175 for the common, or a total of about $40,000,000. Within seven years the capital indebtedness was expanded to over $114,000,000, or an increase of about $80,000,000, with $18,000,000 paid out for actual improvements and additions, leaving an increase of its stock and liabilities, without one dollar of consideration, of about $62,660,000, or $66,190 per mile of the 946 miles of road owned by the company June 30, 1906.

On June 30, 1905, the bonds and stocks outstanding of the Southern Pacific Railroad Co. were $252,473,460, or an average of $76,880 per mile. Just one year later, in 1906, the capitalization had been increased to $284,153,500, or an average of $86,342 per mile. In other words, although but 8 miles of road were added, the debt had increased $31,680,040. No great improvements were made or contemplated, for but 11 miles of road were added during the year 1907. The truth is that not a dollar of this added debt of over $31,000,000 went into the treasury of the Southern Pacific Railroad Co. It was just a stock dividend, mere water, for which nobody paid a dollar, and was distributed among its stockholders, and these constituted the Southern Pacific Co., which owned every share of the Southern Pacific Railroad Co., according to Poor's Manual for 1907. Thus are fortunes amassed by printer's ink and a resolution.

But we can find abundant illustrations in more recent years. The evils complained of are not those incident only to the construction period of new railroads, but are to be found in the financial history of roads long established. The evils of which the Cullom committee complained were those chargeable to the construction era and against the great builders. The evils now complained against are those of consolidation and reorganization, under the manipulation of great bankers and banking syndicates. Bankers now control railroads and railroad systems and not their builders, and under this new control, through interlocking directorates and the desire for commissions, the holdings of thousands of stockholders are as mere pawns on the chessboard of high finance. The evil, therefore, exists to-day as it did a quarter of a century ago, differing only in character and degree.

At this very hour the Department of Justice and the Interstate Commerce Commission and various State public-utilities commissions are engaged in seeking the truth with reference to certain reckless, illegal, and unconscionable operations of high finance which have brought some of the leading railroads of the country either into the hands of receivers or to the verge of bankruptcy. Within the last year the country has been aroused and innocent investors have been alarmed over the disclosures of the looting, by men high in the financial world, of such promising roads as the Frisco, the Rock Island, Pere Marquette, Boston & Maine, and the New Haven. The testimony of ex-President Mellen, of the New Haven road, just given before the Interstate Commerce Commission, shows the officers and directors of that road to have been mere puppets in the hands of a powerful banking syndicate in New York.

In this particular instance—

Says Mr. Samuel Untermeyer in an address delivered at Pittsburgh a few days ago—

the investigation thus far has barely scratched the surface. It relates mainly to a single phase of the New Haven road and involves the diversion of only about $11,000,000 out of a total of over $200,000,000 that will have to be accounted for some day, provided the comatose shareholders will ever awaken and have the sense or can summon the courage to assert their rights. If the investigation of the Interstate Commerce Commission is extended into the other transactions so as to include the vast purchases of comparatively worthless competing properties at fabulous prices for the purpose of destroying competition, the dimensions of the offenses committed against the stockholders of that company will be of a character to render the exposures incident to the French Panama Canal scandal as a moonlight silhouette compared to a volcanic eruption.

In 1902 the Rock Island was one of the best equipped and most prosperous of the trans-Mississippi roads. It supplied a fertile region and connected great and growing terminals. In that year a syndicate secured control, and according to the gentleman from Iowa, Mr. GREEN, who appeared before our committee, began an era of expansion and exploitation by raising the capital stock from $60,000,000 to $75,000,000 and the bonded indebtedness from $71,000,000 to $258,000,000, an increase of the bonded indebtedness of $187,000,000. Three thousand miles of road, much of it nonproductive, were added to the system. Little of the proceeds of this vast increase of indebtedness went to the improvement of the way and of the service. To-day service is inadequate, roadway and equipment in poor condition, and the bonded indebtedness, on which the public is charged, has been raised from $18,230 to over $38,000 per mile.

The Pere Marquette road, which covers the State of Michigan, connects large cities, passes through thickly settled sections, having 1,800 miles of track, is to-day in the hands of a receiver. According to the gentleman from Michigan, Mr. CRAMTON, who also appeared before our committee, the funded debt of this road increased from $25,000,000 in 1900 to over $78,000,000 in June of last year. The total earnings increased by almost $4,000,000 in 1913 over those of 1906, yet notwithstanding such increase there has been no material increase in equipment; in fact, the road to-day is in a worse condition physically and financially than it was in 1906. This road has been the victim of financial exploitation and of hurtful domination by its rival, the Michigan Central, a domination which in a large degree continues in its present receivership.

As a result of the investigation of the purchase of the Chicago & Eastern Illinois Railroad by the St. Louis & San Francisco Railroad, made by the Interstate Commerce Commission, pursuant to a resolution of the Senate of June 10, 1913, one of the most significant facts disclosed was the enormous discounts on bonds and notes and other short-term notes issued by the Frisco and lines which it controls, amounting to over $30,000,000, in 12 years. The payment of such ruinous discounts, according to the report of the commission, was due either to the fact that the credit of the Frisco was very poor or "that bankers obtained the securities at prices which may or may not have been as high as could have been obtained from those not directly interested in the finances of the road." Four per cent on these $30,000,000 of net discounts and commissions represents an annual expenditure of over $1,200,000 for interest on money which the road never received and represents a fixed charge which the public is called upon to pay and forms a basis for a demand for an increase of rates.

With publicity of all issues of stocks and bonds and publicity as to the purposes for which their proceeds are to be expended, required by the pending bill, no such financial jugglery would be possible. Another significant fact disclosed in this investigation of the Frisco and which is pertinent in this discussion is the comparison of its interest-bearing liability with its stock liability. In May, 1913, its total capital amounted to $295,000,000 in round numbers, of which only $51,000,000 was capital stock and $244,000,000 was funded debt, including equipment trust notes. The capital stock was only 17.37 per cent of the total capital liability, while the funded debt amounted to 82.63 per cent. In the Rock Island, the ratio of funded debt to capital liability is 75 per cent. No other roads in territory west of the Mississippi have anything like such a ratio. In explanation of this unhealthy condition, the commission states:

That the excessive issue by the Frisco of interest-bearing securities, instead of capital stock, may be due in part to the requirement of the State of Missouri that capital stock of railroads may not be sold at less than par, while no such restriction is placed upon the sale of bonds. It is also customary in issuing additional capital stock to deal with the stockholders for a portion at least of the new issue, while the disposition of bonds is usually a transaction with banks or bankers to whom profits accrue.

When a single State can thus in the charter it grants fix the limitations on stock issues and can thereby increase the burden upon not only its own shippers but the shippers of all other States through which the road operates, by compelling the road to increase its interest-bearing liabilities or fixed charges, which must be paid out of income derived from traffic or go into a receivership, instead of allowing it to increase its stock liability on which dividends need only be paid when earned, the situation and its burdensome consequences is a strong argument in favor of exclusive Federal control.

As justification for such financing railroad officials declare that a common carrier has the right to capitalize its earning power, and this without regard to the original cost or cost of reproduction of the plant. While it is entitled to some increase because of increase of value which a growing population gives to right of way, franchises, and terminal facilities, it ought not to absorb all of the "unearned increment," but should share it with the public by reducing its rates and charges and improving its facilities.

Capitalization based on earning power, according to the report of the Industrial Commission, "obscures the relation between rates, wages, and profits. It is impossible to discover, without a careful appraisal of the property, whether an overcapitalized road is earning more than a fair return upon the investment. The principle is generally accepted at the present time that capital is not entitled to more than a certain fair rate of profits. The issuance of additional securities on the basis of increasing earning power makes it possible for a company covertly to secure exorbitant returns on the actual investment. This objection seems conclusive against the policy of full capitalization up to the limit of the earning power."

It is also true, as claimed by railroad statisticians, that the capitalization of our American roads is less than those of the leading countries of Europe, being but one-fourth that of Great Britain and one-half that of France. British railroads, however, "make a practice of charging expenditures for improvements to capital rather than to revenue." More double and quadruple track mileage in proportion to the total mileage further accounts for the difference.

Mr. MOORE. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield before he proceeds to that?

Mr. ESCH. Yes; for just a question.

Mr. MOORE. The gentleman has dealt very largely with what might be termed the mismanagement of certain roads. I ask him whether there is not sufficient law already to meet such mismanagement, or does he insist there must be Federal control over and above such State legislation as exists?

Mr. ESCH. The existence of the evils I have thus recounted is pretty clear evidence that there is not at present sufficient law.

Mr. MOORE. Then, taking the bill we have before us and referring to the new paragraph on page 12, which proposes to make it unlawful for any common carrier to issue stocks, bonds, and so forth, or other evidence of indebtedness, "even though permitted by the authority creating the carrier corporation," are we to understand that that last line, "even though permitted by the authority creating the carrier corporation," would supersede the charters of all existing railroads?

Mr. ESCH. When Congress under its constitutional powers occupies the field it does it to the exclusion of the States, and I am one who believes that it is wise, if we are to take up this legislation at all, to make it exclusive, and thus give one Federal control, with uniformity of management and uniformity of decision and uniformity of operation.

Mr. MOORE. All existing railroads, then, wheresoever chartered, would begin anew under Federal direction, and the authority creating them would be abrogated? Is that the understanding?

Mr. ESCH. The congressional power granted by this bill or the bill which will be offered by the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. STEVENS] will give to the commission the power of regulation of stock and bond issues of interstate carriers. It would not affect the stock and bond issues of a road that was purely intrastate.

Mr. MOORE. Within the State?

Mr. ESCH. Yes, sir.

Mr. MOORE. But it may be expected if this paragraph passes that the existing charter rights of companies would be affected so that there would be a Federal rather than a local or State jurisdiction?

Mr. ESCH. I think that would be the tendency.

Mr. FESS. Will the gentleman yield there?

The CHAIRMAN. Will the gentleman yield further?

Mr. ESCH. Yes.

Mr. FESS. Would not the railroads be better satisfied, in your judgment, if they were under one regulation by the Government rather than under many?

Mr. ESCH. That was the burden of the testimony presented to the committee.

Mr. GORDON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield there?

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Wisconsin yield to the gentleman from Ohio?

Mr. ESCH. Yes.

Mr. GORDON. If that is true, then why is it that this strong recommendation made by President Roosevelt in 1905 to do this very thing has never been consented to by the railroads? If they have been so anxious all these years, why is it that this legislation has not been passed?

Mr. ESCH. I think it is due to the fact that since that recommendation was made many of the States have given the power of stock and bond control to State commissions, and hence there are 20 States in the Union that now have similar control; and it is because so many separate units have separate control that these complexities and diversities have been brought about in the matter of stock and bond issues.

Mr. GORDON. Then it is the enactment of State legislation that has finally driven the railroads to come to Congress?

Mr. ESCH. Yes. They prefer to have one control instead of 48.

Mr. SIMS. If the gentleman will permit me, is it not a matter of fact that none of these bills has been introduced at the instance of any railroad?

Mr. ESCH. That is correct. In fact, many protests have been lodged against this legislation with our committee.

BASIS OF CAPITALIZATION.

What constitutes a proper basis of capitalization? Not the original cost of construction, the actual investment of capital being the money paid in for stocks and bonds, for this in some cases would give us too high and in others too low a capitalization; not earning capacity, for reasons already mentioned; not cost of reproduction, as declared in 1896 by the Supreme Court of Minnesota in the case of the Great Northern Railway Co.; but the rule as laid down by the Supreme Court of the United States in the Texas Railroad Commission case and the case of Smyth against Ames, already cited, namely, that—

A fair basis is to be found only by taking into consideration both cost of reproduction and earning capacity.

The constitutional warrant for Federal control of stock and bond issues of interstate carriers arises out of the connection which such issues may have with rates, and not because of any protection to investors which may result from such control. It is, therefore, pertinent to consider the relation between capitalization and rates. Chairman Knapp, of the Interstate Commerce Commission, in a hearing before our Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce in February, 1911, declared that under existing conditions he had not been able to trace any material relation between capitalization and rates, although before the Industrial Commission some years ago he admitted that when the reasonableness of a particular rate was called into question capitalization had to be considered in determining what the road in question ought to charge. Leading experts in railroad financing at the same hearing testified that the relation of cause and effect did not obtain between capitalization and rates, and that, therefore, no legislation was necessary. The Interstate Commerce Commission in two or three of its recent reports recommended legislation to regulate the issue of railroad securities, meeting the contention that capitalization has no influence upon rates, as follows:

It has frequently been urged that capitalization exercises no influence upon rates, but such an assertion is at best a partial truth. When one holds in mind how persistently the courts oppose the enforced approach of railway tariffs to the line of confiscation; when one comes to realize how eager the carriers are to restore to their property accounts the value of the improvements of past years paid out of revenues; when one clearly understands that so long as railways which operate on different levels of cost continue to compete for the same traffic there must result a permanent differential profit to the more fortunate road; and, finally, when one reflects upon the fact that securities once issued are ordinarily beyond recall and beyond control, it is difficult to see how one can assert that the kind and amount of securities issued by a public-service industry have no bearing on the problem of railway tariffs, as that problem must be regarded by the commission and by the courts. It is, in fact, the setting in which the problem is most frequently submitted for judicial consideration.

Judge Clements, a member of the commission, in an address delivered before the Atlanta Freight Bureau in January, 1909, argued in favor of Federal control of capitalization on the following grounds:

That the public may be better protected from unjust rates exacted to make good dividends and interest on stocks and bonds not necessary to be issued for legitimate purposes in the conduct and conservation of the property; that bona fide investors, trustees, and others may be reasonably protected from deceit, and that the proceeds of securities issued shall be devoted to the benefit of the property and not lugged off by manipulators and speculators as booty in the pockets of bandits. Transactions of this kind should be scheduled by the law with fraud and cheating, where in ethics and good morals they belong, and be dealt with accordingly. * * * Public conscience will be satisfied with nothing short of rules of action not inconsistent with the spirit of the more humane and apt expression, "Live and let live."

In testifying before the commission in regard to the Alton deal a few years ago Mr. Harriman justified the enormous increase of stocks and bonds on the ground that as the new liabilities drew only 3½ per cent, whereas the old drew 7 or 8 per cent, the fixed charges were not increased, and hence the rates would not be, as though it would never become necessary to pay the principal. Under this philosophy uncontrolled capitalization would lead inevitably to repudiation and disaster. It is common knowledge that stock issues increase and bonds are never paid, but refunded.

It is claimed that the Alton road, after the Harriman reorganization, could not recoup itself by increasing its rates because of the competing of six other roads traversing the same territory. This is true, and where there is genuine and active competition capitalization will have little effect on rates; but this emphasizes the need of control over roads like the Southern Pacific, which for years was master of a mighty empire and exacted tribute from thousands in the way of exorbitant charges. If the financial athlete can work the pump in the case of the Alton, is it not high time that through legislation he be forbidden from working the pump in the case of the Alton's rivals?

I desire to state both sides of my thesis. I shall not follow the precedent of the Irish justice of the peace, who refused to hear the arguments on both sides because it would confuse him in reaching a decision. Opponents to Government control over capitalization contend with much force that it would destroy initiative, paralyze effort, and check construction. If this be true, then enterprises of great pith and moment must depend upon the gambling spirit, upon bonuses and free gifts of stock, though the stock be given dividend capacity by the development of the country. For risk run in the launching of a new enterprise there should be proper and even generous reward; but in these days the preliminary survey is so thorough, the calculations of present and future traffic so accurate, that the risk is minimized. As new lines or extensions are generally intrastate they have come under State control. Many States—Texas since 1892, Massachusetts since 1893, New York and Wisconsin since 1907, and others—have laws controlling the issue of stocks and bonds of State railroads. So far as I have knowledge these laws have not had the effect to retard construction. In fact, the increased confidence which such laws have created in such stocks and bonds has encouraged investors, stabilized values, and promoted improvements. Bankers, promoters, and underwriters of securities find opportunity for gain in heavy capitalization, but such capitalization is injurious to the interests of investors and the public generally.

Officials of common carriers insisting that excessive capitalization can have no effect on rates stultify themselves when, as witnesses before courts, the Interstate Commerce Commission, or committees of Congress, in opposing suits or legislation looking to a reduction of rates, they at once and systematically claim the existing or higher rates to be absolutely necessary to pay the interest on bonds and dividends on stock of their respective roads. When, six years ago, our committee was considering the Sherman bill providing for a 2-cent passenger rate, the passenger and traffic experts of the leading roads of the country protested that if such rate were fixed by law it would be impossible to meet fixed charges. During the hearings before the commission in the Spokane case the carriers interested followed a like plan of defense.

Federal control might further be justified in giving publicity to and regulating the modern practice of the officials of one carrier buying up the capital of another to justify new stock and bond issues to increase monopoly and destroy competition. As bonds have no voting power and bondholders no share in the management, only the stock, whether common or preferred, which has the voting power, is purchased. The result is that it requires but a comparatively small amount of stock to secure control. An actual investment of only $5,000,000 in the Atlantic Coast Line Co., some years ago, gave control of over 11,000 miles of road.

We have thus far gone on the assumption that Congress had the right under the Constitution to regulate the stock and bond issues of interstate carriers. If it has such right, it must be found in the commerce clause which gives Congress the power "to regulate commerce with foreign nations and among the several States"; the idea of the framers being that commerce between the States should be forever free and untrammeled and subject only to regulation by Congress, and as to such commerce its powers were to be plenary.

Under the provisions of the Constitution it must be shown that stock and bond control is a regulation of commerce. The delegation by Congress to a commission of the power to declare what is a just and reasonable rate is no longer questioned, but is conceded to be a regulation of interstate commerce, the freedom or restraint of which commerce being dependent upon the amount of the rate. If, therefore, the rate is subject to control by Congress, then that which affects the rate, such as capitalization, should be subject to like control.

The Nebraska case already cited held that in arriving at the reasonableness of rates "the amount and market value of the bonds and stock" of the carrier are to be considered. As the whole embraces a part, authority to regulate rates implies the power to regulate those constituents which go to make up the rates.

In many cases before State commissions and the Interstate Commerce Commission and before the courts the amounts of stocks and bonds and their market value are put in evidence to effect the determination of the rate. In the Spokane case the defendant companies, the Northern Pacific and the Great Northern, at great expense and after much labor presented elaborate statements to show the cost of reproducing their physical properties, and claimed that the rates proposed by the commission would seriously impair their ability to meet their fixed charges. An authoritative valuation and stock and bond control through Federal enactment would simplify and expedite every rate controversy.

At the very threshold of this constitutional inquiry we are met by the objection that the National Government can not determine the amount of stock and bonds which a railroad corporation chartered by a State can issue, even when it engaged in interstate business.

This objection raises the question as to the extent of control by Congress over interstate commerce. In the absence of authorities directly in point we may get some light from an examination of the leading cases wherein the jurisdiction of State and Federal authorities as to interstate commerce was involved.

In the noted case of Gibbons v. Ogden (9 Wheat.), Chief Justice Marshall decided that—> Congress may control State laws, so far as it may be necessary to control them, for the regulation of commerce.

Again:

> The power to regulate commerce * * * amounts to nothing more than a power to limit and restrain at pleasure * * *. The grant of the power carries with it the whole subject, leaving nothing for the State to act upon.

And again:

> The power of Congress over commerce is not a power incidental to that of regulating commerce, but is the thing itself.

This decision clearly announces the supremacy of Federal over State laws in matters relating to commerce between the States, for under the Constitution all laws passed by Congress pursuant to the powers therein delegated to it are the supreme law of the land; and this is true, even though the State laws be enacted in the exercise of powers not controverted.

In the case of County of Mobile v. Kimball (102 U. S., 691), arising out of improving the harbor of Mobile, lying wholly within the State of Alabama, the Supreme Court held:

> The power conferred upon Congress by the commerce clause of the Constitution is exclusive so far as it relates to matters within its purview which are national in their character and admit or require uniformity of regulation affecting all the States. * * * For the regulation of commerce there can be only one system of rules applicable to the whole country, and the authority which can act for the whole country can alone adopt such a system. Acting upon it by separate States is not, therefore, permissible.

In view of the fact that over three-fourths of the commerce of the railroads of the country is interstate, and that there are few doing such an intrastate business as to be without question subject only to State control, would State regulation as to capitalization of roads within its borders under this decision be supplanted by the enactment of a Federal law of similar import? I should say yes. In the words of Judge Story:

> The full power to regulate a particular subject implies the whole power, and leaves no residuum. A grant of the whole is incompatible with the existence of a right in another to any part of it. A grant of a power to regulate necessarily excludes the action of all others who would perform the same operation on the same thing.

The answer to this question depends on the rule laid down in Cooley v. Board of Wardens of Philadelphia (12 How., 299), viz:

> The power of Congress is exclusive wherever the matter is national in its character or admits of one uniform system or plan of regulation.

In the Minnesota rate cases recently decided by the Supreme Court of the United States, in speaking of the completely internal commerce of a State, which is reserved for the State itself, the court held:

> This reservation to the States manifestly is only of that authority which is consistent with and not opposed to the grant to Congress. There is no room in our scheme of government for the assertion of State power in hostility to the authorized exercise of Federal power. The authority of Congress extends to every part of interstate commerce and to every instrumentality or agency by which it is carried on; and the full control by Congress of the subjects committed to its regulation is not to be denied or thwarted by the commingling of interstate and intrastate operations. That is not to say that the Nation may deal with the internal affairs of the State as such, but that the execution by Congress of its constitutional power to regulate interstate commerce is not limited by the fact that intrastate transactions have become so interwoven therewith that effective government of the former incidentally controls the latter. This conclusion necessarily results from the supremacy of the national power within its appointed sphere.

The organization of over 240,000 miles of railroad in the United States under six or seven great systems, some of them transcontinental in extent, controlled by two powerful banking syndicates, has resulted in increased capitalization under single charters. Should the laws of New Jersey or West Virginia control in Minnesota? Should the capitalization of a Minnesota railroad corporation result in restraint of trade, in inadequate facilities, in Idaho or Washington? Would not the uniformity resulting from Federal control of capitalization compensate the States in some measure for the loss of jurisdiction?

If a common carrier engaged in interstate commerce, chartered by a State, either with or without authority from such State, waters its stock to such extent as to materially affect its rates or create liabilities with no return to its treasury, but for speculative purposes, there ought to be some authority to afford relief to the public, which ultimately must carry the load. Under these conditions, as Justice Harlan decided in Smyth v. Ames, the carrier "may not impose upon the public the burden of such increased rates as may be required for the purpose of realizing profits upon such excessive valuation or fictitious capitalization."

Such authority could well be lodged with the Interstate Commerce Commission. The means of carrying into execution the powers delegated to the Government are left to the discretion of Congress.

From these authorities and the Addyston Pipe and the Northern Securities Co. cases, and others, it is clear that Congress has full power to legislate over all matters that pertain to interstate commerce or the regulation thereof, and that, while at times Congress has allowed the States to exercise certain control over commerce which affected interstate relations, as soon as Congress occupied the field its control became exclusive.

A railroad corporation, as the creature of the State, is subject to such restrictions as to capitalization which the State may prescribe as a condition precedent to doing business within its borders, and Congress could not dictate to the State the limitations as to capitalization which it should require of such railroad before it granted it its charter; but as soon as such railroad operates without the limits of a State it at once subjects itself to Federal control, and Congress has the power to prescribe what it must do before it can carry on an interstate business. Congress could therefore require it to take out a Federal license or could set limits upon its capitalization, and there is no constitutional prohibition against it being compelled to come under the Federal law.

Conceding that, if capitalization has no direct effect upon rates, our argument in support of this proposed legislation must fall, we can ground it irrefutably upon this proposition, that as it is the duty of every common carrier engaged in interstate commerce to provide "proper equipments and appliances to carry on its business in a safe, expeditious, and efficient manner," Congress to this end by suitable legislation can prevent such carrier from impairing its financial ability by assuming unwarranted pecuniary burdens by the improvident issue and sale of securities without adequate consideration.

A railroad being in the very nature of things a monopoly created for a public purpose, even though by private capital, must at all times keep itself prepared to serve all alike and on equal terms. The General Government is interested in seeing to it that this constant readiness to serve is not impaired. If overcapitalization destroys credit, increases the burden of fixed charges, so that little or nothing is left for maintenance, repairs, and improvements, and traffic is thereby delayed and jeopardized, Congress can and should supply the remedy against such obstructions of the highways of commerce.

Jeremiah Black, in a speech before a committee of the Pennsylvania senate in 1883, clearly defined the functions of railroads, as follows:

> The functions of railroad corporations are as clearly defined and ought to be as universally understood as those of any servant which the State or General Government employs. Without proprietary rights in the highways, they are appointed to superintend them for the owners. They are charged with the duty of seeing that every needed facility for the use of these thoroughfares shall be furnished to all citizens, like the justice in Magna Charta, without sale, denial, or delay. Such services, if faithfully performed, are important and valuable, and the compensation ought to be a full equivalent; accordingly they are authorized to pay themselves by levying upon all who use the road a tax or toll or freight sufficient for that purpose. But this tax must be reasonable, fixed, certain, and uniform, otherwise it is a fraud upon the people which no department of the State government, nor all of them combined, has power to legalize.

TERMS OF PROPOSED LEGISLATION.

Having given some details as to the nature and extent of the evils of present and past overcapitalization of common carriers engaged in interstate commerce, and discussed hastily and perhaps inconclusively the constitutional difficulties which beset any legislative remedy through Congress, it seems proper to suggest some of the salient provisions which any such remedy should contain.

First. That there should be the fullest publicity of the security issues in accordance with the recommendations of the securities commission.

Second. That no common carrier shall issue stock, bonds, or notes payable more than one year from date of issue except for and when necessary for the following purposes: (a) The acquisition of property, (b) the extension or improvement of its line and facilities, (c) the improvement or maintenance of its service, or (d) the discharge or refunding of its lawful obligations.

Third. That the right to make such issues should be based upon application to and investigation by the Interstate Commerce Commission to determine their necessity and appropriateness for the purposes stated.

Fourth. It should be unlawful to issue either a scrip dividend or stock dividend or pay any dividend except in cash derived from earnings.

Fifth. That the consent of the Interstate Commerce Commission should be first secured as to all proceedings looking to the consolidation, reorganization, or merger of carriers subject to its jurisdiction, including the amount and valuation of stocks, bonds, or other evidences of indebtedness connected therewith.

Sixth. The Interstate Commerce Commission should be granted visitatorial powers in all matters connected with capitalization.

Seventh. That all provisions of this proposed legislation, so far as applicable, should be extended to all carriers subject to the interstate-commerce act as amended, including telegraph, telephone, sleeping-car, cable, pipe-line, and express companies, and also holding companies.

Eighth. That provision should be made for suitable penalties, including imprisonment.

BENEFITS OF SUCH LEGISLATION.

While the effects of Federal control, as thus imperfectly outlined, can only be conjectured, we have reason to hope that they will be as beneficent to both people and the carriers as they have been in regard to the regulation of rates through the Interstate Commerce Commission. Wise legislation does not seek to benefit one class or industry at the expense of another, but aims to promote the general good. When the evil is coextensive with the country, the separate laws of the States, differing in standards and degrees of enforcement, can not afford the proper relief. While such able and efficient railroad or public-utility commissions as those of Massachusetts, New York, Texas, Wisconsin, and Minnesota have accomplished much and brought about wise reforms within their respective jurisdictions, they all recognize, when interstate commerce and its regulation is involved, their limitations.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Wisconsin has expired.

Mr. ESCH. Mr. Chairman, I would like to have two minutes more.

Mr. STEVENS of Minnesota. Mr. Chairman, I yield to the gentleman such additional time as he may desire.

Mr. ESCH. I need only two minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will proceed.

Mr. CLINE. Inasmuch as you have all the time you need, will you allow me to ask you one question?

Mr. ESCH. Yes, sir.

Mr. CLINE. The detailed explanation you have given us of a plan for the regulation and the future control and management of railroads is a good one, but the evil is now in connection with railroads that have issued, according to the gentleman's statement, a large amount of fraudulent stocks and put them on the market. Now, in adjusting future rates, is it the idea of the gentleman that these fraudulent stocks should be eliminated as a factor in fixing the rates?

Mr. ESCH. I suppose that the Interstate Commerce Commission would give to such stock issues as you refer to such weight as in their best judgment was wise and proper. Of course we can not invade the inviolability of contracts, under the Constitution, and this legislation could only affect future issues and would not relate back to those already on the market or in the hands of innocent purchasers.

Mr. CLINE. Is not that the purpose of having a physical valuation of railroads—to fix those rates?

Mr. ESCH. Yes; to aid the commission in the determination of the justice of the rates.

Mr. CLINE. Would not that necessarily eliminate a fraudulent issue of stock that had been made by a railroad company?

Mr. ESCH. Yes. So far as the commission is concerned, they might not be required to take that fraudulent issue into consideration in determining the reasonableness of the rate, and I doubt, if the evidence was clear that it was fraudulent, that they would take it into consideration.

Mr. TOWNER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield there?

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Wisconsin yield to the gentleman from Iowa?

Mr. ESCH. Certainly.

Mr. TOWNER. They would have the right, legally, to ignore every such issue, would they not?

Mr. ESCH. Yes.

Mr. TOWNER. But if a showing was made that perhaps the value of the property at the time was equal to the fullest extent of the issuance of the stock and bonds, they might for that equitable reason give them consideration. Is not that true under the law?

Mr. ESCH. Yes; under the law.

Mr. TOWNER. Of course you are just speaking now of the legal phase of the case.

Mr. CLINE. There is another side to the equitable proposition, and that is that this fraudulent stock had drifted into the hands of innocent purchasers.

Mr. ESCH. Yes; and it makes a very grave situation. I realize the gravity of it.

Mr. BAILEY. Mr. Chairman, if the gentleman will pardon me——

Mr. ESCH. Yes——

Mr. BAILEY. I would like to recur to the earlier part of the gentleman's very interesting speech and ask him the question, whether I understood rightly that the unearned increment could properly be in part appropriated by the railroads—the value of their franchises?

Mr. ESCH. I think that was the fact in the Minnesota case.

Mr. BAILEY. That was decided by the court that it could properly be appropriated?

Mr. ESCH. Yes; in part, as I understand.

Mr. MOORE. While we have such an able exponent of railroad affairs on the floor, I crave the privilege of asking one more question, and that is this: Eliminating all present bad management of railroads, and assuming that we want to build a new road, with entirely new managers, who are presumed to be honest and not guilty of the tricks of the trade that the gentleman has described, would it be possible for them, without having money in hand, to begin the construction of a railroad under this legislation? That is to say, would there be any way by which they could raise money from the public or from investors, under this legislation, to begin that new enterprise?

Mr. ESCH. They would probably have to make a thorough preliminary survey.

Mr. MOORE. Which would cost money, of course.

Mr. ESCH. Yes; which would cost money.

Mr. ADAMSON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman permit a suggestion right there?

Mr. ESCH. Yes.

Mr. ADAMSON. How can an incipient enterprise be hampered or controlled by this act until it has got into operation and begun to engage in interstate commerce?

Mr. ESCH. Most of these new projects, I will state to the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. MOORE], would be projects confined to a State, and they would therefore be very largely under the control of State commissions. They would not be the large extensions and the building of transcontinental lines such as characterize the railroad building era of the seventies and early eighties.

Mr. MOORE. Would the Interstate Commerce Commission under this new provision have the right to authorize the new board of directors of that proposed new company to issue stocks and bonds to obtain capital with which to proceed with the work?

Mr. ESCH. I do not believe the commission would have anything to say about the board of directors. That is left to the initiative of each company or carrier.

Mr. MOORE. They would have to have money to proceed?

Mr. ESCH. Certainly.

Mr. MOORE. And they would have to have authority to raise money, would they not?

Mr. ESCH. If the preliminary survey disclosed it to be such that it would promote commerce and trade in a certain region, it would be like any other industrial project, in that it would need capital to float it.

Mr. MOORE. Could they proceed without the approval of the commission to engage in interstate commerce?

Mr. ESCH. If they became interstate carriers, then this act would become operative as to them.

Mr. CRAMTON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield further?

Mr. ESCH. Yes.

Mr. CRAMTON. As a matter of information, would you state whether, in the practical operation of this proposed statute, it would not have the effect of validating past stock issues in the case of a company which was already grossly overcapitalized in the event that they should then come in and ask for an authorization for a new issue, which was to be used for legitimate purposes? Such an issue being authorized, should there thereafter come up a question of rates, would not the authorization of this last issue for legitimate purposes in a way tend to compel them to validate former improper issues, the later issue being an issue which would naturally be subordinate to the former one?

Mr. ESCH. I do not think it would validate a former fictitious issue. Of course, that raises a question, which was quite a prominent one in the hearings, as to whether, if the commission gives a certificate allowing the issuance of stocks or bonds, there does not follow a certain degree of moral responsibility.

Mr. CRAMTON. I do not want to impose on the gentleman's time, but I would like to suggest that if any of these improper issues are to be retired, it must be by the squeezing out of the water by a reduction of rates which will make it impossible for them to pay charges on those improper issues.

Mr. ESCH. That might result in a reorganization.

Mr. CRAMTON. Then if in the meantime an issue for legitimate purposes has been authorized, that issue would be the first one to be affected by a reduction.

Mr. ESCH. I wish to close now and not impose further on the time of the committee.

With Federal control along the lines suggested we may expect the following benefits:

First. The right to reduced fares and freight made possible because of the absence hereafter of an inflated and speculative capitalization upon which dividends and interest have to be paid.

Second. Absolute and complete publicity as to all corporate transactions relating to stock, bonds, and obligations of common carriers.

Third. Increased confidence on the part of investors in the value of their securities and the stabilizing effect of such increased confidence upon our financial markets.

Fourth. The prevention of manipulating the stock market by directors and leaders of systems and syndicates in the reckless and unconscionable manner that has heretofore characterized them.

Fifth. Protection of innocent investors and popularizing our railroad securities as a form of investment among the people here as well as abroad.

Sixth. By force of law insisting upon such safe and sane capitalization as will permit and require the carrier at all times and under all conditions to perform its duty to the public.

Commissioner Prouty, in a recent address, declared that—

The Government can not rightfully grant an increase in railroad rates until it knows that the money so raised shall be prudently and properly expended. That will be when railroads can not expend money except for railroad purposes, when they can not buy the securities of other railroads, when they can not issue securities of their own without the consent of the Federal Government, and when they can not put securities to any use except those specified.

When legislation along the line suggested shall have been put upon the statute books, much of the prejudice which now exists against railroads will be removed, and it is to be hoped that a spirit of fairness will prevail.

Were it not for human greed and fondness for speculation on the part of many of our great organizers of corporations there would be no reason why a corporation, like an individual, "should not be well born, well bred, and throughout its life be well behaved."

Mr. STEVENS of Minnesota. Mr. Chairman, how much time was used by the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. ESCH]?

The CHAIRMAN. One hour and 10 minutes.

Mr. ADAMSON. I yield to the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. SIMS] 30 minutes.

Mr. SIMS. Mr. Chairman, I hope these good Republican friends who have stayed here and given this subject so much attention and have received so much benefit by staying will put off their lunches just a little while longer, and by remaining receive still further benefit. [Laughter and applause.]

The gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. ESCH], who has just taken his seat, has so completely covered the provisions of this legislation as to fundamentals and even as to details that, as far as I am concerned, I am ready to vote now. I do not mean that we should not read the bill in Committee of the Whole, but I am ready to vote as far as the general scope of the bill is concerned. I am relieved of labor by the gentleman from Wisconsin which I might otherwise have to perform.

Mr. Chairman, railroads are absolutely necessary to our civilization. The progress of this country will be checked, if not destroyed, if our transportation systems are throttled and ruined. The man who is an enemy to railroads as such is an enemy to the best interests of his country. But if we want the railroads to serve the public, for which they exist, that is no reason why we who so believe should be called enemies, and it is no reason why we should not attempt to further legislate, if necessary, to accomplish such a purpose.

The gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. ESCH] read platform declarations from all existing political parties, if I understood him correctly, which, in so far as platforms can, have committed all parties to legislation along the line proposed. I want to say that I believe the bill that will pass this House will be a better bill than any individual bill that has been introduced, although I introduced one myself. I am ready to lay aside any pride I have in my own bill if by doing so we can pass a better bill. The product of all the minds of the Committee of the Whole is going to be better than the product of the mind of any one member of the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce or any one member of this Committee of the Whole.

This bill is open to unlimited amendment by way of substitute or otherwise, as it ought to be. I think we ought to look upon this subject as so serious as to call for our very best consideration and best thought. I do not care whether a bill has my name on it, in it, or about it, just so we get what the country wants, needs, and ought to have.

Mr. Chairman, it is estimated and admitted without controversy that at least 85 per cent of all the business of all the railroads is interstate; that not over 15 per cent is wholly within the separate States, or wholly intrastate. That measures the importance to the railroads and to the country of legislation by the States or legislation by Congress. If Congress legislates, it is with reference to 85 per cent of the commerce of the country transported by railroads, about which the States do not legislate at all. Is not the legislation pertaining to interstate commerce far more important and necessary to the general welfare and prosperity of the whole country than is legislation confined and limited to the 15 per cent of commerce that is wholly intrastate? Therefore I think the very fact that 85 per cent of the business done by the carriers of the country is interstate makes it the duty of the only legislative body that can act on interstate commerce to act. We will not legislate with reference to local benefits, while the States do and must so act.

As the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. ESCH] said, 25 States of this Union have already passed laws with reference to the issuance of securities by corporations doing business in those States, or chartered by same. We all know who study this question that there are fields of legislation which under our Constitution can properly be occupied by Congress, which if not so occupied may be occupied by the States, and may be beneficially occupied in the absence of action by Congress. So the possibilities are, if we do not have national legislation along these lines, every State in the Union will occupy this field, and we will then have 48 controlling sovereignties in this field, with as many different shades of opinion as there are States.

It was testified before our committee that in some of the States where interstate railway companies whose lines went through those States, as well as other States, made application for the issuance of stocks and bonds in which States such applications and permission is required. Before the State authorities would authorize the issuance of those stocks and bonds it was necessary for the railroad companies to guarantee that a certain per cent of the proceeds of the issue should be expended within each State granting the permission. Such a requirement might be very wise and beneficial as to a particular State; but the fact that a certain per cent of the authorized issue of a railroad operating through a number of States must be expended in a particular State might reduce the amount that ought to be expended upon the lines of that railroad in other States, and result in a corresponding injury to interstate commerce, so far as that particular line was concerned.

As I said before, I am no enemy to railroads. We must have them, and we will have them. They must and will be a success. If private ownership and private enterprise do not make a success out of interstate railroads, they are so important and so absolutely necessary to the very existence of our commerce that the Government will have to step in and take charge of them and operate them, even if at loss to the Government. So we are right up to the parting of the ways. We must either by legislation make private ownership of interstate carriers a success to the Nation as a whole, or else the Government by the very necessities of the situation will have to take charge. We are not now confronted with the question of whether or not we shall have Government ownership of railroads. We are confronted with this question: What can we do to prevent Government ownership?

In a private enterprise, not a public utility, it makes no difference to the public what are the earnings on the investment.

A bank, although a quasi-public institution, if it makes 100 per cent on its capital and loans its money in competition with others at a low rate of interest, the country is not interested as to the gross amount of money the bank should make on its capital stock. The result is that some banks have shares of capital stock that in market value exceed many times their par value. Yet you find no public complaint or agitation growing out of such a condition. The public is just. The people do not care how much money you make out of your own property as long as you do not oppress others in doing so or deprive anyone else of any rights he is entitled to. So in private business it is permissible to get the greatest amount of earnings on capital investment and to get the greatest amount of return for the smallest amount of service rendered.

But when we come to public-utility facilities we must take another view of the question. It is then no longer a question of how great shall be the earnings, net or gross, on the amount of money invested, nor how great shall be the earnings in proportion to the amount of service rendered; but it becomes a question of how much service can be rendered for the least amount of investment, how much service can the public get out of public utilities for the least amount of burden or tax?

If private enterprises assume government functions as common carriers, they must not conduct their business as though they were individual owners of that business in which the public has no interest. They have some of the benefits of private ownership; indeed, they have much of it, they control their property, they elect their officers, they pay such salaries or compensation as suits them; but they must render such a service as the public is entitled to have rendered, and for such compensation as is just and reasonable and as will promote the public service and not hinder or impair it. [Applause.]

Mr. Chairman, it is useless to go over the great number of instances of bad financial management of railroad property. The gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. ESCH] detailed a number of them, but neither he nor I have the time within the limits of this debate to detail but very few of them.

There is a misconception in the public mind as to what railroad stocks really are, and it comes about by use of the dollar mark as a measure of ownership. The trouble is, stocks, which are nothing but certificates of ownership, or evidence of title to a proportionate part of the property of the corporation, are determined by the use of the dollar mark, instead of a suitable unit for the measure of ownership by quantity instead of value.

When you speak of land you speak of acres of land, or square feet, or front foot. You do not say so many hundred dollars' worth of land. You measure land by the proper unit of measurement applicable to it, and your deed is the title to the land. When a farmer puts an improvement on his land that is necessary to its preservation, when he builds a new fence in order to protect his crops, when he digs a ditch to drain it, he is not entitled to an increase of rent in order to recoup himself, unless he has increased the yield of the land per acre, but he gets his recoupment by the added value to his farm.

Now, what do we mean by an overissue of stocks and bonds? That is what is prohibited in the Democratic platform and seems to be the same in all the others. You must remember that stocks are not a monetary obligation. Stocks are not evidence of indebtedness any more than a deed to a piece of land is a monetary obligation. A bond is a monetary obligation, a lien not only on the revenues of the road but upon all of its property—a mortgage. What is an overissue of bonds? That is just as simple as overmortgaging your own property. One of the evils is that when a railroad is overmortgaged—in other words, overbonded—which bonds being a lien on the property and earnings, those earnings which must go to payment of interest must be secured in some way or the railroad goes into the hands of a receiver. The desire to prevent receiverships and to boost credit often induces the payment of interest on bonds when the earnings do not justify such payment by resorting to short-time loans.

Dividends on stock for the market effect on the stocks are often paid when the net earnings do not justify it. But there are some glaring instances of overissue of stocks whereby the ability of the carrier to perform its duty to the public is materially impaired.

Having erroneously gotten into the habit of treating stocks as indebtedness of the corporation, it is difficult to get the public to think of them as mere evidence of title to a certain ownership interest in the property of the corporation, and therefore incurring no obligation on the public to pay a freight rate that will enable dividends to be paid on these stocks, or to claim any moral right to charge such a rate as will enable them to pay such dividends, as being in the nature of fixed charges.

One gentleman appeared before our committee and said:

> We have a bridge on a road, and the engines are made heavier, and it is therefore necessary to strengthen that bridge. We have to add $200,000 or $500,000 to our indebtedness in order to build a new bridge over which our own engines can pass with safety.

Is there any economy to the road in the big engines? Of course there is. It is a saving to the road to have the large engines. It is a benefit to the road to have the bridge, and the payment for that bridge ought to come out of the surplus earnings of the road before one dollar is paid as dividends on stock, and why? Because when you put $500,000 in the bridge, the road, as a whole, is worth $500,000 more than it was before the bridge was built, and the stockholder gets his dividends in the increased value of his own property.

Mr. MOORE. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SIMS. Certainly.

Mr. MOORE. The gentleman recalls the question I asked the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. ESCH] with regard to starting a new enterprise?

Mr. SIMS. Yes.

Mr. MOORE. Suppose the argument of the gentleman now with reference to taking the funds needed for improvements out of the earnings should be applied to some such enterprise as the Panama Canal, if it should be operated by a private corporation, how would you begin the work and where would you get the money?

Mr. SIMS. The gentleman means to start a new railroad?

Mr. MOORE. Yes; how would you do it?

Mr. SIMS. Just as you would start any other enterprise—get your charter, tell the public and the financiers what you have, and let individuals take stock in it, just like anything else; and if they want to issue the stock all they need to do is to go before the Interstate Commerce Commission, and if the Interstate Commerce Commission does not veto it you can issue the stock. In other words, the purpose of these stock and bond issues is to build or improve the railroad for which the issue is sought.

Mr. ADAMSON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman permit me to reply to the gentleman from Pennsylvania?

Mr. SIMS. Certainly.

Mr. ADAMSON. I do not see how the gentleman can figure that an incipient enterprise could come within the purview of this bill. It can not engage in interstate commerce until it is organized and goes to work.

Mr. SIMS. I understand what the gentleman means, but an incipient enterprise could be a proposition to build a railroad from here to the Pacific coast; such an incipient enterprise could be an enterprise to build a new railroad entirely through many States, if you mean by "incipient" a new proposition. In other words, if you want to build a railroad from Chicago to the Gulf it is a new proposition, and to that extent is incipient.

Mr. ADAMSON. The act to regulate commerce deals with carriers engaged in interstate commerce, not things that are trying to be born and organize and grow until they can operate in interstate commerce.

Mr. MOORE. If the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. SIMS] accepts the statement of the chairman of the committee, the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. ADAMSON], that answers so far as the committee is concerned; but I caution the gentleman that this proposed revision of the act to regulate commerce will prevent many worthy men who desire to engage in legitimate enterprise from starting railroads from one State to another, which would be interstate railroads. They would not have the means with which to proceed; they would not have the money with which to pay wages or to provide the surveys or to do those other things necessary to start an enterprise of that kind.

Mr. SIMS. I do not think the gentleman is correct in that statement; it is therefore not necessary to discuss it.

Mr. MOORE. If the gentleman does not think it is necessary to discuss it, very well.

Mr. SIMS. I do not think it is necessary to discuss it with reference to whether it is necessary to make the passage of this bill to depend on it. The truth of the matter is that there are no longer any independent roads constructed that are not intended to operate in connection with some other roads doing an interstate business.

Mr. MOORE. It might be that we would want to get into the gentleman's State on an entirely new line.

Mr. SIMS. The gentleman puts a lot of hypothetical propositions to me when I want to discuss things which are not hypothetical.

Mr. MOORE. I think it is an extremely practical matter.

Mr. SIMS. The gentleman might think so, but he will have to let some of us differ with him.

Mr. GORDON. The question of the gentleman is, How is anybody who has no money going to build a railroad? That is what he wants to know.

Mr. SIMS. I do not know.

Mr. MOORE. Suppose gentlemen in the gentleman's State engaged in industrial enterprises want to get a railroad built into the gentleman's State, an entirely new line, how will the bona fide business men who want to start that railroad raise the money on stocks and bonds?

Mr. SIMS. Just like any other railroad.

Mr. MOORE. Why, they are forbidden.

Mr. CARY. He better not start it unless he has the money.

Mr. MOORE. That, of course, is a brilliant idea, but I would like to see the gentleman start a railroad enterprise involving millions of dollars, with all the money in hand at the start.

Mr. ADAMSON. If the gentleman will permit me, I think I can answer the question.

Mr. MOORE. The gentleman has undertaken to do it once or twice, very cleverly, and I am obliged to him, as his is one intelligent answer I have had on the subject.

Mr. ADAMSON. If I desired to build a new railroad in my State, and thought that I could get the money in any way, I would get a charter from my State, and then I would try to get the money. Then I would try to build the road, and when I got ready to operate it, if I wanted to put it into interstate commerce, I would get it into interstate commerce, and then it would be subject to this law.

Mr. MOORE. But if the road runs from the gentleman's State to another State, what then?

Mr. PAYNE. Perhaps the gentleman could use "psychology" to arrive at it.

Mr. ADAMSON. If the gentleman from New York is an authority on psychology——

Mr. SIMS. Mr. Chairman——

Mr. MOORE. Will the gentleman answer? If I may have the indulgence of the gentleman from Tennessee for one moment, I will ask the gentleman from Georgia if he will not consider the railroad that is to be organized under a charter granted by the State of Georgia as running into another State, and then answer that question——

Mr. ADAMSON. I do not think you would have any trouble. When you get it built and are going to operate in interstate commerce——

Mr. MOORE. But you have to have money to start it.

Mr. ADAMSON. That is a big trouble with all of us; if we had the money we could do a whole lot of things.

Mr. SIMS. Now, Mr. Chairman, what are some of the patent instances of the overissue of stocks? Bonds are easy, and many railroads have issued beyond what they ought to have issued, and in case of such an overissue, and the company fails to pay the interest, you can sell it out, foreclose the mortgage, and reorganize, but no railroad company can be put in the hands of a receiver because it does not pay dividends on its stock, because these dividends are not an operating charge or a lien obligation, but in a way they do affect rates, which the gentleman from Wisconsin described awhile ago. But in the public mind they have a good deal to do with it, whether strictly accurate, or legally or technically accurate, or not. It is practically the universal rule that when a railroad company decides to issue new stock, the outstanding stock of which is above par in the market, that in authorizing such issues it provides that the stockholders of record, at a date in the future fixed in its authorization, shall be permitted to subscribe for this stock at par. There is no use referring to the numbers of instances of that sort, as they are numerous. Now, take a road the market value of whose stock is, for instance, $150 a share.

Mr. PLATT. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SIMS. Yes.

Mr. PLATT. I do not think that is true—that they always authorize the subscription at par. Take, for instance, the Pennsylvania Railroad. They have made a number of issues of stock authorizing the stockholders to subscribe at considerably above par.

Mr. SIMS. But they authorize the subscription below the market price.

Mr. PLATT. Below the market price, but above par, and the stock immediately went down below that market price or near to it.

Mr. SIMS. That is all right, but I am going to give the reason——

Mr. PLATT. Will the gentleman permit another question?

Mr. SIMS. Let me give the reason and let me answer one thing at a time until I get through. Suppose a good road, a going concern, a well-established property, and the stock is selling upon the stock exchange, privately or otherwise, at not less than $150 a share. Now, suppose that good, solvent, going railroad concern desires to issue some additional stock. Say it wants to raise $10,000,000 and it wants to issue stock sufficient to procure this $10,000,000 to be used on its railroad for betterments, or for any purpose—reorganization or what not. The duty to the public of that railroad is to sell no more of its stock than will be necessary to realize the $10,000,000. Is not that correct? But how do they do it? I am only making this statement to illustrate. Whenever that railroad company through its board of directors authorizes the sale of that stock, not at the market price, not to the highest bidder at public sale, it permits the stockholders of record at a day specified in the future to have the privilege of subscribing to that stock at less than its market value, so that you have got to sell more stock to get the same amount of money to put on the road. What is the result of such a sale? I would like for the gentleman from New York to give his attention, and I will try to answer him. Suppose your stock is selling at $150 a share and you want $10,000,000.

If you sell to the public, to the highest bidder, it will not take $10,000,000 of stock at par value to realize the desired $10,000,000. It would not take $8,000,000 to bring you $10,000,000 in money, and money is all you want; and you only need $10,000,000 in money to be used for railroad purposes. Whenever you sell stock at the market value and put the entire proceeds derived from the sale in the treasury of your company you have not reduced the value of a single share in it. While you have issued more additional certificates of ownership, you have got more property owned by your railroad. Such stock issues have operated to reduce the value of the stock, the market value of it, by allowing the then stockholders to buy this stock for less than it is worth and pocket the difference in the value of what it was worth and what they got for it, which was private gain and never was applied to the improvement of the railroad or any portion of it; nor did it go in aid of any service to be performed by the railroad in behalf of the public.

Mr. PLATT. Will the gentleman yield again right there?

Mr. SIMS. Yes.

Mr. PLATT. Does the gentleman mean to contend that a railroad that has $100,000,000 capital and wants to get $50,000,000 more can issue that extra stock at the market value without having the market value go down, and will not the additional amount of stock, the greater quantity, force the market price down, anyway, and are not the stockholders entitled to protection in that regard?

Mr. SIMS. Now, let me answer——

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. DOREMUS. Mr. Chairman, I am authorized by the chairman of the committee to yield the gentleman five minutes additional.

Mr. SIMS. Five minutes only will hardly be of advantage to me.

Mr. STEVENS of Minnesota. I yield the gentleman five minutes more.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman is recognized for 10 minutes.

Mr. DECKER. Mr. Chairman, I would like to ask the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. SIMS] to yield to me just a minute to make a request, and I think the gentleman knows me well enough to appreciate that I would not interrupt him with any ulterior motive.

Mr. SIMS. Go ahead.

Mr. DECKER. I would like to ask unanimous consent that at 2 o'clock the committee rise, so that the Members of this House, from all parts of the United States, may have the opportunity to attend the ceremonies at Arlington Cemetery and to participate in and witness the unveiling of the monument to the Confederate veterans who sleep there and in other cemeteries of this country. I make this request as a son of a Union soldier, who taught me that one way to honor the men who wore the blue was to pay respect to those brave men who wore the gray, who fought for what they thought was right with the courage and grim determination that could have been resisted by no men on earth save by the men who wore the blue. And I ask unanimous consent that at 2 o'clock this committee rise, in order to give the Members an opportunity to participate in those ceremonies. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Missouri [Mr. DECKER] asks unanimous consent that at 2 o'clock the committee rise for the purpose of permitting all Members to attend the ceremonies at Arlington. Is there objection?

Mr. RAYBURN. Mr. Chairman, for the present I object.

Mr. RAGSDALE. Then, Mr. Chairman, I make the point of no quorum.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from South Carolina makes the point that there is no quorum present. The Chair will count.

Mr. GARDNER. I hope the gentleman will withdraw that point.

Mr. RAGSDALE. No, sir, I will not.

Mr. GARDNER. The gentleman will not improve the chances of the committee rising later by insisting on his point of no quorum.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman insist on his point of order?

Mr. RAGSDALE. I insist on my point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will count. [After counting.] No quorum is present.

Mr. RAYBURN. One minute, Mr. Chairman.

Mr. STAFFORD. Regular order, Mr. Chairman.

The CHAIRMAN. The regular order is called for, and the Clerk will call the roll.

The Clerk proceeded to call the roll, and the name of Mr. ABERCROMBIE was called.

Mr. RAGSDALE. Mr. Chairman, a parliamentary inquiry.

The CHAIRMAN. The regular order is called for.

Mr. RAGSDALE. Did the Chairman announce that a quorum was present?

The CHAIRMAN. There is no quorum present.

Mr. RAGSDALE. Then I move that the roll be called.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will continue the calling of the roll.

The roll was called, and the following Members failed to answer to their names:

Thereupon the committee rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. HULL, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that committee having under consideration the bill (H. R. 16586) to amend section 20 of an act to regulate commerce, and other bills embraced within the special order of the House, and finding itself without a quorum, he had caused the roll to be called, when 266 Members responded, and he presented therewith a list of the absentees.

The SPEAKER. Two hundred and sixty-six Members are present—a quorum—and the names of the absentees will be published in the RECORD.

SUNDRY CIVIL APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to be permitted to submit a privileged report (H. Rept. 763), so that the bill may be printed.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New York [Mr. FITZGERALD] asks unanimous consent to be permitted to make a privileged report. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. FITZGERALD. By direction of the Committee on Appropriations I report the sundry civil appropriation bill.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report it by title.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (H. R. 17041) making appropriations for sundry civil expenses of the Government for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1915, and for other purposes.

The SPEAKER. The bill is ordered printed and referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union.

Mr. GILLETT. Mr. Speaker, I reserve all points of order on the bill.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. GILLETT] reserves all points of order on the bill. The committee will resume its sitting.

REGULATION OF RAILWAY STOCKS AND BONDS.

Thereupon the committee resumed its sitting, with Mr. HULL in the chair.

Mr. SIMS. Mr. Chairman, I have 10 minutes remaining, 5 yielded by the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. DOREMUS] and 5 by the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. STEVENS].

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair understood that the gentleman's time had been exhausted.

Mr. SIMS. No; I had not got started on my extension of time.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will proceed.

Mr. SIMS. Now, suppose your $100,000,000 road proposes to add to its trackage, terminal facilities, and other permanent improvements, equal in value to $50,000,000, upon the theory that when it is added the road will be worth $50,000,000 more than it is; that it can render 50 per cent more service and earn 50 per cent more money; and if they sell $50,000,000 worth of stock and put all the money into the road, they do not necessarily impair the price of that stock one dollar either old or new, because after the stock is sold the railroad company has $50,000,000 it did not have before.

Mr. PLATT. But the gentleman disregards the element of risk. They are taking $50,000,000 and investing it in a risk.

Mr. SIMS. In an exceedingly well-equipped road, on which it is desirable to have a risk.

Mr. PLATT. Everything is a risk that is new.

Mr. SIMS. Mr. Chairman, there are only two more questions that I wanted to discuss, but I shall not have time in which to do it. One of those questions is, it is alleged and claimed by some who oppose this legislation that the Interstate Commerce Commission will not be able to attend to the duties imposed on it by this measure.

I do not think that that great body would have asked so often for just such authority if they were not capacitated for exercising it and will not have the time to properly discharge the duties they will be called upon to perform. Besides, if it were necessary in the public interest that those duties shall be performed, shall Congress cease to legislate and refuse to serve the public because an existing commission is already charged with duties to the extent of its capacity to perform them? There is no question but that by additional legislation, if it should be found necessary—suggested by the commission itself—we can supplement its help, and it can be reorganized in such a way as to enable it to perform the functions that we here impose upon it, to the benefit and satisfaction of the country.

There is another point that I want to call attention to, and that is that the bad system of financing employed by so many railroads has discredited all railroad securities, both at home and abroad. It is to the interest of the public, it is to the interest of the railroads and the owners of railroad securities, that their credit should be restored and increased.

The fact that hereafter, before they do issue stocks and bonds, they must give notice of the amount of the issue and what it is for, and that it must be submitted to the Interstate Commerce Commission, that great expert body, and that body to approve of the issue must find that the issue which the railroad proposes to make is made in compliance with the law, gives assurance that will at once advance the market price of such securities all over the world. No underwriting syndicate, no house of Morgan & Co., can give tone and credit and value to these railroad securities equal to that of such a Government body representing the whole Nation, authorized by Congress to pass upon the necessity for the issue and to require reports as to its application. Therefore we shall benefit the roads by increasing and enlarging their markets for the securities. It will require fewer bonds and stocks to be issued, and in that way it will require less earnings to be made by the passenger and freight traffic of the roads, and will no doubt result in a benefit to the roads and to the public to be served by them. If Congress does not take some such action as this bill provides, it will practically furnish good cause for every State in the Union to further legislate and thus further complicate the issuance of stocks and bonds until such securities will practically have no market value at home or abroad.

How many of you gentlemen now, in view of existing conditions, would put a dollar in railroad stocks? How many of you would invest in such stocks when 48 States have power to affect their earnings, as also the National Government? Legislation of this character is in the interest of the public that patronizes the roads. It is in the interest of the security holders of the road, and those who are to become security holders.

I will put in my speech a letter written by Mr. Yoakum to the chairman of this committee, in which he says that the saving in interest alone, if the securities of the roads were guaranteed by the Government, would amount to $180,000,000 per annum. Whenever you increase the confidence in the solvency of stocks and bonds you increase their price. Therefore it will not require so large a volume of these issues to be placed upon the market in order to get the money necessary to perform the services required of the roads to the public.

I am glad that this is no party measure; that it is no Republican, no Democratic, no Progressive Party bill. This legislation, if this bill is passed, will be the people's legislation. It will be in the interest of the public, in the interest of the railroads, in the interest of the holders of present securities and of the investors in future issues of such securities; but because it will be thus it will not for one moment preclude any defense that may be made equitable or otherwise against any issue thus made and put out by the carriers before this law was in operation.

That idea that the Government is morally bound for and is morally indorsing all previous issues and will morally estop in the future the Interstate Commerce Commission from imposing a reasonable rate, providing that that rate will not give a reasonable earning upon all stocks and bonds that have been previously issued, has no force to me.

The Interstate Commerce Commission is not directing anything; but we, the Congress of the United States, say, "You shall not put on the market any bonds or stocks except under certain conditions." The company authorizes the issue and issues the bonds or other securities, but before it can sell them without committing a crime we require that the company shall submit its application to the Interstate Commerce Commission for the judgment of that commission as to whether the company has complied with the law which we are enacting. The commission is not authorized to exercise an arbitrary power. It can not substitute its judgment for that of the issuing company as to whether the profits in the future will be this, that, or the other figure, but simply that the commission shall see to it that the issuing company is complying with the requirements of the laws of Congress. We do not authorize it, we do not direct it. We simply approve it whenever it is done in accordance with the law of Congress which we are now passing. [Applause.]

NEW YORK, March 14, 1914.

CHAIRMAN COMMITTEE ON INTERSTATE AND FOREIGN COMMERCE,
House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR SIR: In response to your suggestion, I beg to present my views upon the subject of a law requiring the approval of the Interstate Commerce Commission of securities issued by the railroads.

As long as 14 years ago I filed a document with the Interstate Commerce Commission suggesting a plan for cooperation between the Government and the railroads. I am still of the same opinion, and believe the time is opportune for the establishment of closer working relations.

There is no doubt as to the advisability of railroad securities being subject to the approval of some one established authority, either the Federal Government or the different States, some of which now have laws supervising their issuance. The approval of the Government would be preferable as to interstate railroads, and would simplify the work both for the Government and the railroads. It would obviate the multitude of divergent views that might arise as to the necessity of issuing securities to carry on the work of development, additions, and betterments asked for by interstate carriers.

This subject is such a broad one that it should be viewed from a more comprehensive standpoint than merely whether the National Government or State authorities should control. Together with Federal approval of securities there should also be a way found to establish effective cooperation between the Government and the railroads. Among other things this would lead to cheaper money for the railroads for the improvement of their property and facilities, and would enable them to more economically handle their freight and passenger business. The price of money to the railroads is just as much a factor in the cost of transportation as the price of coal and other things that they must buy in conducting their business. To illustrate: If the coal consumed by the railroads in 1913 could have been purchased for 20 cents per ton less than was actually paid, it would have meant a saving in the cost of transportation in one year of approximately $47,000,000. (These statistics are based on the compilation of Slason Thompson.) Again, a reduction of 1½ per cent per annum in interest on the $11,000,000,000 funded debt of the railroads (Interstate Commerce Commission statistics as of June 30, 1912) would effect an annual saving in the cost of transportation of $165,000,000, which now constitutes mere economic waste. In other words, each one-half of 1 per cent reduction in interest rates would mean a saving of $55,000,000 per annum, or $5,000,000 more than the Government paid to the railroads of this country for carrying the mails last year.

In considering the problems of transportation for the future it is interesting to look back a few years. Thirty years ago, which is a short period in the life of a nation, there were 125,000 miles of railroad in the United States, and the mileage has doubled in the last 30 years. If our population increases in the same ratio in the next 30 years as in the last, or 77 per cent, there will be in 1944 about 175,000,000 people. If our railroad mileage increases in proportion to our population, which will be necessary for the country's development, it will require the construction of about 193,000 miles of new railroad during the next 30 years; therefore it is important to consider the transportation question not only for what we now need but for the country's requirements in the near future.

The average cost of money for construction, additions, and betterments is estimated at about 5½ per cent per annum, including discount. If new railroad mileage in this country, including construction, ballasting, equipment, and adequate terminal facilities, costs, say, $60,000 per mile, the next 30 years' requirements of 193,000 miles would call for about $12,000,000,000. The difference between 4 and 5½ per cent in the rate of interest on this amount is $180,000,000 per annum, which colossal sum would be saved in the cost of transportation.

If the Government should approve a railroad security, it would in effect, morally speaking, indorse it, and this high approval of the issue should make such a bond sell at the lowest rate of interest current for gilt-edge securities, thereby reducing the cost of transportation.

A quasi copartnership, without risk or cost to the Government, might be established through a Federal license or charter involving a profit-sharing plan for such interstate railroads as prefer to operate under a Federal charter. A national charter need not interfere with the authority of State railroad or public-utility commissions in supervision of intrastate business or State regulation, except as to the issue of interstate securities. These would come under Federal supervision only, and the Government would participate in the profits of the road under an equitable profit-sharing plan. The profits thus accruing to the Government could be distributed for the benefit of the various communities served by such railroad, as, for example, the upkeep of improved public highways.

The system of profit sharing of corporations and the public is proving successful and having a good effect upon all interests. I have one illustration particularly in mind. Prior to 1907 there was constant friction between the surface lines in Chicago and the city authorities as to extensions, facilities, service, and fares. All the surface lines on the North and West Sides were consolidated into one company, and all the lines on the South Side were owned by another company. Under a mutual understanding the city adopted a contract ordinance February 11, 1907, under which the city receives 55 per cent of the net revenue of the surface companies after deducting interest, taxes, discount on bonds, and a stipulated amount for depreciation and other contingencies.

Within the last few months the two companies have been permitted to unite in a plan of joint operation, under which unification all facilities are used for the general interest, and the companies are able to handle traffic in congested districts where much trouble and expense had theretofore existed. The city's portion of the net revenue, I am informed, at the present time has aggregated about $12,000,000, which, under the terms of the ordinance, must be expended for the improvement and extension of transportation facilities in the interest of the Chicago public. The success of this cooperative arrangement is further demonstrated by the fact that a passenger can ride farther for 5 cents in Chicago than in any other city. If this can be done with one of the largest city and interurban systems of the country is there any reason why the same principle can not be applied and as successfully carried out with a railroad engaged in interstate business? Evolution of public sentiment and consequent legislation is unmistakably tending this way. I believe that nothing short of a concrete experiment along profit-sharing lines will satisfactorily determine the question.

There are reasons why a working plan of this character with the Government is better for the people than Government ownership. Such a plan would tend to increase investments in railroad properties, and what is of more importance, would continue and encourage that strong individual initiative force which has been the most potent factor in the building up of this country.

Yours, very truly,

B. F. YOAKUM.

Mr. ADAMSON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. STEVENS] use some of his time now?

Mr. STEVENS of Minnesota. Mr. Chairman, will you notify me at the end of 30 minutes?

As one of the minority, I desire to express our entire sympathy with the general purpose of this legislation and our sympathy also with the spirit and sentiment of the debate thus far; but I also desire to notify the committee that when the bill was reported from the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce I then reserved the right to criticize and oppose the bill, if necessary, because I believed it was, and as it now stands is, inadequate for the purposes which we desire to make effective.

So this afternoon I will not indulge in discussion of the general subject, as the others have done, but I shall address myself particularly to the details of the bill before the committee and point out what seem to me radical defects in it, which must be corrected if effective legislation is to be written upon the statute books.

REPUBLICAN LEGISLATION.

Mr. Chairman, you must recall that this bill follows the line of legislation on the same subject heretofore proposed on the Republican side of this Chamber. As the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. ESCH] so strongly pointed out in his very able speech, a similar measure was made a part of the Mann-Elkins bill as it passed this House in 1910. When the bill providing for the physical valuation of railroads was before the House, the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN]—and I, in my humble way, sought to assist him—wanted to have inserted as a part of that bill, as I think should have been done, the same measure providing for the regulation by the Interstate Commerce Commission of stocks and bonds issued by common carriers. It is a necessary corollary to that legislation for the valuation of such carriers. You gentlemen on the Democratic side of the House objected on both occasions to such legislation as this. Instead of the Mann-Elkins provision as passed by the House, the Hadley Commission was appointed under the act of 1910, and I desire to call attention particularly to their report. It was not altogether in accord with the statement of my friend from Wisconsin [Mr. ESCH], because the Hadley Commission, as one of the strongest reasons in its recommendation for publicity of the proceedings of all carriers in issuing their securities, stated that it would seem at that time to be impossible that Congress would grant exclusive powers to the Interstate Commerce Commission to regulate this subject and exclude such regulatory powers from the State.

HADLEY COMMISSION.

The Hadley Commission stated, on page 12 of its very able report, that—

> If we were ready to substitute exclusive Federal control for the jurisdiction of the several States over their railroad corporations, much could be said in behalf of the establishment of a national authority to supervise both the issuance of stocks and bonds and the actual expenditure of their proceeds. But apart from the constitutional difficulties which might stand in the way of such a procedure, your commission is of the opinion that as a mere matter of expediency the time is not ripe for any such immediate or forcible transfer of jurisdiction.

Now, the world has moved in four years. You gentlemen on the other side of the House—and I congratulate you upon it—apparently have changed your opinions, so that now you are ready to vote solidly for a bill which does not allow the regulatory power of the State to be exercised on this subject but does confer such exclusive power to regulate the issuance of these securities upon the Interstate Commerce Commission. So that the very basis of the Hadley report has changed, and the time has now come when the results which the Hadley Commission stated as desirable to be accomplished can be had by the bill under consideration.

STATE COMMISSIONS.

Another wonderful thing has happened along similar lines during the last four years. Last October, the twenty-fifth annual convention of the railroad commissioners of the various States was held in Washington, and by a unanimous vote they adopted a resolution advocating exactly this kind of legislation, and expressing the desire that the power to regulate the issuance of stocks and bonds of interstate common carriers be delegated to the Interstate Commerce Commission. Of course all lawyers understand that unless otherwise expressed such power would be exclusive and supersede the States in such work. So the States have joined with you gentlemen in advising that this be done. The business associations all over the United States and very many of the managers of railroads appearing before our committee and in other places have advised that this sort of legislation be passed, granting exclusively such power to the Interstate Commerce Commission.

CONDITIONS OF POWER.

But, gentlemen, all of these various authorities—the Hadley Commission, the Association of State Railroad Commissioners, the managers of railroads, and the managers of large business institutions—all based their opinions and advice upon three preliminary conditions before this legislation should be effective. Those conditions were as follows:

First. That the power in the Interstate Commerce Commission must be exclusive and supersede the authority of the States. Practically the States themselves advocated such legislation as to interstate carriers.

Second. That the legislation should be practical and not prohibitive as to such issuances.

Third. That there should be proper administrative authority in the Federal Government to make this power effective. This bill fulfills the first requirement. It does make the power exclusive in the Interstate Commerce Commission. It does not fulfill the other two requirements. It is not practical. It is prohibitive, and there is not proper administrative authority provided for transacting the tremendously important business which must be done under the provisions of this bill. For these reasons, as the bill now stands, unamended, I am opposed to the measure.

Mr. RAGSDALE. Mr. Chairman——

The CHAIRMAN. For what purpose does the gentleman rise?

Mr. RAGSDALE. I make the point of no quorum.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will count. [After counting.] One hundred and two Members present, a quorum.

REQUIREMENTS OF COUNTRY.

Mr. STEVENS of Minnesota. Mr. Chairman, if the committee will consider the situation which now confronts the country, you will realize the necessity for those conditions. There have been issued and in the hands of investors outside of railroad holdings, up to and including the year 1913, approximately $15,294,625,146 worth of securities by the various railroad companies of the United States, covering 242,177 miles of railroad. There are about 10,000 miles more not included in these amounts of these securities. A little more than one-third of this amount is invested in stocks and a little less than two-thirds of such outstanding securities are bonds. The business prosperity and the material development of this country can not improve, we can not secure the degree of prosperity which we all desire, unless the carriers shall and can furnish adequate facilities for the transportation of the products and merchandise of this country. It will be of no avail for the farmers to produce their grain and fruit and meats if they can not speedily and cheaply reach the consumer. The miner can pile up his stores and the lumberman his timber or finished products; the manufacturer can work his mill in vain; unless these can all be transported where they should be to the best advantage of both the producer and ultimate consumer, so that the results of this measure in either assisting the proper financing of the common carrier for the welfare of the people or in increasing barriers and throwing burdens upon them, will go far toward the prosperity or injury to the country and its industries.

Mr. ADAMSON. Will the gentleman yield for a moment?

Mr. STEVENS of Minnesota. Certainly.

Mr. ADAMSON. It appears not to be generally understood that the House this morning by unanimous consent passed an order that when the House adjourns to-day general debate shall end. So, all who are scheduled for speeches must speak to-day, or they will not get to speak at all. Therefore, I want to request all Members to be present for a while, because every time the point of no quorum is made, if a quorum is not found to be present, we shall be delayed 40 minutes, and it may be 10 or 11 o'clock to-night before we can finish general debate. If we can keep a quorum here we will not be delayed.

Mr. STEVENS of Minnesota. Mr. Chairman, as I before stated, unless these facilities shall be furnished by the common carriers business can not be carried on properly or profitably. Our country can not develop; our communities and their industries will be dwarfed. So that it is of the utmost importance that these proper facilities be afforded, and that can not be done unless a proper system of financing be encouraged for the common carriers of the United States.

NEEDS FOR FUTURE.

It has been estimated by various authorities, and has been shown to our committee, that in the next few years there will be needed between $5,000,000,000 and $10,000,000,000 for the railroads to do this work properly, and it is the issue of this vast mass of securities which must be regulated by a measure of this kind, and it is the importance of the results to be attained by such issuances which must be constantly had in mind in the consideration of this measure. These carriers and their public work, these securities which they may issue, are only the means for our people utilizing themselves and their resources and their localities to the best advantage. It is of the greatest necessity for our people that we provide such resources and not prohibit their issuance or use by unwise or too restrictive provisions. We must be practical and meet world-wide conditions as we find them. We can not make them over as we would. The difficulty is not with the general principle of this bill. Nearly everybody agrees with that. The real difficulty is with its details as to whether they really provide the protection we desire to extend over the issuance of securities, at the same time not burdening or unduly restricting such issuance and consequent development.

DIFFICULTIES IN SUBJECT.

So, Mr. Chairman, there are serious difficulties in arranging the details of a measure of this kind. It is an easy thing to state, as some of the gentlemen have assumed, that we can pass a bill granting the Interstate Commerce Commission the exclusive authority to regulate railroad securities without realizing the practical difficulties which are embraced within that problem. Remember that at the present time there is no market at all for railroad securities. As you have read the newspapers for the last few weeks you will notice that practically no railroad stocks and bonds can be sold. Only short-time notes can be disposed of, which is an extremely dangerous sort of financing for the great railroad corporations, because no one can foretell what may be the situation at their maturity.

If they can not be met at maturity, the carriers must go into a receivership, and that means injury and possibly disaster to the general business of the country. Such an occurrence may paralyze the credit of even the strongest institution. We note, too, that many more bonds than stocks are issued and sold by railroads. This is a menace also, because these fixed charges must be met under all conditions or a receivership occurs. It should be for the real interest, then, of the people for our legislation to encourage financing as much as possible by legitimate stock issues, then of bonds, and lastly by means of notes.

At the very outset, if we pass legislation giving the Interstate Commerce Commission the right to regulate the issuance of securities, we will be met by two constitutional propositions which must be settled before any such law can be made effective, and securities sold under it.

No prudent investor will buy a share of stock or a bond with a lawsuit attached to it. He must know beyond question that such security is entirely legal and valid and can not and will not be attacked.

So before any of these securities under this act can be made available or can be sold in the markets of the world, these constitutional questions must be settled by the Supreme Court of the United States. These questions are as follows:

CONSTITUTIONAL QUESTIONS.

First. Can Congress, under the commerce clause of the Constitution, grant the exclusive power to the Interstate Commerce Commission to regulate the financial affairs, including issuance of its securities, of State corporations engaged in interstate or foreign commerce? Second. Is the language of the act in question sufficiently definite to so do, and at the same time to establish proper basis and standards and scope of action for the commission to carry out the legislative will in these respects? Remember that the State is the creator of these corporations. It regulates how they shall exist, how their securities shall be issued, in what manner and how they shall be sold; and I think ten or a dozen States have provided in their constitutions minimum prices for them.

You note how important it is to have that matter settled speedily and certainly. Has Congress the right to delegate to the Interstate Commerce Commission the power to override or supersede these requirements of the constitutions of possibly 48 States?

Mr. TOWNER. Will the gentleman yield right there?

Mr. STEVENS of Minnesota. Certainly.

Mr. TOWNER. In any given case where a corporation issues its stock or its bonds and the matter is submitted to the Interstate Commerce Commission for their approval and the commission makes that approval, how in any event can the question be raised as to the validity of the issuance of the stock and bonds?

Mr. STEVENS of Minnesota. The question of right of the commission to act at all and its right to supersede contradictory State action, of course, can arise, and I presume could be tested in several ways. If the approval be granted by the commission, then the question of such approval can be tested by a proceeding as to whether or not it is valid as an authorized act under the Constitution, also as against some conflicting requirement of the State constitution or of the statutes under it.

Mr. TOWNER. The gentleman will recognize that the only question he stated was as to the validity of the issuance, and that has been determined.

Mr. STEVENS of Minnesota. I should have said the validity of the issuance and the approval.

Mr. TOWNER. I think the gentleman is correct in stating it in that form. If it be approved by the Interstate Commerce Commission, the issue goes upon the market, and how can that question be tested? The corporation will not test it for it is anxious to put them on the market. No person who purchases the bonds could object to the approval by the Interstate Commerce Commission because that adds to the validity of the security.

Mr. STEVENS of Minnesota. Any State authority or stockholder or creditor of the railroad could test it.

Mr. TOWNER. How could the question be raised?

Mr. STEVENS of Minnesota. By an injunction against the financial officers as to the right to issue the bonds, because they had not complied with some requirement of the State laws.

Mr. TOWNER. Yes; but that would be before they were placed on the market.

Mr. STEVENS of Minnesota. There would be no market for such securities if these two questions that I speak of remain unsettled. There can be no market until these things are cleared beyond question.

Mr. MADDEN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. STEVENS of Minnesota. Certainly.

Mr. MADDEN. Would a railroad proposing to issue securities first submit their right to do so to the State which created the corporation?

Mr. STEVENS of Minnesota. No; that depends on the scope and terms of this bill, as I have stated. But the carrier coming before the Interstate Commerce Commission would have to show its organization, necessarily. This would be done under the State law. Then upon that basis the securities would be issued upon which the approval of the Interstate Commerce Commission must be obtained.

Mr. MADDEN. Does this bill propose to take the power away from the States?

Mr. STEVENS of Minnesota. Practically. The bill provides that the State commission shall be summoned or notified, so that it may make any sort of a showing before the Interstate Commerce Commission it sees fit.

Mr. MADDEN. If the State commission protested and the Interstate Commerce Commission overruled the protest, then the protest would be of no avail?

Mr. STEVENS of Minnesota. That is correct; it would not.

Mr. TOWNER. In cases where the States require corporations which have been granted franchise in their domain that before they can issue stocks and bonds they must secure the approval of the State commission, would not it be requisite that they should first secure the approval of the State commission, and then afterwards that of the Interstate Commerce Commission?

Mr. STEVENS of Minnesota. Not at all; it is within the power of the Interstate Commerce Commission to do as it pleases. If it does not care to consider the requirements or protests of the States, it need not do so; that is, if the Federal statute be broad enough to cover the similar legislation of the States. In such cases the Interstate Commerce Commission would be supreme and the States must acquiesce.

Mr. CANTOR. Would it not be subject to review by the courts?

Mr. STEVENS of Minnesota. Not as to the merits of the application, if the Federal act be clear and comprehensive. That is one of the questions I am raising, a question that will have to be settled before the securities can be marketed.

Mr. TOWNER. This is the point I had in mind: Would it not be necessary, if the law is passed, to secure the approval of the State commission and the Interstate Commerce Commission?

Mr. STEVENS of Minnesota. No. That is, if the Federal law be broad enough to cover the general subject, as I think this may.

Mr. TOWNER. Does this bill take away the necessity where such State authority exists for securing the approval of the State commission?

Mr. STEVENS of Minnesota. Yes; entirely within its scope. That is, I think that the State authority is not necessary so far as this legislation extends.

Mr. TOWNER. I am very glad to have the gentleman's idea.

Mr. GARNER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. STEVENS of Minnesota. Yes.

Mr. GARNER. We have a law in Texas that prohibits a railroad company doing business in that State and issuing stocks or bonds without the permission of the railway commission. We also have a law saying that a railroad can not do business in that State unless it is domiciled there, unless it has officials there. Does this bill take away from the State of Texas the right to limit the issuance of stocks and bonds on railroads that do business in the State of Texas?

Mr. STEVENS of Minnesota. No; it does this: A Texas corporation desiring to do interstate business, which most of them must do, and issuing its securities must go to the Interstate Commerce Commission and get its authority, and it makes no difference in such a case what the authorities of the State of Texas decide or do.

Mr. GARNER. But our State constitution provides that every railroad in Texas, regardless of whether it is part of an interstate line, must have its domicile in Texas and be a Texas corporation, and wherever it reaches the line it ceases to be a Texas corporation, although it is doing interstate business, but not interstate business in so far as the Texas line is concerned.

Mr. STEVENS of Minnesota. A great many States so provide. The gentleman has stated what a dozen States provide. My understanding of this bill is that the railroad in Texas, if it desires to do an interstate business and issue stocks or bonds, must come to the Interstate Commerce Commission and get its approval of its securities; and it makes no difference what the State commission of Texas may or may not do, or what the constitution or laws of the State of Texas may prescribe as to the conditions covered by the Federal law. Suppose the State of Texas should provide that these bonds must be sold at par—as I think the State has some such requirement—the Interstate Commerce Commission may make an order that it makes no difference what may be the price at which the stock is sold; and if the Texas commission makes any order to the contrary, the authority of the Texas commission is void as against the order of the Interstate Commerce Commission when it has authority to act on that point. I want to show gentlemen the extent of this legislation. When it is comprehensive, as it should and must be to be practical, it completely obliterates the power of the States in so far as that power conflicts with the power granted in this bill. This bill is not and should not be supplementary to the authority of the States, as suggested by the gentleman from Iowa, Judge TOWNER; it is not supplementary to the authority of the State, as suggested by the gentleman from Texas, Mr. GARNER. It is exclusive. It wipes them all out, so far as the issuance of the securities of any railroad entering into interstate commerce is concerned; and my own opinion is that it may cover all commerce, because the two can not well be separated; and the only public authority needed for the issuance is that provided in this bill, from the Interstate Commerce Commission.

Mr. GARNER. I would like to know whether the Interstate Commerce Commission would have the power to determine the price at which securities should be sold? That is left to the States?

Mr. STEVENS of Minnesota. No. Practically, it might, but it is for the Federal authority to decide the policy. There is nothing in this bill that makes any such regulation. We carefully omitted that. We thought it was not wise under the circumstances to go into that field, and I doubt if the States under this would have any regulative authority which would conflict with this provision; that is, if the regulatory direction of the States burdened the issuance so it would directly interfere with interstate commerce it would be void.

Mr. GARNER. Let me put a concrete case: For instance, we have in the State of Texas doing business the Missouri, Kansas & Texas of Texas. Then there is the Missouri, Kansas & Texas, which leaves St. Louis and has a terminal at Galveston. The Missouri, Kansas & Texas, as known throughout the country, is a part of the same line, but that portion in Texas is the Missouri, Kansas & Texas of Texas. If the railroad commission of Texas should refuse to permit them to issue stocks and bonds on the Missouri, Kansas & Texas of Texas, could they come to the Interstate Commerce Commission here and get permission to issue stocks and bonds on the entire line, including that portion in Texas?

Mr. STEVENS of Minnesota. Oh, yes; the railroad company could come to the Interstate Commerce Commission under this act and get its approval for the issuance of stocks and bonds on the Texas portion alone or on the whole railroad covering the Texas portion. That is what this bill is for. The Texas commission would be summoned and object, but that would not be fatal to the order of the Federal commission.

Mr. ADAMSON. Mr. Chairman, if the gentleman will permit, he is at this time on a question incident to the discussion of this matter every time it has ever come up, and he will pardon me for calling attention to the fact that while he announces his interpretation of this law there are a number of us who entertain a quite different interpretation of the effect of it. If we could unanimously agree on what it should be, we could not agree on a bill at all, for we would go to one extreme or the other, and we never could have reported a bill. We have agreed to let each side put its own interpretation upon this feature of the bill, and then let the court decide in the end what it is. Having said that much, I desire to ask the gentleman touching a matter that he passed a moment ago, and that was the character of the order of the commission as to approving or disallowing bonds. I say it is a veto power and the gentleman says it is an initiatory power. If the commission should arbitrarily, contrary to the evidence presented, the weight and truth of the matter, refuse to approve an issue, does not the gentleman think the corporation making the application would have its right to redress in the courts?

Mr. STEVENS of Minnesota. Yes; if such a case be presented; and yet there is a discretion left to that commission within certain limits, and the courts have no jurisdiction to tell the commission how that discretion shall be exercised. If the courts attempt to direct that commission how it shall exercise its discretion, then the courts are legislating. But if the commission exercises its discretion without any regard to the facts, then the courts have the right to compel the commission to regard the facts; or if the commission shall act without any material facts as a basis for its action, then the courts may interfere. Such cases are the main jurisdiction of the courts against the commission.

Mr. ADAMSON. If the corporation files its application and proves the facts to be within the terms laid down in this bill which we are about to enact into law, then has the commission any discretion to refuse to sanction it if the application and the evidence come up to the terms prescribed as conditions on which it shall be approved, and can not mandamus be sued out against the commission if it refuses?

Mr. STEVENS of Minnesota. Mr. Chairman, if that be true, then this bill is of no value to anybody. If that be true, then this commission is nothing but a rubber stamp, and, as the State commissioners unanimously voted, would do more harm than good to the railroads of this country and to the business affairs of this country. Unless you give this commission some discretion, especially on this point, then this bill or any similar bill is worthless. Such power is necessary to the proper performance of its service to the public. Who is to decide the pivotal question as to whether there should be such issuance from the public standpoint and for the public welfare? The commissioners are to decide that, not the court. That is the very substance of their discretion and the reason for their action. They know the facts, have the experience, and this bill gives them the power. Look at its provisions, "tending to impair the financial ability to carry out and discharge its duties." Who is to determine that point as to whether such issue would impair the ability of the carrier? Who should have protected the public in the Alton case and in the Pere Marquette case? It would be discretion not of the court but of the commission. If the commission renders a decision that its approval is based on the facts, and it must have the facts before it, the decision of the commission is final and not subject to review. The court can not act as an appellate tribunal in such case. It can only ascertain whether the commission complied with and kept within the law. Unless that power does exist, unless we give them that authority with such safeguards, then this bill will not be worth the paper it is written on and we better abandon the whole subject.

Mr. TOWNER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. STEVENS of Minnesota. I will.

Mr. TOWNER. I have a very high opinion of the gentleman's legal knowledge and especially with reference to these questions, and I know it to be much more extensive than my own. Let me state this particular question to the gentleman and then I will ask what he thinks about it. Suppose the Illinois Central Railroad is an Illinois corporation. Suppose the Illinois law is that before any corporation can issue stocks and bonds it must secure the approval of the Illinois State Railway Commission. Now, suppose the Illinois Central Railroad should make their application to the commission for the issuance of stocks and bonds and it is refused. Then they make application to the Interstate Commerce Commission and it is granted. Did I understand the gentleman to say that this would empower the corporation to issue the stocks and bonds?

Mr. STEVENS of Minnesota. Certainly. Unless Congress will give the Interstate Commerce Commission this power, as I said, the bill is not good for anything, and the business interests and people of this country will correspondingly be injured by this supplementary unwise restriction.

Mr. TOWNER. That is the reason I was making the inquiry. Let me ask the gentleman this: Could not the Illinois State commission bring an action in the State court by injunction against a corporation which has its existence in the State of Illinois against the issuance of stocks and bonds contrary to the provisions of their law?

Mr. STEVENS of Minnesota. Clearly they would have the right to do it, and just such an action probably will test the provisions of this measure, both as to the right of Congress to grant such power and as to whether the powers granted be sufficient to accomplish these results.

Mr. TOWNER. In that case what would be supreme?

Mr. STEVENS of Minnesota. Then it is for the United States Supreme Court to determine, and that is exactly the proposition I address to this committee. My own judgment is that unless in a case exactly like that the authority of the Interstate Commerce Commission is supreme, and the Illinois commission has no authority in conflict with it, then this bill is not worth anything, and Congress has no power at all to legislate as to the issuance of securities. That is the point which is fundamental and must be settled first of all. Let us view a case which is extreme, more extreme than that of the gentleman from Iowa, if you will allow me.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman has consumed 30 minutes.

Mr. STEVENS of Minnesota. I yield myself 15 minutes more. If you will allow me to follow a case still more extreme, which, I think, appears in the testimony before the committee. The Southern Railroad is a corporation of the State of Virginia, and the law of Virginia provides for a limit on the amount of stock; for example, as an illustration, say, $20,000 a mile and bonds of, say, $20,000 a mile, which can be issued upon that railway, and that limit has been reached in the issues. Now, the States of Alabama, Georgia, North Carolina, and South Carolina have commissions which require, or, rather, have jurisdiction to compel, or have commissions which have charge of the physical service and the operation of railroads, and so forth, and such commissions make orders compelling the Southern Railroad to install grade crossings and to construct certain bridges and make certain permanent improvements, which require more capital. The Interstate Commerce Commission is given authority to do similar things in the interest of interstate commerce. All of these commissions make these orders and serve them on the Southern Railroad Co. to compel such work in the interest of commerce. That railroad company answers, "We have not any authority in our charter from the State of Virginia to issue more stock or more bonds, and the State of Virginia will not grant us any such authority; but we will do the best we can." So the company provides for an issue and appears before the Interstate Commerce Commission. Remember that its authority under the law of Virginia is exhausted. It comes to the Interstate Commerce Commission and asks authority to issue $5,000 more of stock or bonds per mile over and above what the law of Virginia authorizes it to issue. Unless Congress has authority to grant that request in some way to the Southern Railroad for the purpose of protecting and helping interstate commerce, then our power is worthless and we might as well quit trying to regulate carriers and their securities. There is no pretense such power is given in the present bill, but it must come some day. I desire to call attention to these cold facts about the railroads and their probable financing in the future.

I think it is also my duty to direct attention to the great political and economic change which must follow the enactment of such a measure, and all authorities and all commissions of this country have got to face it by the passage of this measure. My contention and that of those who believe in the exclusive power of the Federal Government is that unless the Interstate Commerce Commission be granted authority by appropriate legislation to grant the Southern Railroad the right to issue that additional $5,000 a mile, notwithstanding it has exceeded the authority of the State of Virginia, then this law can not be made worth the paper upon which it is written. Remember that the Federal Government has a complete right of visitation over the interstate business of this State corporation. It also has the perfect right to create a Federal corporation to do the same work. These are sovereign powers of the Federal Government for which there is no limitation in the Constitution. It seems to me these can be combined or used separately or applied to a State corporation to accomplish a public purpose provided by the Federal Constitution. Unless Congress can do these things it is not sovereign as to interstate commerce.

Now I will yield to the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. SCOTT].

Mr. SCOTT. Mr. Chairman, my colleague from Iowa [Mr. TOWNER] indicated a case where application had been made to the State commission and that commission had refused the application, and then they had made it to the Interstate Commerce Commission, and that commission sought to act, and the State commission then challenged the right of the Interstate Commerce Commission in the court, and I understood the gentleman from Minnesota to say then it would be a question for the United States Supreme Court. Now this question occurs to me, What question would be for the United States Supreme Court? Would it not be a question of power of this Interstate Commerce Commission rather than the question of exercising that power, and if the Supreme Court of the United States held that the Interstate Commerce Commission, under this bill, had the power, would it not stop there and rest the discretion in the commission?

Mr. STEVENS of Minnesota. That is it, exactly; the gentleman has caught and stated the point. If the Supreme Court once determines that Congress has the power to vest such authority in the commission, then it must ascertain the extent we have done so. After that has been clearly laid down, then within such limits the commission would be supreme as far as exercising its discretion upon the facts presented.

Mr. SCOTT. Then, what would be the determination of the fact if the power of the State commission was wiped out?

Mr. STEVENS of Minnesota. The determination as to interstate commerce must rest with the Federal authority. It is exclusive where there is a conflict. The gentleman has stated it clearly and precisely and, I think, accurately.

Mr. GARNER. You have undertaken to give in this bill the Interstate Commerce Commission that power indicated by the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. SCOTT].

Mr. STEVENS of Minnesota. I think so, clearly, notifying the State commissions that they must come before the Interstate Commerce Commission and make their showing, and the Federal commission may determine the proper course after all the interests are before it.

Mr. CLINE. I want to ask whether this whole proposition is predicated on the case of Gibbon versus Ogden, Ninth Wheaton, where Chief Justice Marshall said the Federal Government under the interstate-commerce clause of the Constitution should not divide its empire with the States when it once took jurisdiction of the subject matter under the interstate-commerce clause?

Mr. STEVENS of Minnesota. I think the gentleman is correct, and unless he is right I think we need spend no further time on this bill. Not only that, but where State regulations as to intrastate matters directly burden or interfere with interstate commerce—in such cases also the State authority must yield to the national.

Mr. ADAMSON. Has the gentleman from Minnesota completed his argument on the bill? There are one or two other things to which I wish to call his attention after he has finished his line of argument.

Mr. STEVENS of Minnesota. These various interrogations illustrate what I stated to the committee, that before a decision be made with respect to the securities which can be marketed under this bill these various matters must be determined by the Supreme Court, so that it is important that this bill first be framed so that these fundamental propositions will be litigated in the best possible, clearest, and most expeditious way; and, secondly, while they are being litigated the power of the Interstate Commerce Commission as to publicity of such matters shall not be impaired.

DEFECTS OF BILL.

Under the pending bill there are two difficulties: First, it is composed, as you will notice, of only one section. If for any reason—and I think there are three reasons why this section is unconstitutional—if for any reason this section be declared unconstitutional, it eliminates the whole bill, which contains much new and excellent legislation. So for that reason the measure ought to be redrafted so that it can present concisely the propositions we have been discussing. In the meantime there should accompany it adequate provisions along the line of publicity, something as outlined in the report of the Hadley Commission. This is essential, because the Supreme Court has held, and very clearly, that publicity of affairs and the supervision of accounts and reports does not depend upon the interstate-commerce clause.

The commission has a plenary authority of the sovereign power of the United States to ascertain the necessary facts so that public affairs can be properly acted upon. So it is not limited by the commerce clause, and we can place such provisions in one section and secure the publicity advised by the Hadley Commission and outlined so ably by the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. ESCH]. This section need not be tested in the courts, because there is no question about its validity. Then we can put in another provision covering the questions as to regulation and draft it carefully, making it broad and practical and comprehensive, so that it shall be tested as to those propositions as it ought to be, as shown by our debate.

Mr. TOWNER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. STEVENS of Minnesota. I will.

Mr. TOWNER. I called the attention of the chairman of the committee to that matter, and he told me that the committee had, at least, under contemplation, a redraft of the bill according to the gentleman's idea.

Mr. ADAMSON. That is the matter about which I wish to interrogate the gentleman when he completes his argument. I did not want to interrupt his argument.

Mr. STEVENS of Minnesota. I yield to the gentleman from Georgia.

Mr. ADAMSON. If you have finished the argument.

Mr. STEVENS of Minnesota. I have finished that part of it.

Mr. ADAMSON. I have noticed the able presentation of the case by the gentleman from Minnesota—and he never makes any other kind—and I observe with pleasure that he is in accord with us on most of the propositions. He appears to be perfectly satisfied with his theory as to that part of the bill which authorizes action by the Interstate Commerce Commission. If he is satisfied with it, I am. I have noted the gentleman's objections, both here and on the committee, and I have, in conjunction with other members of the committee, looked over the bill, and I think a committee substitute would be offered if it were acceptable to the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. STEVENS]. So I ask the gentleman if he has had time to examine the tentative substitute which I tendered to him, in which the suggestion he has just made as to the division of the bill into two sections has been provided for?

Mr. STEVENS of Minnesota. Is that the question of the gentleman?

Mr. ADAMSON. I ask him if he has had time to examine it, and if it would not largely modify his objections to the bill if that substitute were adopted?

Mr. STEVENS of Minnesota. I think this committee is entitled to know the interesting experiences we have had. I did inform the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce of my objections to the pending measure much as I have stated them here, and in cooperation with our distinguished chairman and with the distinguished leader, Mr. MANN, and with the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. ESCH] I prepared a substitute to cover these objections, which substitute I hold in my hand and which is printed and I planned to offer to the bill under consideration. This morning I was served by the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. ADAMSON] with a substitute which he has prepared, and I will have to admit that many of the objections I make to the measure are removed and met by his substitute. They were included in my substitute, much the same as he has included in his. He has stolen my thunder again. [Laughter.]

Yes, Mr. Chairman, he has segregated the propositions which we have just been discussing. I still contend that there are two or three other important propositions which he has not met and I do not believe can be successfully met. Three constitutional ghosts which I have discerned lingering about the old bill are allayed, so far as they can be, by the substitute. The main and important question which we have discussed is presented in his substitute in a concrete section, No. 20a, and so it leaves the publicity features in section 20, to which there is no practical or constitutional objection, so that they must remain in force even if section 20a be declared unconstitutional.

Mr. FESS. That is an interesting statement. Is it possible to pronounce a section of a law unconstitutional without the whole law failing, under the Constitution?

Mr. STEVENS of Minnesota. Yes, sir. I think the subject matter is so separated that the courts would recognize such a situation—that one subject did not at all depend upon the enactment of the other subject; that there are two entirely different constitutional cases for the two sections—one is to render the general sovereign power to ascertain the facts necessary for proper public action; the other is the enforcement of the commerce clause. In such cases that is done. When we come to discuss the substitute presented by the gentleman under the five-minute rule there will be some very interesting debate, I think, on some objections which I shall make as to that. It does not meet quite the situation which I think ought to be met. But the general propositions which we on this side have advocated and the general purposes to be covered by such legislation and the general results to be secured are met and covered very well by the proposed substitute of the gentleman from Georgia.

The original bill as it stands on the calendar does not include adequately many things which are necessary for the welfare of the country. The gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. MOORE] raised the point about organization and reorganization of railroads. I do not think either of these can be accomplished under the bill as it stands on the calendar, and I have some question whether the substitute of the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. ADAMSON] meets that proposition. I have some doubt whether the railroads now in the hands of receivers, like the Wabash and the Frisco and the Pere Marquette and others, can be reorganized and issue securities for that very desirable purpose under the provisions of the substitute of the gentleman from Georgia, and I commend that to his consideration before he finally offers his substitute. I have very much doubt whether he has confined the business to be done under this bill to the commerce clause of the Constitution as required by the employers' liability cases. I commend that to his attention, because if we have any regulative power at all it must be under the commerce clause of the Constitution; and that has been construed to be dealing with interstate commerce and a commerce that is incidental to it, and I doubt if he has met that proposition in his substitute.

Mr. ADAMSON. I will state to the gentleman, Mr. Chairman, that those words were left out of this committee print by inadvertence, and I shall confer with the gentleman about restoring them.

Mr. STEVENS of Minnesota. That is the difficulty. Hole after hole is plugged up on which I expected to make a great speech.

Mr. ADAMSON. The reason I live and move and study is to try to learn something, and I have as much right to profit by the wisdom of the gentleman from Minnesota as from any other source of knowledge of which I know. And while I am interrupting the gentleman I wish to state that I have some copies of that tentative substitute, if any gentleman wants them. Of course, it is not perfected yet.

Mr. STEVENS of Minnesota. Now, Mr. Chairman, those of you who shall study that substitute should understand that an interstate carrier—and remember, by the word "carrier," as the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. ESCH] has defined it, under the interstate-commerce acts, are included pipe lines, and sleeping-car companies, and express companies, and telegraph companies, and telephone companies, and cable companies—that all of them must have the right to issue securities under such a measure as this in the right kind of a way. So I ask the members of this committee to consider the substitute with that situation in mind and reflect as to whether such a measure grants to those companies the right to ask an approval by the commission for an issue of securities in order to adequately conduct their business. The original bill did not allow carriers to issue securities to improve their water lines or facilities as to navigation. It did not allow any improvement of their hotels on parks or real estate not used directly for railroad purposes. This would prevent the Flagler line improving Florida, the Santa Fe its hotels, the New York Central its valuable properties over its New York terminals, and the Great Northern, Northern Pacific, and Union Pacific the facilities in Yellowstone and Glacier Parks. It would mean a very great deprivation to our people.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Minnesota has consumed 45 minutes.

Mr. STEVENS of Minnesota. I shall proceed for 10 minutes more, Mr. Chairman.

You realize, gentlemen of the committee, that the State commissioners, when they passed that resolution concerning interstate commerce, demanded that there should be three requisites—first, exclusiveness; second, practicability; and third, proper administration—knew what they were about. They knew that all of those conditions were absolutely necessary for the success of such a measure; otherwise such an act might be a disaster instead of a benefit to the country. You realize, too, from our discussion that the bill as originally recommended by the committee was impractical and would so restrict operations as to be of much injury to our people. It did not meet the situation required by the State commissions.

I will now address myself briefly to the second and last point raised by the State commissions and ascertain whether that situation has been met by the existing legislation. I will read from the report of the last convention of the State commissions, which met in Washington in October last. Mr. Maltbie, of New York, made this statement, and I think probably a dozen State commissioners made similar statements. Mr. Maltbie said:

There are two or three things about this subject that have struck me rather forcibly. I start with the major premise that ineffective, incomplete, inefficient control of securities by governmental authority is worse than no control whatever.

PROPER CONTROL NECESSARY.

Mr. Chairman, you realize that it is incumbent upon us to provide proper administration in this legislation for the issuance of securities. There is not a word in this bill or in this substitute giving the Interstate Commerce Commission any additional facilities or assistance to supervise this most important legislation. I believe every one of you who has served on the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce and who knows the tremendous labors and responsibilities of the Interstate Commerce Commission is proud of that commission, of the work that has been done and the results which have been obtained by it. We are jealous of its reputation. We know that the welfare and the contentment of this country are in very large part dependent on the wise and patriotic exercise of the tremendous power of that commission, and we should not do anything which would impair its powers or its beneficent influence throughout the country. We must uphold its hands, because it is that commission and the tremendous authority which is vested in it which keeps the different sections of the country in accord with the other. Our country is so diverse and tremendous, our business interests are so intricate and complicated, that we must have just such a commission as this to compose the differences of opinion and of interests which necessarily arise between different sections and parts of our country; and for that reason we must be extremely jealous to know that that commission shall be maintained in all its powers and opportunities and prestige.

IMPAIRS COMMISSION.

I am afraid that this measure as it stands will tend to diminish these, for this reason: The Interstate Commerce Commission has a great diversity of business, and it has a splendid organization to do its work. I think those of us who have some acquaintance with it are very proud of that organization and very proud of the results that have been obtained by it. But you all realize that a very considerable part, and practically all of the details, as is proper, of its work, is done by subordinates, and only the ultimate results come before the commissioners themselves.

Most of the work is necessarily done by examiners, who go into the field or wherever it may be necessary. They have authority under the law to take such testimony. They practically write up the cases, and very many of the opinions of the commission are practically outlined by these examiners. That is causing some complaint among those who have business with the commission throughout the country, because they think they do not get sufficient personal attention from the commission. I have myself heard from many shippers and shippers' organizations in different sections of the country who complain that they can not get quite the satisfactory sort of hearing to which they think they are entitled. One examiner takes the testimony; a commissioner hears the argument and finally determines the matter from rather a superficial consideration of it. The matter is so vast, the amount of business is so great, that there is but slight opportunity for a rehearing if the commission happens to make a mistake. But, fortunately, the orders of the commission under the law are limited as to time. They extend not to exceed two years, and then, after that, a rehearing can be had as a matter of right upon proper application, so that the subject of these complaints is only a temporary situation, though it may very seriously affect large sections of our country, large business, industrial, and economic interests, and may seriously affect the welfare and contentment of millions of people. But with the issues of securities the situation is entirely different. The issuance of railroad securities is a permanent matter. It has become so at the present time all over the world that when a public carrier, a railroad carrier, issues its securities they remain a permanent and perpetual charge against that property which probably never will be finally discharged. The result is that this very important work of supervising and approving such issues can not be done by boys; it can not be done by examiners. It must be done by the commissioners themselves. If it is not done by the commissioners, then the authority is practically worthless. The public, the investors, the carriers, have a right to look to this approval as carrying some weight. Unless it so does it is of no use. So this proceeding must not be perfunctory, and must be personal in the highest degree. It must be the result of their most mature wisdom, experience, and character, based upon the facts presented. This must necessarily be the personal act of the commissioners.

What this bill contemplates, what the States contemplate in yielding their authority, what these great business interests contemplate in coming before the commission, is that the vast wisdom, the experience, the ability, the high character of that commission shall be put into its certificate of approval. Unless that is done that certificate of approval is worthless. The result is that this matter can not be delegated. Remember, most of the work nowadays is delegated—necessarily delegated. This work can not be delegated, because the country has the right to demand that these vast powers shall be exercised by men who are responsible and by those in whom the country has confidence. Unless that is done the authority and the prestige of the commission will begin to be diminished.

NO EXISTING MACHINERY.

Now, if we do not grant better machinery I fear that the commissioners can not do that work. They can not delegate it, and we serve notice right now that this work must not be delegated to subordinates in the way in which the ordinary work of the commission is done. It must be performed by the commissioners themselves in order to get any results out of this bill. If it be performed by the commissioners themselves, I very much fear that the other business of the commission will not be adequately cared for. I very much fear that the welfare of your localities, that transportation interests all over the United States, business interests all over the United States, will be sacrificed to that extent in order to care for the burdens of this bill. If that is brought about and the transportation and business interests shall be sacrificed to that extent, that means that a prejudice will gradually arise against the commission and its work; that its prestige will be diminished; that its influence will be impaired. No one must underrate what that will mean in this vast country of ours. Our communities and localities are intensely energetic and seeking to advance and successfully compete with their rivals. Transportation is the lifeblood of these tremendous activities, and its facilities, safety, and fairness must be the basis of all progress and contentment everywhere. Bitter contentions must arise between these conflicting and competing interests, which must be composed and settled by this commission. So long as they all feel that they have a suitable and adequate forum for their disputes, can have a fair chance and a fair hearing, the vanquished will not much complain. But if the notion becomes prevalent, as it is being started, that inexperienced, irresponsible subordinates are doing this work and the real men necessarily can not do it, because of the multifarious burdens upon them, then you will have a real grievance and a real trouble to compose which will tax your best energies. So that it is of importance first of all to know that this work will be properly done, and at the same time that the other work of the commission will be properly performed.

Mr. BURKE of South Dakota. I should like to ask the gentleman to tell us how he would compel and require the members of the commission to do this work personally.

Mr. STEVENS of Minnesota. My substitute contains such a provision, which is not contained in the substitute of the gentleman from Georgia.

Mr. BURKE of South Dakota. Would the substitute, if adopted, prevent their delegating the work as they do to-day, as the gentleman has stated? These examiners in fact do much of the work of the commission, but in the final outcome it is the work of the commission, and the country so understands it, does it not?

Mr. STEVENS of Minnesota. Yes.

Mr. BURKE of South Dakota. Would it not be the same with this other work?

Mr. STEVENS of Minnesota. I think not. I think the commission must understand that this work necessarily must be personal. This work is so important, so tremendous, so intricate, that it must be personal and can not be delegated to examiners as other work must be, and for that reason I call attention to it.

Now, if this work is not adequately done, then remember that the statements made by the State commissions will have tremendous force throughout the country, and this legislation will be an injury rather than a benefit. Such action will mislead people, will mislead investors, will mislead shippers, and the benefits which the people have the right to expect of a bill like this will not be realized. The substitute proposed by the gentleman from Georgia and my substitute set forth the basis of what the people have a right to expect. They want to know that the issuance of securities approved by the commission shall be for the purposes of the public work of the carrier and not for the personal advantage of the officials. They have the right to know that such issuance will be of real and proportional benefit to the carrier and not tend to impair its ability to perform its public functions. Minor officials can not judge these important conclusions; only officials of broad views, experience, and wisdom can do so. Unless you can have such judgment, the public, the investors, and the carriers will be disappointed and deceived.

Mr. GOODWIN of Arkansas. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. STEVENS of Minnesota. Yes.

Mr. GOODWIN of Arkansas. In your opinion would the Interstate Commerce Commission have power and authority to pass upon the securities of an intrastate road unless the road or its traffic had relation to interstate commerce?

Mr. STEVENS of Minnesota. No.

Mr. GOODWIN of Arkansas. It would not under the decision of the Minnesota rate case?

Mr. STEVENS of Minnesota. No; unless it entered into or directly affected interstate commerce in some way.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has again expired.

Mr. STEVENS of Minnesota. Five minutes more, Mr. Chairman.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Minnesota is recognized for five minutes.

Mr. TOWNER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. STEVENS of Minnesota. Yes.

Mr. TOWNER. This matter is of very great importance. Will the gentleman who has called attention to it take time to tell us how he obviates that difficulty in his substitute?

Mr. STEVENS of Minnesota. Yes. I provide for two additional commissioners, making nine Interstate Commerce Commissioners in all. Then I provide that the commission may delegate this authority provided in this bill to a decision of three commissioners. In other words, these two which may be additional and one of the present commission shall have the power to exercise this authority. This is not a permanent arrangement, but temporary, under the orders of the commission until a better method shall be devised. As it is now, practically one commissioner exercises such authority. This provision of mine would give the personal views and authority of three. I think that is a temporary way to work it out until something better can be found.

Mr. TOWNER. I will say to the gentleman that everybody realizes the fact that the Interstate Commerce Commission is now overworked, and everybody must realize that this would entail a very large additional burden upon them; and I think the gentleman is right in saying that something must be done in order to meet that condition.

Mr. GARRETT of Texas. Will the gentleman from Minnesota yield?

Mr. STEVENS of Minnesota. Yes.

Mr. GARRETT of Texas. I understood the gentleman to say a few moments ago that the committee had avoided the question of leaving to the commission the power to fix the price at which these securities should sell. Now, does not the gentleman think it would at least be wise for Congress to enact a law providing whether these securities shall be sold at par, or to fix a figure below par below which they shall not be sold? Would we not protect the investors of the country in that way, instead of lodging that discretion entirely with the commission? The gentleman knows that many of the States have fixed the price at which the securities shall be sold. Would it not be well for us at least to put some limit on this discretion?

Mr. STEVENS of Minnesota. No, Mr. Chairman, at the present time I think not, for two reasons: In the first place, the interests of this country are so diversified and so vast that no one rule can be adopted safely. A price that might be fair for securities in New England would not be fair for securities in Texas; and I do not believe we could place any provision in the bill that would be at all satisfactory as a minimum that would work out well. Now, if we attempt to place a price that will be at all high, no securities at all can be sold. That would mean practically a stoppage of all development in the country, and of course nobody wants that. If we place the minimum too low, it would not be of any help to anybody. Therefore we thought it best to leave the whole subject to the commission. If we find in the light of subsequent experience that something else is necessary to be done, of course we can do it; but at the present time, when we know that the market for securities is such that practically none could be sold under such a limitation, we have not deemed it wise to put it in the bill. We want the securities to be sold. The substitute provides that they must be for the specific purpose stated in it. The commission itself can regulate that and then check them up to ascertain whether good faith has been exercised. The substitute gives ample authority to see that the proceeds are not diverted. We have not sought to lay down rigid statutory rules for all of these different requirements, as many of the States have done. One State can safely do that, because its field is limited and its diversity not so great. Even in such cases, too rigid rules have operated harshly and worked badly for the people. We were impressed by this fact, that there were broad general regulations which should be prescribed, with the administrative details to be worked out under the discretion of a wise and able commission. But if we attempted to place such details in legislation, it would work badly more often than it would work well. This would result not only in an injury to the carriers affected by it, but it would injure the people more, because their needed facilities might not be furnished at all if too many expensive burdens be laid. Or if such be furnished they might be delayed or be made more expensive, and this must be ultimately met by the people who are to be served. We believed the only safe rule was to leave this initiative and the policy and details to be worked out by the railroad management, with a veto power and an accounting power to the commission. That is as far as we should go. That is all sought to be accomplished by this measure, and I am confident will operate to the best advantage of all to be affected by it.

Mr. SABATH. But there is nothing in the bill that would safeguard the purchase of the securities.

Mr. STEVENS of Minnesota. Oh, we could not do that. I do not think we have any authority to do that unless we guarantee the securities, and we expressly refused to do that.

Mr. SABATH. There is nothing in the bill that would restrict the issuance and sale of such stock for double the amount of the real and actual value of it, is there?

Mr. STEVENS of Minnesota. Oh, the commission could regulate that. The application is very carefully guarded. It provides a lot of details, as the gentleman will see if he will read it, and that practically stops that sort of thing. I do not think the gentleman need have any apprehension. Then after that there is a general requirement of what shall be done and what shall not be done. The commission then will have the authority to check the matter up and see that the proceeds are not diverted. The commission must consider whether the issue would impair the ability of the carrier in its future work. That requirement is sufficient to protect, as the gentleman desires. That is put there for that purpose.

Mr. SABATH. In that way the public would be safeguarded.

Mr. STEVENS of Minnesota. Oh, yes; the public is amply protected.

Mr. BURKE of South Dakota. I think the gentleman has stated already, but I wish he would state again what amount of securities will probably have to be issued, say in the next 10 years, in order to carry out the business that will be absolutely necessary for the railway companies to handle the commerce of the country.

Mr. STEVENS of Minnesota. I stated that the best authorities that have come to us indicate that the amount is between $5,000,000,000 and $10,000,000,000, an enormous amount, and we should realize that this vast sum, or any considerable part of it, can not be obtained unless, first, the investors know they will be safe from lawsuits and the validity of their holdings can not be assailed, and, second, they must know and we must realize that no man will invest a dollar unless he feels sure he will get it back again with a reasonable and fair interest rate on his investment. He will not take chances, because he does not have to.

There are too many places in the world where money can be invested safely and profitably. The American railroads must compete with this world-wide demand for investments, and this bill must not unduly handicap them in such competition. Every sensible and fair person believes in proper and strict and appropriate regulation by one governmental authority, but it must be fair, it must be practical, and it must be efficient, or you burden the carriers and investors, so they can not use it. If that occurs, you realize that the people of this country will suffer most of all.

Now, Mr. Chairman, I have used much more time than I intended. One thing more. I think a mistake is made in including in the substitute of the gentleman from Georgia a prohibition of interlocking directorates. My own judgment is that that should be handled in another bill, after more consideration. Remember this, that quite a number of States, including the State of Texas, require State incorporation.

Mr. ADAMSON. If the gentleman will yield just in that connection——

Mr. STEVENS of Minnesota. Yes.

Mr. ADAMSON. Some gentlemen here seem to think that some other things ought to have been included in the bill. I wish the gentleman from Minnesota would advise them that we have made a special order in our committee from now on—the work of considering all propositions to amend the act to regulate commerce—and we intend to consider every proposition on the subject.

Mr. STEVENS of Minnesota. Yes; the gentleman from Georgia is correct, as he generally is, as we all realize. Your committee has under way a plan for hearings and consideration of quite a number of amendments to the interstate-commerce law. Some of them are of much importance, but they could not well be included in this measure for want of time and adequate consideration, and they did not pertain to this particular subject, as I think the prohibition of interlocking directors does not. Just remember this, gentlemen, that quite a number of States require State incorporation of railroad companies. The clerk of the committee, who is always courteous and capable, will prepare for my printed remarks a statement, which is contained in one of the books of our library, showing the number of States that require each railroad company to have a local domicile and a local incorporation in the State. That means that each one of these States requires local directors, and that means that each one of these States must have a separate corporation, with directors who probably also act in the parent corporation in order to handle it to advantage.

You will remember that the trunk lines are composed of subsidiary and branch lines, and these ought not to be handled by dummies. Dummies lead to fraud and opportunities for corruption. The way to handle these matters is by straightforward responsibility by capable men of high character and standing. You ought to have nothing in the bill which would prohibit that kind of men serving on the boards of directors, especially when the State makes it necessary under these circumstances. I think that paragraph ought to be taken from the bill.

The way to meet this situation as to interlocking directorates, the way to meet the troublesome question of holding companies, the way that some of us have long advocated, is the system that you gentlemen will have to take some day. Four years ago you would not have passed this kind of a bill giving the Interstate Commerce Commission this authority. We ought to, and will in the future, pass a bill providing for Federal incorporation of railroads. If we do, we can settle this whole question of interlocking directors, we can settle the whole question of holding companies, we can settle all of these questions about regulating the price at which securities can be issued, we can settle the question of about how they shall be issued. Most of these matters now troubling Congress and the various States can be settled under the plan of Federal incorporation of railroads. I am in favor of it and I think a number on our side and I believe on your side are in favor of it, and I shall congratulate you gentlemen when you take the next step in the way of incorporating railroad companies under a Federal charter. [Applause.]

Mr. FESS. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. STEVENS of Minnesota. Yes.

Mr. FESS. When the Interstate Commerce Commission approves the issue of these securities the Government is assuming no obligation?

Mr. STEVENS of Minnesota. No; the bill provides for that distinctly.

Mr. FESS. In any case where the stock is issued and taken and it proves to be bad, what effect would that have, generally, on the Government?

Mr. STEVENS of Minnesota. It would have this effect: Of course the United States assumes no responsibility, but undoubtedly if the commission made a mistake the holders of the securities would come before the commission and say, "Here, you ought to provide by your system of regulation of rates that this carrier should have the right to earn money enough to pay the interest on these securities which you have approved." That was pointed out by the State commission in this volume, and the Hadley Commission's report discussed that subject. Many witnesses have attested to it and raised the very serious query as to the effect of the approval by the Interstate Commerce Commission when the investment did not prove to be a profitable one. We were shown that some of the worst of the Frisco securities had been approved by the Texas commission, some of the New Haven by the Massachusetts commission, so that public investigation and approval did not avail to save the public or the investor. It could be infinitely more serious to have such an occurrence on the part of the Interstate Commerce Commission, so that makes it doubly important that the Interstate Commerce Commission itself by its own members should regulate the issuance of these securities.

Mr. PLATT. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. STEVENS of Minnesota. Yes.

Mr. PLATT. Does the gentleman think that it is possible to fix the railroad rates in accordance with the capitalization?

Mr. STEVENS of Minnesota. No; I do not. I think that is only a matter of evidence and of not much importance at that. If we depended on that basis for our action, I do not believe anything would be done. We must rest on a broader and better basis for this legislation than using it for the fixing of rates. To me that is about the last consideration. I think this legislation should be considered as assuring more adequate and just regulation in the interest of the public, insuring better and more adequate service and safety. It will protect the credit of the carriers and in that way care for its facilities, safety, and ability in the future. It is an act of sovereignty to adequately care for the corporate acts and necessities of its public corporations and those caring for its public functions, even though created by a State. If the people think they will have rates based upon the approval under this act, they are apt to be disappointed. We are doing more important work than that—looking after their safety, their facilities, growth, and development, for the future, the prosperity, and opportunities for our people and their industries, the basis for working out their ambition and their hopes and their life's endeavor in the fast onward march of our country. These great thoughts are the basis for this legislation. We are performing such an act in this measure.

Mr. ADAMSON. Mr. Chairman, I yield to the gentleman from Louisiana [Mr. ASWELL].

Mr. ASWELL. Mr. Chairman, the importance of passing this antitrust legislation speedily is being greatly emphasized, not only by the friends of the bill but by the expressed solicitous concern of the enemies of the Democratic Party. The enemies of the party seem much disturbed over the fact that the Democratic Party will actually fulfill its pledges and place this legislation on the statute books at this session of Congress. They have almost lost hope of their original plan to produce a panic and demoralize business before the Democratic Party could correct the evils and oppression under which the great plain people have suffered for 16 years—evils of special interests, trusts, and monopolies, saddled upon the small business man, the farmer, and the industrial wage earner by Republican rule, a rule of monopoly and special privilege which was dictated for 7 years by one man in person and 4 years by him by proxy. This great traveler, explorer, and discoverer of doubtful rivers, admired for his personal courage, vigor, and audacity, strikes a note of despair in a mad effort to produce a panic as he sails on another voyage. The panic of 1907 proved him a master panic producer, but he forgets that a new day has come, with men of another stamp in control, who take their instructions not from the favored few nor from him, but from the toiling masses. They are men in whom the people confide and from whom the people know they will get permanent relief from the monopolies of the country.

The Sunday papers quote him as follows:

> It must be remembered that I have been out of the country for nearly 8 months and have been home only 10 days, and therefore have not been able to acquire the necessary information that will enable me to respond intelligently to many of the inquiries made of me.

He admits by this statement that he knows nothing of conditions to justify his charges against the Democratic Party with reference to trust legislation, but seems to be on his job, which is to make noise, disturb business conditions, array one class against another, and set up his usual scarecrow of pending calamity, caused, he evidently believes, by his being down and out, for which those who love our country should be thankful.

He speaks of widespread apprehension and says:

> We can not ignore the conditions which have brought this state of things.

He should have added "conditions which I created." He continues:

> Not the slightest progress has been made in solving the trust question.

He should have said: "It took me seven years to saddle these monster trusts upon the people, and the Democratic Party is about to control them in one year, and I must make a big noise, to turn attention away from my record of seven years of faithful obedience to special interest and monopoly. I want the people to forget my connection with the Steel Trust and the Harvester Trust."

Again, he says:

Our (Progressive) policies would have secured the passing around of prosperity.

In 1907, after six years of his own "progressive" rule, he did succeed in passing prosperity around, but he passed it around the farmer and the laborer and passed it over to the great monopolies of this country.

When the people passed him out of power he grew very solicitous about the "common people," and began running over the country shouting that he had quit the old Republican Party and stood for its destruction. He succeeded well in destroying it permanently, but do you know when he quit that party? He quit at Chicago when he failed to get the nomination. Everybody recalls the report that he went to Chicago with two speeches ready—one in case he got the nomination, the other in case he did not. They kicked him out, and he then declared that he had quit the old boss-ridden Republican Party.

When the great traveler returns from this voyage and awakes from his dream of selfish ambition to enjoy again the intoxicating thrill of political position and power he will find that the work the people demand for their liberation from the grasp of monopoly will have been done by the leaders of the Democratic Party, and it will have been done so well that he may continue to travel over the earth, making wild explorations and wilder reports of same, as he enjoys the liberty guaranteed to him at Chicago and delivered to him by the people of the country at the last November elections.

He will find that these men in control—Wilson, Clark, Burleson, Underwood, and the rest—do not claim to be heroes or demigods. They need not be, though a divinity is encompassing their acts. Human weakness is present in them, yet the divine inspiration of duty so lifts them out of self that the hardships they are so willing to suffer here is not the blind obedience to special privilege, expediency, or selfish greed, but it is for the vindication of a truth, a cause, a principle; it is the losing of self, the exaltation of the finest and best in man, the eager willingness to give themselves in the service of their country. Such is the spirit that characterizes the work that will have been done by the Democratic Party and the independent men on the other side of this Chamber before the traveler awakes from his dream of power to realize that the people have discovered that in his years of control he failed utterly to do one of the things he now says he would do to give the country relief. Were his gyrations not so dramatic, in the face of his record his preachments would be funny. [Applause.]

Mr. ADAMSON. Mr. Chairman, I yield to the gentleman from Texas [Mr. EAGLE] 40 minutes.

Mr. EAGLE. Mr. Chairman, I think that every serious-minded man must feel a sense of solemnity when he comes to participate in the deliberations of Congress and realizes that the thing he does, whether appearing to himself to be important or unimportant, directly affects many people and indirectly affects all of the people of the Nation. In the matter of this body of antitrust legislation, our action will directly affect all of the larger business enterprises throughout the country, and upon their prosperity and continued good fortune depends directly the good fortune of their owners and of their millions of employees; while our action, to greater or less degree, will have its influence upon every man, woman, and child in the United States.

The Democratic Party, in the year 1912, took a solemn and binding contract with the people of the United States to do certain specific things. That contract consisted of the platform and candidates of the Democratic Party tendered to the voters, upon the one part, and of the votes cast in acceptance of that platform and those candidates by the voters of the Nation, upon the other part. The American people entered into that contract with the Democratic Party in perfect good faith and with definite knowledge and understanding. While there are many different provisions embodied in that contract, I believe that each Member present will agree with me in the statement that perhaps three, and only three, provisions in that contract—or planks in our platform—made up the points upon which the masses of the American people were influenced in declining to retain in power the Republican Party, in declining to intrust with power the Progressive Party, and in determining to intrust with power the Democratic Party. Those three provisions were with reference to the tariff, with reference to the currency, and with reference to the trusts.

The Congress has been in continuous session during the past 15 months, laboring with zeal, and upon the Democratic side, practically with unanimity, devising ways and means to keep that contract with the people.

We have faithfully attended to the matter of the tariff by reducing the duties on imports from an average of 43 per cent, as it existed under the Republican law called the Payne-Aldrich bill, down to a general average of 26 per cent, and have done it without disturbing the legitimate business enterprises of the country to any appreciable extent. And, while we have thus reduced the tariff taxes from the general average of 43 per cent down to 26 per cent, there has been, up to June 1 of this year, within $100,000 of as much revenue derived from the Democratic Underwood-Simmons tariff bill during the time it has been in operation as during a similar period under the former protective tariff bill enacted by the Republican Party, and there has been as much revenue derived from the Democratic tariff law as was anticipated up to the 1st of June of this year; while the Treasury experts estimate that, by June 30, $20,000,000 more will have been derived than it was either supposed or estimated, by the experts on the Ways and Means Committee of this House or by the Treasury Department, would be needed. And yet we have accomplished this gratifying result by reducing the tariff upon those articles which are a common necessity to the average man throughout the Nation in his daily life, and at the same time have given sufficient revenues to operate the Government.

The Democratic Party has faithfully kept with the people another promise—which the Republican Party has also been making to the country for the past 40 years, but has never had either the wisdom, coherence, or courage to perform—that is, it has enacted a banking and currency law by which the 25,000 banking institutions of the country are assessed upon their capital stock and surplus to make up a fund sufficient to conduct 12 regional reserve banks, in which the member banks may rediscount their paper to the full extent of the business requirements and the increasing necessity of extending credit facilities to the various sorts of business throughout the Nation—the Government retaining control of the issue of the new currency and the control of the governing boards, and by which the reserves required to be held by the banking institutions have been so decreased as to release for the purpose of extending credit facilities a vast sum of money, and rendering panic and the consequent wrecking of banks impossible in the future, and so making the banking and currency system of the Nation so sound and stable that in the future the fabric of the people's business prosperity can never again be wrecked or seriously disturbed. By this currency law the Democratic Party has met a pressing need a half century old, and has written a bill so wise, just, and conservative that all classes of our people will share equally in the sublime opportunity it affords for stable business conditions in the future.

And yet, in my deliberate judgment, it would not afford the complete relief to which the people of this Nation are entitled and to which the Democratic Party is pledged, merely to have enacted this just tariff law and this comprehensive banking and currency system. We must take the third and remaining step in order to make this edifice complete—we must enact this body of antitrust laws in order to take the fingers of monopoly off of the throat of American industry. We must not leave the trusts and combinations in restraint of trade, that form of monopoly in practically all of the lines of enterprise, still free to fix arbitrarily the price of the necessities of life of the producing and consuming masses—of their food supplies, their clothing, and all their other daily necessities. Of what avail is it to have reduced the tariff tax upon any article so that its price to the consumer would be decreased under the ordinary laws of competition, and of what avail is it to have enacted the currency law making for the stability of business conditions throughout the country, if we shall now adjourn leaving absolute monopoly in control of the people's welfare as heretofore, to stifle competition and arbitrarily to fix the price at which the consumer may purchase his supplies in the market? Practically every class of supplies necessary to the daily life of the American people is already monopolized by combinations and trusts, so that the price to the consumer is arbitrarily fixed; and in all those classes of supplies monopoly has practically stifled competition so that the laws of supply and demand no longer control the price. The American people understand this as a fact; and it is the noblest mission yet remaining to the Democratic Party to fulfill, to open the door of industrial opportunity to all men, and to restore again competitive conditions.

I am aware that there is great diversity of opinion, both in Congress and throughout the country, as to the wisdom of legislation upon this subject at this time. Never before since I have served in Congress has there been such tremendous pressure to postpone or to defeat legislation upon any subject as now exists to postpone or defeat consideration and passage of any legislation at this time affecting these matters. For one, my conviction and voice are for proceeding as resolutely to the fulfillment of this mission, by the Democratic Party at this time, as heretofore for the carrying out of our platform pledges with reference to the tariff or with reference to the currency. When the tariff bill was under discussion, Congress and the country were told, by the Republican press and statesmen and by the selfish business interests of the country, that to disturb the protective-tariff law meant to wreck the fabric of the people's business prosperity; and yet we resolutely pressed forward and fulfilled our promise faithfully, and earned the gratitude of the Nation. When the currency legislation was under consideration last year, we were told, by the Republican press and statesmen and by the selfish business interests, that if we proceeded resolutely to complete that program the wheels of industry must stop because we were revolutionizing the existing system of American business; and yet we resolutely pressed forward in good faith and performed a service for the people that has already come to meet the universal appreciation and commendation of practically the entire body of the people and of all business interests as well. And now, when we come to consider this antitrust legislation, and resolutely undertake to enact it, we are met with such a deluge of protest and opposition that the strongest heart feels the pressure and must summon all its courage to the performance of a plain duty. It is argued that the Democratic Congress having passed such a vast body of constructive legislation, the business men and institutions of the country require a period of legislative rest in order to adjust their affairs to the new laws. But my conviction is that the threat of impending change is more disastrous to business than a speedy enactment of law will be when that law is sane and sensible; and therefore the sooner this body of antitrust legislation is enacted, the sooner will American business adjust itself to the new business status thus created, and the sooner will the wheels of industry move smoothly along. Besides, the sooner we remove the fingers of monopoly from the throat of the public, the sooner will American citizens be free from the oppression and dominance of the trusts, the sooner will competitive conditions be restored, the sooner will the prices of the articles daily purchased by the people fall in price to a legitimate value based on the law of supply and demand, and the sooner will heart and hope enter into the masses of the people who have so long been burdened with the exactions of oppressive trusts and combinations.

My own conviction is that certain selfish big business interests have deliberately determined to clog the wheels of industry, to create a condition of nation-wide depression, and to create a false sentiment against this just legislation, in the hope of breaking the courage and success of the President and the Democratic Party, so that Congress will adjourn without enacting these laws which will break their grip of monopoly; and, therefore, we should remain resolutely at our post of duty until this remaining key is placed in the arch of our triumph as faithful representatives of the highest interests of the masses of the people.

The people have come to new and novel industrial and financial conditions—different from those ever heretofore confronting any other people in the history of the world. As a people, our inventive genius has exceeded that of all other peoples. We have more nearly mastered the forces of nature, and the laws of mechanics, than any other people have ever done. We have practically developed a continent in only a few generations. We have piled up wealth beyond even the dreams of avarice. And we have learned perfectly how to employ these forces and this vast wealth, both for the general good and also for selfish ends. Our great masters of finance, of industry, of transportation, of manufacture, of commerce, are at one and the same time the admiration and the hatred of the whole civilized world; and, in our own country, we often lose our admiration for their genius in our hatred for their greed and selfishness, and quite as often forget our dislike and distrust of their selfishness in our pride and satisfaction in their genius and achievements. We have, in the past quarter century, very largely revolutionized industry and our former industrial system. Individualism lies prostrate under the foot of industrial combination. The great wealth, great ability, great courage, and great achievement of our business men and the strength of our business enterprises would be an unmixed blessing, if only they had stopped before entirely changing our industrial system, before stifling competition, before destroying individual enterprise. But the facts may as well be faced—that, in this marvelous age, aggregation of wealth and of men is the established order, the old order has very largely passed, industrial individualism is dying, competition is being stifled; and, unless Congress can arrest such tendencies and restore competition, the door of equal industrial opportunity will be closed in the face of future generations. That statement is not a theory—it is the statement of a plain fact.

Of course the Republican Party can not be trusted by the masses of the people to correct any of these evil present conditions or tendencies. During its long reign of power at the head of every department of the Government, it was sponsor for combinations and trusts. Those which most oppress the people were organized under its administration and very largely with its approval. Its whole teaching and the trend of its administration and legislation conclusively prove that it is in league with industrial combinations and trusts and that it cares little for the welfare of the producing and consuming masses if only it can faithfully serve the trusts which its administration protected and which in turn were the largest contributors to its campaign fund.

The Progressive Party can not be trusted to correct these present-day evil industrial conditions—because its founder and leader, Col. Roosevelt, while President of the United States, connived at the formation of the trusts, and did not prevent or suppress them; and in the most notable instance—that of the absorption by the United States Steel Corporation of its only substantial rival, the Tennessee Iron & Coal Co.—had full knowledge in advance and gave his full consent and assistance; while the leader of the Progressive Party on this floor, Mr. MURDOCK, has actually introduced a bill (H. R. 9300) to prevent competition; and its national chairman, Mr. Perkins, is the organizer and guiding head of the Harvester Trust.

The time has come when, not alone the competitive system, which is the pride and industrial principle of our civilization, not alone the preservaton of the rights of the masses from the oppression of the trusts and combinations, but our very civilization itself, is at stake. Upon the one extreme the Republican Party stands as the sponsor and protector of corrupt big business with its coteries of unpunished managers and directors who have not only oppressed the masses but have also pillaged and plundered the properties committed to their charge; and upon the other extreme stands the Progressive Party with its indefinite and vague program for legalizing and regulating monopoly, and to which the yearning eyes of all of the discontented elements of our national society have turned—the socialistic, the discontented, the destructive element of society in general, the impractical and visionary—all those elements of our society which have little or no respect for the Constitution and Bill of Rights, but accept with eagerness any promise of radicalism held out to them either by the platform or leadership of the Progressive Party. Between these two extremes stands the Democratic Party—where it has stood for 100 years—understanding and upholding the Constitution, preserving the noble fabric of our political institutions, holding with veneration to the sanctity of judicial decrees, of property rights, and of the rights of private contract, and standing for the personal freedom and general happiness of the people, and holding to its ancient doctrines with the faith of a marytr and the zeal of a crusader.

The Democratic Party believes now, as it has believed through all the century of its existence since Thomas Jefferson set it upon its path, that the individual citizen is sovereign and that he possesses all powers not yielded up to make our Government; that individual liberty and local self-government are the foundation stones upon which the Nation rests; that the Nation possesses no powers except those delegated to it in the Constitution by the people and the States; that the States possess all power not yielded up to the Federal Government or prohibited to them by the Federal Constitution; that equal justice to all men and special privileges to none, is the fundamental principle of a free republic of equal citizenship; that absolute acquiescence by the minority in the will of the majority, when constitutionally expressed, is the highest evidence of civilization even as it is the surest guaranty of the perpetuity of our free institutions; that, in matters of legislation, the greatest good to the greatest number is a sound fundamental teaching; and that the only object of a just government is the preservation of the rights of freedom, of property, of justice, and of happiness of the masses.

The principles of the Democratic Party are so plain and simple that the humblest intellect comprehends them, and so true and noble that the greatest intellect venerates them.

By those principles we have enacted a tariff law which equalizes taxation, and a currency law which preserves the fabric of the people's business prosperity; and by those principles we will enact this body of antitrust laws which will open the door of industrial opportunity alike to each man beneath the American flag.

By these principles this Democratic Congress and administration, in the brief 15 months, has accomplished noble results in the interests of the masses, without doing in any instance injustice to any good man or to any legitimate business interests in the country.

First. It has passed the tariff bill, which has unfettered industry and commerce. No selfish interest dictated it; but it was based upon the Democratic principle that no taxes, under the Constitution, should be laid except for revenue only.

Second. It has enacted the banking and currency law, which will prevent any selfish banking interests from precipitating panic for selfish ends, and will allow those who produce the national wealth to reap its benefits.

Third. It has perfected and put in operation the amendment to the Constitution imposing an income tax, under whose provisions a hundred million dollars will be paid each year by the wealth of the Nation for the support of the Government.

Fourth. It has passed the industrial arbitration act, by which the great industrial and transportation companies, and their millions of employees, may adjust their differences in a civilized manner, without injuring either themselves or their best interests or the interests of the Nation.

Fifth. It has perfected and put into operation the amendment of the Constitution providing for the election of United States Senators by direct vote of the people.

Sixth. It has put the lobby out of business as an institution around the Halls of Congress.

Seventh. It has further extended the blessings of liberty to the Filipino people and aided them in the development of self-government.

Eighth. The Democratic Secretary of the Treasury at a critical time placed $50,000,000 of funds in the banks of the country to aid, during the year 1913, in the movement of the crops, thus allaying apprehension and preventing business depression and avoiding complete reliance by the country upon the Wall Street bankers in a time of national peril.

Ninth. The Democratic President has cooperated with the business men and the business interests of the Nation, helping them to eliminate unlawful practices and to establish right practices, without wrecking their institutions by litigation.

Tenth. The Democratic Postmaster General has, for the first time in the history of the Government, so managed the Post Office Department that, instead of a deficit of nearly $2,000,000, he has produced a profit in that department of more than $4,500,000; and he has extended the Parcel Post System and the Rural Free Delivery System so as to cheapen rates and increase that facility to the masses of the people.

Eleventh. Many prosecutions have been entered upon and successfully ended for the enforcement of the existing antitrust laws.

Twelfth. It has enacted the Alaska railway bill, providing $35,000,000 for the building of 1,000 miles of railroad in that rich country, and so opening that vast storehouse of wealth for the common good of the American people instead of permitting it to be monopolized by a few private interests.

Thirteenth. It has enacted laws for farm-extension work, which are destined to increase the effectiveness and the productive capacity of the American farms.

Fourteenth. The foreign policy of the administration has been a revelation of wise statesmanship and applied Christianity. It has withdrawn its support from the policy inaugurated by the Republican Party, to stand sponsor and guarantor for American capital in securing subsidy and concession from foreign weaker nations, which ultimately would have involved this Nation in wars and would have violated the historic and traditional policy of this Nation to form no entangling alliances and not to interfere with the internal affairs of foreign nations. And, in each instance of the many delicate situations confronting our State Department, its wisdom and patience, resolution and diplomacy, have preserved our peaceful relations with all other countries and increased our prestige throughout the civilized world.

Fifteenth. And the administration of the departments of this Government, when fully understood by the masses of the people, will win their grateful appreciation, notably (a) the action of the Treasury Department, as indicated; (b) of the Post Office Department, as indicated; (c) of the Department of Justice, as indicated; (d) the action of the Navy Department, with reference to vocational and technical instruction of the enlisted men aboard ship; (e) the new public-land policy by the Interior Department; (f) the splendid work of the Commissioner of Indian Affairs for the Indian people; (g) the work of the Agricultural Department in broadening the work of that department to the home life of the farmer, increasing his knowledge of farm domestic conditions; (h) the action of the Navy Department in requiring competitive bids for armor plate entering into the construction of ships, with enormous saving resulting; (i) the system of markets inaugurated by the Department of Agriculture; (j) the extension of the pure-food act to meat inspection; (k) the policy of the Department of Commerce in making efficient for the first time the Consular Service; (l) the action of the Department of Labor in establishing close relations as intermediary between the laboring men of the Nation and their employers—in every department, work which makes for the enlarged prosperity, better understanding, and increasing happiness of the people.

While the Democratic Party is not committed by its platform or otherwise to the following policies, still it is evident to my mind as one of the tendencies of the time which will come to full fruition in due course, that the American people, while preserving entirely their Constitution and their institutions and their individuality and industrial system with free competition as its foundation principle, will so regulate their business and concerns, through congressional enactment, as to provide (a) for the supervising and regulating of issues of corporate securities; (b) for representation in corporations of minority stockholders; (c) for the preventing of dummy directors; (d) for prohibiting interlocking control of competitive business; (e) for prohibiting holding companies that restrain competition; (f) for preventing, under the guise of competition, the sale of articles in one community for less than in another, considering transportation charges, in order to strangle business rivals and thereby create monopoly; (g) for providing a greater relief to those unlawfully injured by the methods of unlawful combinations; (h) for providing more adequate means for the enforcement of all antitrust laws; (i) for preventing interlocking directorates in either industrial or manufacturing or financial institutions, so as to restore competition; and (j) for other legislation which will make all men, who are theoretically free under our Constitution and system, absolutely free in practice from molestation by unfair business methods at the hands of the strong and powerful, so that heart may be put into the individual man in this marvelous country to undertake in business the enterprises his genius conceives and his ambition cherishes, without fear that industrial rivals will crucify him by unfair methods.

Certain conditions exist in our beloved country at this time, which every one of us definitely knows are not good and satisfactory conditions. It is not my purpose at this time as a partisan to blame preceding administrations for those conditions, nor to defend the present administration for those conditions, especially as it is not responsible for such conditions, but briefly to trace some of the reasons for such conditions. We all know, and the entire country knows, that ever since the climax of big business run mad, in 1907, not only in this country but throughout the civilized world, business and business men have been in a state of apprehension, and the normal condition of business in its larger aspects has for several years been supplanted by business unrest and apprehension. Men everywhere, regardless of party, deplore it, and partisans magnify it and attribute it to what cause pleases their several fancies. But the fact remains that throughout the civilized world, since 1907, when the Republican Party was in power even as it remained in power during the five years following, that condition obtained, and to greater or less degree it obtains at this hour. The conditions are world-wide. In the great financial center, New York City, at this time money has piled up in the banking institutions to an unparalleled extent. Money is an absolute drug upon the market, and yet it can not be had except for short-time loans upon stock-exchange securities. If the reason be not that those who control it desire to clog the wheels of industry until this Congress shall adjourn, leaving corrupt and selfish men in control of the industrial destiny of the people of this Nation, then the only other reason is an international dread and fear partly growing out of conditions in different nations and very largely growing out of dealings which such men in this Nation have had with multitudes in other nations. As the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. STEVENS] has just remarked, there is absolutely no market for railroad securities. In that remark he uttered the plain fact; and he might also, with equal accuracy, have said that there is little market in a larger way for any other American securities. The fact is, as I think, that so-called big business has dealt, on the whole, fairly with the American people. We should do nothing here which injures big business in its legitimate career. We are a Nation of big people with big aspirations and with big powers. As a people we have created, and we own, and we need vast wealth, and our only concern should be that vast wealth thus aggregated is used for the blessing of the people instead of for their oppression.

The Democratic Party is not an enemy of big business, but it is determined that selfish men who have controlled and now control big business, in many lines of enterprise, shall cease to use their trusteeship not only to pillage and plunder the properties they control, and to injure and wreck their minority stockholders, and to settle vast burdens upon the people of the United States that they themselves may reap untold dishonest rewards, but also to pervert the principles of competition and to destroy the hope of the masses for industrial freedom. Mention has been made in these debates of the recent scandal of the great New Haven Railroad system, which traverses the heart of New England; and it is true that the revelation of how a director, by secret orders, pillaged $11,000,000 from the treasury of that great corporation, has horrified the country. But it is equally true that those same trustees and directors declared and paid $60,000,000 of dividends upon the statement that they were paid out of net cash earnings, when the disclosure now is that not one dollar was thus earned, but upon the strength of those representations $200,000,000 of securities were sold at several times their par value, and which have found their way to foreign lands. Now when such revelations of mismanagement and official misconduct horrify the people of this country and also the investors in American securities in all other nations, when it becomes evident that the trustees of the largest business interests of this Nation have so used their trust as to make it a private enterprise of corrupt profit for themselves, wholly disregarding the interests of the people and the interest of fair dealing, then and thereupon investors from foreign lands throw back their securities upon the American market at one-fourth the price paid for them—glad to be rid of their investments in American securities at any figure. No wonder that no present market exists for American railroad or other securities. And there is no higher duty of statesmanship in this generation than by this legislation—the interstate trade commission bill, the antitrust bill, and the amendment to section 20 of the commerce bill—to provide for all time to come for publicity of issues of stocks and bonds through the Interstate Commerce Commission, so that the whole world may know of the validity of future issues and so that our industrial fabric can not in future be shattered by the dishonesty of managing trustees and directors of our noble American enterprises. And it is entirely evident that permanent business prosperity can not be had until this legislation is enacted and in force, and therefore until all American business men are able to adjust their business to the new and enlightened standard of publicity and honest dealing—which the vast majority of them have already done and would do even independently of legal requirement. And it is equally evident that the time has come when, if the Congress, in the interest of the whole people, does not enact this legislation, industrial freedom is absolutely to die in this country, competition is absolutely to pass as the rule of business conduct, and a few enormous interests are to dominate every line of business and shut the door of equality of opportunity in the face of every man in this Nation who is not upon the inside of those few combinations and trusts.

The Democratic Party will have kept faith with the American people by the enactment of the three bills making up its antitrust program, to wit: (a) The interstate trade commission bill, (b) the bill amending the Sherman antitrust law, and (c) the bill now under consideration amending section 20 of the interstate-commerce act of February 4, 1887, as heretofore amended; and it believes that thereby it will have made business and business conditions stable and secure throughout the country, rendered it possible to dissolve the trusts and combinations in restraint of trade and prevented further and other forms of monopoly, and prevented the managers of interstate common carriers from loading such quasi-public properties with useless issues of stocks and bonds to burden the present and future generations. There was practically no opposition here in the House to the trade commission bill, and it has been laid aside with favorable recommendation. Likewise, we have considered the antitrust bill, and have laid it aside with favorable recommendation. And now we have come to consider the bill amending section 20 of the interstate-commerce act. This bill has to do with four ideas, in substance: First, to confer greater power and authority on the Interstate Commerce Commission to ascertain more completely the facts, figures, and dealings of these interstate common carriers subject to regulation by the Interstate Commerce Commission, in order to give greater publicity and understanding of their acts and doings, and so as to allow the stockholders themselves a remedy against the evil practices of dishonest trustees and managing directors who have their utmost confidence and who have too often violated it, and so as to allow the body of the American people, who pay the freight charges, to know upon what basis securities of stocks and bonds and other form of indebtedness are issued and the valuations upon which they are being ordered and allowed—the Interstate Commerce Commission being the intermediary by whose approval such securities are to be issued, and to act alike as protector of the security holders, of the common carriers, and of the public upon whom the burden is laid of freight charges; second, to amend the present law as amended, so as to make it unlawful for any common carrier subject to the provisions of the interstate-commerce act to issue any capital stock or bonds without giving notice to the Commission of its intention so to do, stating in such notice precisely what securities it proposes to issue and showing the purposes to which the proceeds are to be applied, and unless such proposed issue be for some purpose within its corporate powers and in the public interest and necessary or appropriate to the proper performance of its corporate service to the public and not tending to impair its financial ability to discharge all of its duties to the public as a common carrier: Otherwise the commission may deny such application, or the minority stockholders, as well as State officials through whose territory the common carrier runs, may enjoin the issuance of such securities until it can be judicially ascertained whether such securities tend better to strengthen the common carrier in the discharge of its duty as such common carrier, under penalty of imprisonment for those officials violating this provision; third, to prohibit, after two years, interlocking directorates in common carriers except in those instances approved by the Interstate Commerce Commission; and, fourth, to give to the shippers the right to collect from the common carrier to whom they consign their goods, if such goods are lost in transit, the value thereof, allowing such common carrier to reimburse itself therefor from its connecting common carrier.

The public have a very present and actual interest in the amount of securities outstanding against such interstate common carrier. Such common carrier is a quasi-public institution. It derives its revenues exclusively from the public. It receives its grant of charter rights by authority of the public. Its right of eminent domain is a concession from the public. In almost every instance in which application is made to a State authority or to a national authority by State common carriers or by interstate common carriers, respectively, for an increase in freight rates, the matter of the net earnings upon the outstanding stocks and bonds is one of the principal considerations urged for such increase. It is true that such is not in law the proper basis for fixing freight charges, but rather a fair return for a proper service rendered; and yet, in each application and hearing and argument, the volume and amount of the outstanding securities is pressed with vigor as a basis on which charges are urged to be predicated. At the present time the great systems of eastern railroads—those east of the Mississippi River and north of the Ohio River—have before the Interstate Commerce Commission, and have had for many months, an application for a 5 per cent increase of freight rates. The President of the United States has been importuned, both in Congress and out of Congress, to use his supposed influence to procure such increase, and the matter has been continuously argued and presented to the commission, and much of the daily press of the country has carried a vast burden of argument in favor of such freight-rate increase; and while neither Congress nor the President has either authority or voice in the matter, the effort has been made to influence by the weight of public sentiment the commission to grant such increase, and the chief argument has been that the great volume of outstanding railroad securities, without such increase, will receive no sufficient dividends. And therefore it is evident that, while it should not be so, still it is a fact that, in each instance of application for an increase in freight rates, the volume of outstanding securities of the common carriers is one of the few controlling factors urged upon which to predicate increase in freight rates, and is one of the very few determining factors influencing the final result.

As the public pays the freight charges, it follows that the public, through the Congress, have a very great and proper interest in the matter of the securities outstanding against the common carriers. Neither I nor any other Member of Congress should assume to express an opinion whether the great eastern transportation companies are entitled to such increase in freight rates. Of course we know that they employ over 2,000,000 men and have outstanding over $14,000,000,000 of securities, and that they are the chief purchasers of iron and steel and lumber and other products of American industries which employ millions of American workingmen, and that their prosperity contributes mightily to the common prosperity and that their adversity would affect vitally every line of industry in our country; and yet whether they are entitled to such increase should depend—not upon the opinion and will of Congress or of the President, and not upon a reasonable dividend or return on their outstanding volume of securities—but solely upon a fair price for a proper service rendered. But it still remains true that one of the controlling reasons they have assigned, in their documents and briefs, is that the increase is required in order to enable them to earn, above expenses, a fair return upon their investment, which they allege to be their volume of outstanding securities. Whether the securities were fairly issued in the first instance and represent money or property acquired or service performed is not known, or whether, in greater or less degree, they are stocks and bonds representing fictitious values is not known; but certain it is that, for all time to come, increases of stocks and bonds and other forms of permanent indebtedness against the common carriers, or new forms of securities for common carriers yet to be constructed, should be subject to scrutiny and to approval by the disinterested commission before issuance, in order that the commerce of the future be not unjustly burdened with excessive freight charges. The principle of this bill is that the commission shall ascertain whether such securities proposed to be issued tend to strengthen the common carrier in the discharge of its duty as such common carrier. It is indispensably necessary thus to establish a veto power in the commission against the issuance by the common carriers of fictitious stocks and bonds, in the interest of the stability and efficiency of the carriers themselves, to prevent them from impairing their financial strength and as a consequence incapacitating themselves from performing their functions to the public as common carriers; and it will furthermore protect the stockholders against the cupidity of managing trustees and directors and other officials, who have too often wrecked the common carriers for their individual private profit.

Considering the observations of the distinguished gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. STEVENS], it is proper to say that it is not intended by this bill, nor would it be competent, for Congress to prescribe the terms or conditions under which any State may authorize corporations either to organize or do business; because the granting clause, either by statute or by State constitution in any State in the Union, is not to be set aside by act of Congress, and it would be unconstitutional for Congress to set the same aside. Nothing which the Congress might do could compel any State in the Union to abridge its absolute power and authority to prescribe the terms and conditions under which a foreign corporation may enter such State for the purpose of doing business. Furthermore, it is evident that it would not be competent for Congress, nor does this bill propose, to make any limitation upon what the laws of any State shall be with reference to the issuing of securities by any corporation within that State, whether it originates and ends in such State or ends in another State. But the underlying reason for this bill is that interstate commerce is indispensable to our people, and the Constitution confers upon Congress its regulation; and the Congress definitely knows that, whether rightfully so or not, freight rates, when they come to be made, are largely influenced by the condition and amount of the securities outstanding against such common carrier engaged in interstate commerce; and, therefore, it is proposed by this law to provide that no common carrier doing an interstate business shall issue securities in such volumes as to burden commerce and cripple the railroads. The bill proposes to secure enforcement of the law by inflicting criminal penalties upon the responsible heads of the railroad companies. It is my deliberate judgment that when the president, vice president, secretary, treasurer, or the executive head of any common carrier understands definitely that a fine of $1,000 to $5,000, or a prison sentence of a year, must be the result of violating this statute, there will be no violations of it.

This bill goes far to purify one of the most prolific sources of industrial, financial, and transportation evils of the times, in prohibiting interlocking directorates after two years from its enactment, in any common carriers except in those instances where upon full showing the commission may approve. It is greatly to be doubted if any single cause has contributed more to business corruption than the modern corporate business procedure of interlocking directorates. It is shown by a recent congressional report that in a given instance one man in a great city of our country was a director at one time in 67 great companies, at least one-half of them being railroad companies and one of them being the greatest industrial enterprise in the Nation, which sold its products to those same railroads, and at the same time he was fiscal agent for the railroad companies—thus he was fiscal agent, buyer, and seller at one and the same time. Of course, efficiency in enterprise can not be secured by such methods. But this bill does not deny absolutely the right of one man to serve as director in more than one railroad company, and it is wise in that provision, because there are instances in which it is entirely just to the railroad in the discharge of its duty to the public, and just to the public also, that one man may serve as director of more than one common carrier. I have in mind at the moment two railway systems entering and running through my own great State of Texas—the Missouri, Kansas & Texas Railway and the Southern Pacific Railway. The first-named runs through the States of Missouri, Kansas, Oklahoma, and Texas, and yet it is required by the laws of those several States to have a charter for the portion thereof within such States. In that case manifestly it is only proper for the Interstate Commerce Commission, upon a full showing, to permit the same persons to act as directors of each of those corporations making up the entire line. And so with the Southern Pacific, which traverses the State of Louisiana under one charter name, and the State of Texas under another. But it is manifestly against the interest of the public, as well as of the stockholders and the common carriers, to permit one man to be a stockholder in two competing common carriers; and it is the object of this bill to prevent such procedure.

This law is not intended to cripple and impair, but rather to safeguard and serve, the interests of the common carriers themselves, as well as to protect the public against the effects of their improper management. Furthermore, when this bill shall be in full and successful operation, it will make American railway securities absolutely stable in value and desirable as permanent investments throughout this country and the balance of the world. And while it is not the object of this law to create or to maintain commercial values for such securities, it will be wise, constructive legislation if it have such indirect effect, because it will enable the common carriers of the present time and those to be constructed in future to summon from all quarters a vast amount of funds for investment in such securities; and so this bill will make for the security and the permanent prosperity of the common carriers and the welfare and happiness of the American people.

It is truly a noble privilege to serve here while this mighty work is being done. As a people we have passed through the formative period of our Nation's growth and development. Our forefathers established wisely and well the foundation of our national institutions by a constitution of political principles that is the admiration of the world and has been the guaranty of the people's freedom and prosperity. Under it we have lived and grown, in a little more than a century, from 3,000,000 people to 100,000,000 people. Our aggregate wealth as a Nation is about $140,000,000,000. We have developed the most amazing civilization and industrial greatness of all the ages. Conditions of life are better in the United States than in any other country. There is no cloud remaining upon the national horizon except the selfish aggressions of great aggregations of wealth upon the industrial freedom of the people; and that cloud will disappear in the light of the morning of the new day of equality of industrial opportunity before the law of all the people by the enactment of this legislation. The Democratic Party invites all patriotic members of all parties to join it in this mighty work; and we know that the hopes and prayers of a great majority of the people urge us to finish this work and thus earn their gratitude and the blessing of all the generations to follow. It is a grand thing to do a plain duty, and a severe test of character to perform that duty resolutely when the weighty pressure of mighty forces is operating against us as it is at present. But to my mind nothing is so noble as a sincere heart and enlightened mind, a clear conscience, a lofty patriotism, and a resolution unbending to do right. No permanent good can come to any State or nation, even as no permanent good can come to any individual, except upon the secure basis of absolute justice; but just as with individuals, so also with States and nations, prosperity and good-fellowship follow in the wake of wisdom and of plain duty resolutely performed. Let us preserve, as we are doing, that which is best and noblest in our Constitution and laws, our institutions and civilization, our business fabric and national customs, as a heritage for our children; but let us also, under the providence of God, by an enlightened statesmanship in the enactment of these wholesome laws, assure and secure to posterity the priceless legacy of industrial freedom and economic independence.

Mr. ADAMSON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. STEVENS] use some time?

Mr. STEVENS of Minnesota. Yes; I will yield to the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. TOWNER] such time as he may desire. I know that he will be reasonable.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Iowa [Mr. TOWNER] is recognized.

Mr. TOWNER. Mr. Chairman, I am in sympathy with the purpose of this legislation, and shall support this bill. I do so with some reservations, realizing its imperfections, and I would regret to see it pass in its present form. These defects, both of form and substance, are such as can be corrected when we consider the bill for amendment. I sincerely hope we may so perfect it that it will not only satisfy ourselves, but meet with the approval of the people.

I congratulate the gentleman in charge of the bill, the distinguished chairman of the Interstate and Foreign Commerce Committee [Mr. ADAMSON], not alone for presenting a bill which in its object is so necessary, and in its general features is so admirable, but I also congratulate him upon the high and generous spirit which he exhibits with regard to this proposition. He declares himself willing to accept suggestions, to welcome from any source help in perfecting the text, and to accept gladly amendments which may tend in any way to strengthen the legislation.

This particular bill is the third of the antitrust series, and has for its object the regulation of the issuance of stocks and bonds by transportation corporations. There is no question of the necessity of this legislation to prevent the continuance of the evil practices which, especially in the last few years, have become so prevalent. The people are demanding and are entitled to receive immediate relief. And, important and necessary as it is that these evils should be eliminated in the interest of the general public, it is equally important and necessary in the interest of the corporations themselves. Indeed, it is hardly too much to say that the primary and principal benefit of such legislation will accrue to them.

Mr. ADAMSON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman allow me to interject an observation right there?

Mr. TOWNER. I shall be glad to do so.

Mr. ADAMSON. One of the controlling inspirations moving me to the extent of supporting this bill is that the developments of the last five years have demonstrated that it is necessary to protect the corporations themselves.

Mr. TOWNER. Yes; it is necessary to protect them from themselves. Much as the people generally have suffered from the shameless manipulations of corporate securities and the overissue of watered stock, the stockholders have suffered still more. The holders of small amounts of these securities, often widows and children and old people desiring to have a little assured income to keep them while they lived, have seen their holdings rendered worthless and their little income destroyed by the reckless gambling operations of conscienceless schemers.

If this legislation is secured, the iniquitous operations which have brought the good name of our country into disgrace in the eyes of the world will not be repeated in the years to come. Hereafter the interests of the minority stockholders must be and will be considered. Hereafter the managers of these corporations can not sacrifice the real interests of the corporation to serve their own individual and selfish purposes.

And so I rejoice that this legislation is coming. It will bring a better day, both for the companies and the people. It is true that the corporations, or rather the managers of them, protest that such legislation will injure and cripple them in their operations. In so far as that protest is an appeal to continue nefarious practices, it may be absolutely disregarded. In so far as it is an honest apprehension of injury to the legitimate development of their work, I am sure the corporations are mistaken.

Take the requirements of this bill that the issuance of stocks and bonds must be approved by the Interstate Commerce Commission. That proposition is regarded by some honest corporation managers as a harmful limitation on their liberty of action and as likely to seriously hamper and injure them in their work. I am sure that is a mistaken idea. I am sure it will help rather than harm them.

To secure the approval of the Interstate Commerce Commission of an issue of stocks or bonds will constitute an official indorsement which will add to their desirability and enhance their value on the market. An intending purchaser will want to know whether the offered security has such approval, and will become, if such indorsement is shown, a more ready purchaser. Desirability determines whether a stock or bond is marketable and its price. There is no other element that makes a security desirable in the esteem of a purchaser equal to an assurance of its safety. The indorsement of the commission will almost amount to that. An official indorsement of this character will add to the value of such securities, aid in their sale, and thus benefit rather than injure the corporation. I will go further, and say that if in addition to this requirement is added the requirement of the approval of a State commission, this double approval will add to the value and aid in the sale of the stocks and bonds thus issued.

I have no doubt that if this legislation is secured there will be less fluctuation on the stock market. This may result in less business and profit for the stock brokers. I am inclined to think, however, that the people of the country will view such result without great grief. Stocks and bonds will sell for more nearly their real value than ever before. The market will be more stable and flurries and panics less frequent.

So, gentlemen, I am glad we are going to have—for I believe we will have—this legislation. I hope to secure some changes in the bill which I think ought to be made. They will make it better, I am sure, if adopted. I hope the same open mind promised by the chairman will pervade the House. Let us with open mind work together in securing this greatly needed legislation for the people. This will be infinitely better and more to our credit than to try to direct our action in an endeavor merely to secure some poor, petty political advantage.

If we desire, as surely we must, to remove some of the reproach which is cast upon the American Congress for playing politics, let us be large enough, generous enough, intelligent enough to write our legislation on this great subject so that the people may say: "That measure, at least, has received the intelligent consideration of Congress, on its merits, uninfluenced by party or political reasons."

I am pleased to note the change in sentiment which has come about in the last few years with regard to this legislation. This has been already referred to by the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. STEVENS] and the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. ESCH]. As early as 1887 Senator Cullom, from the committee which reported the original interstate-commerce act, declared that overcapitalization had "unquestionably done more to create and keep alive a popular feeling of hostility against the railroads of the United States than any other one cause." Various efforts since then have been made to devise legislation to cure the evil. As in so many other ways, the States have led the Nation. They have passed laws which, in many instances, have been effective in regulating purely intrastate business. In Massachusetts, New York, and other States public-service commissions were created to regulate the issue of stocks and bonds and with such beneficial results that even the corporations approve. The benefit to them has been so apparent, and the benefit to the people so manifest, that no proposition to return to unregulated conditions would be considered.

I am sure our Democratic friends will pardon me for referring to the fact that this legislation is entirely Republican in origin. The movement was begun in Republican States, bills were drawn and the legislation pressed by Republican leaders, and the desired laws were first passed by Republican legislatures. It is true that many Democratic leaders have actively aided in securing such results, and that some Democratic States have followed the many Republican States in placing the laws on their statute books, but both in the States and the Nation Republicans have led.

President Roosevelt recommended such legislation. In 1908 the Republican platform declared:

> We further such national legislation as will prevent the overissue of stocks and bonds in the future by interstate commerce.

In 1911 President Taft in a special message strongly recommended it. The Mann act of 1910 contained such a provision and was passed by the Republican House.

Now the present Democratic majority have wisely adopted this Republican measure and are making it part of their party program. They have done well and certainly are entitled to Republican support in both the perfecting and the passage of the bill. I am glad that now the friends of this legislation are not confined to one party. It is a healthy sign that in this instance the real interests of the people are considered supreme over partisan considerations.

Mr. Chairman, we have made great progress in the control of railway corporations in the last few years. They have been brought under the control of the law, both State and National. Pooling has been stopped, rebating prevented, special favors eliminated. Rates and fares have been reduced and made more nearly equitable and uniform. The prevention of competition has been in a great measure stopped. There remain several minor matters which need remedying, and one large and important item. That is the prevention of overcapitalization, the issuance of watered stock and its accompanying features. The wrecking of roads, the manipulation of stocks and bonds for speculative purposes, the consolidation of companies, not for the betterment of extension of business but for the flotation of stocks and bonds for individual profit—these are some of the evils incident to the unregulated issue of stocks and bonds. This bill is intended to prevent the continuance of these wrongs.

It may be well to consider briefly some elementary principles. What are stocks? They are merely the evidences of part ownership. One thousand men may own a railroad. They may each own one one-thousandth part, or they may own it in unequal parts. The stock is the evidence of ownership of the proportionate share the holder has in the property. The total amount of the stock issued should represent the exact value of the property. An overissue of stock means an issue of stock beyond the value of the property. There can be no legitimate benefit in this. To pretend that the value is greater than it is does not in fact increase its value. The act is in itself a fraud. It is done with intent to deceive. It injures both the stockholders of the corporation and the public. It benefits only the manipulators.

What is a bond? A bond is simply a mortgage issued in parts on the property of the corporation. An overissue of bonds means simply an overmortgaging of property, creating liens on it beyond its value. Bad as is the overmortgaging of farms, still worse is the overmortgaging of railroad corporations. It injures those who issue and those who buy.

It would take too much time to enumerate the various ways these bad practices work harm. President Roosevelt in his message to Congress in 1905 well summarized the evils of stock watering with its attendant abuses:

Of these abuses perhaps the chief, although by no means the only one, is overcapitalization, generally itself the result of dishonest promotion, because of the myriad evils it brings in its train, for such capitalization often means an inflation that invites business panic; it always conceals the true relation of the profit earned to the capital actually invested, and it creates a burden of interest payments which is a fertile cause of improper reduction in or limitation of wages; it damages the small investor, discourages thrift, and encourages gambling and speculation; while, perhaps, worst of all is the trickiness and dishonesty which it implies, for harm to morals is worse than any possible harm to material interests, and the debauchery of politics and business by great dishonest corporations is far worse than any actual material evil they do to the public.

To even mention the notable instances where enormous injury and positive wickedness have accompanied these practices would be impossible in the time at my command. They have already been well and ably depicted by gentlemen on the floor of the House. The gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. ESCH], the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. CRAMTON], and the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. GREEN] have presented to the House cases of such enormity as almost to stagger belief. The Chicago & Alton case, where an increase of stock and liabilities of over $62,000,000 was made without one dollar of consideration; the increase of over $31,000,000 of the Southern Pacific, not a dollar of which went into its treasury; the Frisco, the Pere Marquette, the Boston & Maine, the New Haven, are cases sufficiently recent to be remembered. As is well known, the great Rock Island system has been ruined by this process of watering and rewatering. It is a significant fact that in the reorganization made necessary by these practices, the plan submitted cuts out the enormous sum of $357,000,000 of watered securities.

It is interesting to note the progress of public opinion with regard to the necessity for this legislation. Present conditions, which assure its success, are the result of a process of education, of experimentation, of experience. One of the principal reasons why national legislation on this subject was not earlier secured was the apprehension of the States of what they believed was an invasion of their rights. They feared to grant the General Government power to control in any way corporations operating under State charters, in the belief that it might lead to Government control of all State corporations. How far we have advanced from this may be shown by the action last year of the State railway commissions in their annual meeting by a unanimous vote adopting resolutions recommending national legislation such as is now proposed. It is apparent that, because State power is limited to State lines, the scope of State operations is necessarily limited.

Now we are to give the regulatory power to the Interstate Commerce Commission, whose jurisdiction extends to fully 85 per cent of the transportation companies of the country. With the power of control given this national body over interstate commerce and the power exercised by the commissions of the various States over intrastate commerce, there will be no "twilight zone" within whose precincts abuses can exist.

Mr. Chairman, I believe this bill will pass both the House and Senate and become a law. Not in its present form, but in substance it will become an act of the Sixty-third Congress. As such it will reflect credit upon us, for it will prove of such great and lasting benefit as to commend itself to the approval of all who desire to secure and preserve the welfare of the Nation

Mr. STEVENS of Minnesota. Mr. Chairman, how much time did the gentleman use?

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman consumed 8 minutes.

Mr. ADAMSON. Mr. Chairman, I yield 30 minutes to the gentleman from New Hampshire [Mr. STEVENS].

[Mr. STEVENS of New Hampshire addressed the committee. See Appendix.]

[Mr. REILLY of Wisconsin addressed the committee. See Appendix.]

Mr. STEVENS of Minnesota. Mr. Chairman, I yield 30 minutes to the gentleman from West Virginia [Mr. Moss].

Mr. MOSS of West Virginia. Mr. Chairman, it is my purpose to support this particular bill, which has in view the regulation of the issue of stocks and bonds of the railroads—one of the antitrust bills. I do so because, while I believe the bill is imperfect, while I believe it has many imperfections, yet there is more good in it than bad. It is a progressive measure, and I have tried to support truly progressive measures which have come before Congress during my term.

Again, I think it better to push through these bills, instead of retarding them, in order that the business of this country may have a rest from the uncertain agitation that has hung over it since Democracy came again into power. It is pertinent in this connection to inquire what strange reason permitted the intelligent voters of this country, after a lapse of 16 years and in apparent disregard of the sad experience of the past, to again bestow such power upon the Democratic Party, and lastly, to inquire how that party has used that power.

THE CAUSE.

The American people are impatient of delay. So remarkable has been the advance of this Nation from the time of its birth that it is no wonder that at times we become dissatisfied and demand a change. And so it is, though practically every great national reform has been accomplished under a Republican administration, yet, because of the misdeeds or failings of its individual members, the Republican Party is occasionally ostracized by the people. In addition to this, unfortunately, a bitter controversy between two personal friends, leaders of the Republican Party, contributed to a crushing defeat in the year 1912.

Mr. GOODWIN of Arkansas. Will the gentleman yield right there?

Mr. MOSS of West Virginia. I have not time just now.

This controversy culminated at Chicago, where an attack was made upon the ancient rules of the party governing national conventions, which permitted too much control to rest in the hands of southern delegates, who represented but a very small Republican constituency. These rules were wrong and should have been changed long since. West Virginia has now already voted to change them, and a large majority of the States will so vote, so that never again will this particular bone of contention menace our success. Again, certain political leaders—or bosses, if you please—became too prominent and too autocratic, and the people, naturally, perhaps, confounded the party with these few individuals. These men do not now and never have constituted the Republican Party. No party has ever existed that did not have connected with it some undesirable characters. A party should not be held responsible for such men. The rank and file of a party is the bone and sinew of that party, and it is up to the rank and file, and they have the power, to tell these self-constituted bosses to step to the rear and let somebody else do the leading. And that is exactly what the Republican Party is doing to-day. We are cleaning house from the inside—a process much quicker, much more desirable, much more patriotic, than that of pulling down the house from the outside and thus destroying it. There is no excuse for destroying the party of Abraham Lincoln.

Mr. BARKLEY. Mr. Chairman——

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. BALTZ). Will the gentleman from West Virginia yield to the gentleman from Kentucky?

Mr. MOSS of West Virginia. I have not the time. I am very sorry.

Its mission to-day is as vital to American welfare as it was upon its first birthday, and you and I will be dead and gone, and some of us will perhaps be forgotten, long before the Republican Party shall meet its doom. This is not merely my prediction, but it is the sure and certain pronouncement which the people all over this Nation are making to-day by their ballots, which prove conclusively, wherever registration has been had or an election held, that this grand old party is coming back into its own, and that those who left that party for a while, in order to voice a temporary but an earnest protest against the application of a worm-eaten rule, or against the defeat of their candidate for President by what they conceived to be unjust and fraudulent methods, have come back home, and are uniting in a determined effort to rescue this country from the bonds of Democracy. This does not mean the abandonment of progressive principles. It does mean that sensible men realize they can more rapidly advance these principles by preserving a united party.

Mr. BARKLEY. Mr. Chairman, I am not asking the gentleman to yield. I rise to a question of order. Under the rule which was adopted for the consideration of this bill there is a provision that those who speak during general debate shall confine themselves to the bill under consideration. Now, I am not intending to object to the gentleman's continuation of his speech, but I do want to make the statement that, under the rule, the gentleman is out of order, and while I do not intend to raise the point, I think it might be well for the gentleman's constituents, who will in due time receive this speech, to know that he is proceeding against the rule we have adopted here.

Mr. ADAMSON. I hope the gentleman from Kentucky will not insist on his point of order.

Mr. BARKLEY. I do not object to the gentleman proceeding, but I want that to go into the RECORD.

Mr. STEVENS of Minnesota. The committee has been liberal, so far, with both sides of the House, and I hope the gentleman from Kentucky will be liberal. It will expedite matters to do that.

Mr. FESS. I want to say that when the gentleman from Texas [Mr. EAGLE] was making a speech, which we all enjoyed, although it was political, nobody objected.

Mr. MOSS of West Virginia. The gentleman, I understand, merely wants to get what he has to say in the RECORD.

Mr. BARKLEY. I want the gentleman's constituents to see that.

Mr. ADAMSON. We are getting along harmoniously here, and I hope these interruptions will not be taken out of the gentleman's time.

The CHAIRMAN. They will not.

Mr. ADAMSON. When a gentleman makes a digression into other subjects I regard it as merely forfeiting that much time. I wish that he could be yielded time enough to make up for the interruptions.

Mr. MOSS of West Virginia. Mr. Chairman, I think the gentleman will find out—the gentleman who said he desired to get his remarks in the RECORD so that my constituents could see them—that what I have to say on this subject will be very pertinent.

DEMOCRACY'S RECORD.

This is no time for theories. We will talk facts. There is no teacher like experience. The experience of a year and a quarter of Democratic administration is a sufficient argument in this year of our Lord 1914. The campaign is again upon us. The day of reckoning has come to the Democratic Party, and it is up to the people of this country to decide whether they want to indorse that Democratic record or whether they have had enough.

THE TARIFF.

A year and a quarter is a short time, but I want to compare here to-day the situation under Republican administrations with the situation under the present Democratic administration, and ask, "Choose ye whom ye will serve." I said in a speech delivered upon the floor of this House on the 25th day of April, 1913, before the Underwood tariff bill became a law:

> It does seem superfluous after a century of tariff experience to argue that free trade or any approach to free trade is disastrous to this country. Every time it has been tried we have had desolation and distress. Every time a truly protective tariff law has been enacted it has been followed by unexampled prosperity, and yet our friends on the other side, in order again to test the theories which they profess to love so well, are ready to turn their backs upon the light of experience and again grope in the dark night of experiment. And the American people must pay the penalty.

And again, I said:

> I predict, my friends, that the great moving cause that will unify that great Republican Party and make these men forget their feuds and factions when confronted by the call of their country's good, will be the dire result of the passage of the Underwood bill, which will follow as surely as the darkness of night follows the splendor of day.

My friends, prophecy is a dangerous thing, but I took the chance. Let us see whether my prophecy came true. Prior to the election of 1912 this Nation enjoyed prosperity. The factories and mills and shops were busy turning out American products made by American workingmen, receiving good wages and living like freemen. Not only did we supply our own markets but our exports to foreign countries increased year by year, and far surpassed our imports. We became a creditor Nation. We became an important factor in the world's supply. We competed in the world's markets. We preferred to and did give work to the American and, if needs be, let the foreigner across the sea stand idle rather than reverse the position and let the American stand idle while the foreigner worked. In the field of agriculture our success was equally momentous. The farmer received the highest prices for his products, and the American people largely lived upon the necessities of life produced at home.

Now let us look at the other side of the picture. Let us contemplate the scene after a Democratic tariff bill has started its deadly work. Let us look conditions in their face, not seeking to exaggerate nor, again, seeking to minimize, but rather seeking to obtain the exact truth. There are some exceptional communities, like my home city of Parkersburg, where, owing to an abundance of public improvements or the inherent advantages it has enjoyed even in time of panic elsewhere, still retains its prosperity, but throughout the Nation, speaking generally, there is a business depression. Capital has become frightened. Factories and shops have either closed their doors or are running at half speed. Hundreds of thousands of laboring men are idle, trying to eke out an existence and support their families until relief comes. They no longer are supplying the American people. Their places have been filled—not here, 'tis true, but across the water—by the pauper labor of Europe, which as the months go on is furnishing an increased supply of products for consumption in America Every month of Democratic administration is now showing an increase in imports from foreign countries, and therefore showing a decrease in American production. The latest statistics of the Department of Commerce show that April imports aggregated $172,640,724, against $146,194,461 in April of last year, an increase of imports for one month of 26,446,263 good, hard dollars of American money which, instead of being paid to and used among our own people, has been paid to the foreigner. Abraham Lincoln once said:

> I don't know much about the tariff, but I do know that when we buy the goods abroad we get the goods but the foreigner gets the money, but when we buy our goods at home we get both the goods and the money.

Europe is having a picnic with us, but what becomes of the American? We were told, however, that this new tariff law would increase our exports; that American business would be freed from its shackles, and, while losing its grasp upon the rich American market, would easily make up the difference by capturing a large share of foreign markets. What has been the result? Comparing April of this year with April of last year, the Department of Commerce reports that there has been a falling off in foreign sales amounting to $37,000,000. Taking the imports and exports together, they show a total loss to our commerce of sixty-three and one-half million dollars in one month, or at the rate of over $700,000,000 annually.

The farmer has not escaped the plague of this Democratic tariff. Canada puts a duty on our wheat, but we, in the goodness of our hearts, practically let Canada's wheat in free, and hundreds of thousands of bushels of it are being brought into this country to depress the price of our own product. Even Irish potatoes are coming in by the shipload from abroad. Cargo after cargo of Argentine grain, stock, and other products is landed in our ports, and from every side the American producer is menaced by destructive foreign competition and the American citizen is retreating further and further from his position of industrial supremacy.

But we were promised by the Democratic Party that all this hostile legislation would, at least, bring about one great result—it would, at least, help the consumer; the cost of living would be reduced, and thus the great mass of people would be benefited. They seem to forget that the great mass of the people belong to the producing class, and when they are deprived of the power to produce, when they are deprived of the opportunity to work, no reduction in the cost of their necessities would be of avail, because they would not have the money with which to purchase them. But the point that I want to sink deep into the minds of every hearer is that not only has this Underwood law sacrificed American industry and American labor, not only has it turned the channels of trade away from this country and brought to us the menace of pauper-labor competition, but it has also failed to bring to the American consumer the relief that was so solemnly promised. But hold! It is claimed that though this tariff bill has closed down and destroyed practically all beet-sugar factories, and although it has already ruined the sugar plantations of this country, there has been a reduction to the consumer of one-seventh of a cent per pound. Think of it! For every 2,500 cups of coffee you drink you save 5 cents; and this is your compensation for ruining a great American industry and throwing out of employment thousands of American workmen. My friends, the American people are not fools. They do forget about once in 16 or 20 years, and they do sometimes get mad, as they did in 1912; but I can not help believing that at last they have learned their lesson well and that they will seize the first opportunity to escape from the thralldom of a Democratic tariff policy which has already wrought such havoc to the industry of this country.

Mr. CULLOP. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield there to supplement what he has to say about the unemployed of the country?

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from West Virginia declines to yield.

THE PANAMA CANAL.

Mr. MOSS of West Virginia. Candidate Woodrow Wilson said, in a public speech, that a platform was not molasses with which to catch flies, but it was a solemn pledge to the people which must be observed. The contemplation of Democratic performances must therefore bring sadness to the heart of President Wilson. Not only has this party violated its promise to reduce the cost of living, but, at the insistence of this same Woodrow Wilson, it has unblushingly repudiated a solemn plank of the platform upon which the people elected a Democratic administration. That platform expressly declared:

We favor the exemption from tolls of American ships engaged in coastwise trade passing through the Panama Canal. We also favor legislation forbidding the use of the Panama Canal by ships owned or controlled by railroad carriers engaged in transportation competitive with the canal.

The people believed that this was not "molasses to catch flies"; but, alas, the people are sometimes forgetful of past Democratic promises. Hardly was the administration settled into power before it began an agitation to break its pledge to the people and to call for the repeal of the law of 1912 which exempted our coastwise ships from the payment of tolls through the Panama Canal. Whether you are for or against the repeal of that law as a concrete proposition, you can not defend the action of any party in breaking faith with the people. It is but adding insult to injury to offer the silly and paltry excuse that another part of the platform declares against subsidies. That only goes to show that the Democratic Party in convention assembled did not regard as a subsidy the exemption of American coastwise ships from tolls. That declaration against subsidy was as sounding brass and tinkling cymbals, for in the very first administration bill that was introduced in Congress—the Underwood tariff bill—they indorsed a subsidy by allowing a reduction in duty of 5 per cent on all goods imported in American bottoms. This is a clear and direct subsidy; and so the American people will not listen to the hypocritical excuse that they did not mean to declare for free tolls, because that would be an indirect subsidy. No; if there ever was a broken promise by a political party in the history of this Nation this is one, and I do not believe that the American people will reinstate in power any party that willfully and deliberately violates its platform pledges.

But what is this tolls question? First, there would be no tolls question were it not for the fact that the administration insisted upon raising it. England was at one time apparently satisfied, because her minister of foreign affairs informed this Government that if the United States would, in good faith, exempt only its coastwise ships from tolls, he did not believe England could complain. Of course she could not complain. Did she not construe the treaty of 1815, which provided for equal treatment as to port charges on vessels of commerce of both nations entering English and American ports, as not being intended to cover her coastwise ships, and has she not for a century exempted her coastwise ships from the payment of such charges? Does she not know, and does not every well-informed person know, that we have had for many years a law which prohibited any foreign vessel from engaging in our coastwise trade? And therefore is it not clear that, as only American vessels are engaged in American coastwise trade, no discrimination is made against foreign vessels by exempting from the payment of tolls these American coastwise vessels? Does England not know, and does not every well-informed person know, that the tolls upon her vessels of commerce passing through the Panama Canal have been fixed by our Government at a rate exceptionally low and reasonable, and that therefore she has no reason to complain on economic grounds of generous treatment to our own vessels engaged purely in domestic commerce? Is it not common knowledge that England and other European nations pay direct subsidies to their vessels and thereby give them an advantage in their competition with our ships? On what consistent ground could England then complain even if we exempted from canal tolls not merely our coastwise but also our across-seas ships of commerce? It is admitted by the partisans of repeal that the only ground upon which they can stand is the claim that the United States is included in the term "all nations" in the clause of the Hay-Pauncefote treaty which says:

The canal shall be free and open to the vessels of war and commerce of all nations observing these rules on terms of entire equality.

Who lays down these rules? The treaty expressly provides that the United States shall do so. Who ever heard before of a person who gave permission to other persons to use his roadway or his waterway, paid for by his money, and who, in order to insure equal treatment to all such licensees, laid down rules for their government—who ever heard of such person being bound down by those rules himself? And likewise who ever heard of a nation which has spent $400,000,000 and sacrificed hundreds of lives to build a great waterway connecting two mighty oceans, and who has generously given permission to other nations to use that waterway and has laid down certain rules for their government—who ever heard of such a nation being bound by the very rules that it lays down for the government of those nations upon which it has bestowed such generosity?

The construction that these advocates of repeal put upon this treaty is unreasonable, if not ridiculous, and international law lays down the principle that—

If, for example it would appear that it would have been unreasonable, if not inconceivable, for a contracting State to agree to any but a particular signification of any particular terms employed, the necessary inference that any such State had acted reasonably, if not wisely, will prevail, although such a signification may be at variance with the literal sense of the words of the compact. (3 Am. Journal International Law, p. 55.)

Again, if it is claimed that the United States was intended to be included among the "all nations observing these rules," then look at what these rules say, and again answer whether it would not be ridiculous for the Nation that built this canal to intend to bind itself to be governed by such rules. Here are some of the rules:

The canal shall never be blockaded, nor shall any right of war nor any act of hostility be committed within it.

Vessels of war of a belligerent shall not revictual nor take in stores in the canal, except so far as may be strictly necessary.

* * * * * * *

No belligerent shall embark or disembark troops, munitions of war, or warlike materials in the canal. The provisions of this article shall apply to waters adjacent to the canal within 3 marine miles of either end.

Vessels of war of a belligerent shall not remain in any such waters longer than 24 hours at any one time, except in case of distress, and in such case shall depart as soon as possible.

Now, mark you, that vessels of war and vessels of commerce are placed upon exactly the same footing in this treaty. If we are bound by the rules, and can not exempt our vessels of commerce, then we are also bound by the rules when it comes to our vessels of war in time of war, and we, as a belligerent nation, in time of war would thus be prevented by the rules that I have quoted from using our canal for our purposes, from giving aid and relief to our soldiers and sailors passing through the canal, from leaving our ships in the canal and within 3 marine miles from either end longer than 24 hours; and, in fact, if this be the construction of the treaty, we will have built, at the cost of hundreds of millions of dollars, one of the greatest engineering structures of the centuries, with the result that it will endanger our very national existence by furnishing a convenient passageway to an enemy's ships, after attacking one of our coasts, to go to the other coast within 12 hours in order to devastate that other coast, when, without that canal, it would have taken them weeks to have reached that other coast by going around the continent. And so you see this is a vital question. It is not merely a question of whether or not you are going to let the transcontinental railroads of this country deprive American citizens of cheap transportation through their canal in order that the railroads may be able to charge a higher rate—although this is important enough—but it is a question that involves perhaps the very salvation of this Nation in time of war.

Now, if we admit by unconditional repeal of this solemn law of Congress, which granted exemption to coastwise ships, that we were wrong in passing that law, and that the treaty would not permit such law, we are thereby also admitting that our ships of war are also governed by those "rules" and that our rights in that canal are but fleeting shadows—the right to build it, the right to pay for it and keep it up, the responsibility of conducting it, without one cent of compensating advantage to us, either in time of peace or in time of war. No wonder that all over this Nation to-day a storm of protest is beating upon the doors of the Capitol and the White House—a protest of red-blooded American citizens, who deny the right of any President or any Congress, at the mere command of a foreign power, to sacrifice and voluntarily surrender, without even an attempt at diplomatic negotiation, the property and the privileges for which we have paid so dearly. And this protest comes, not as a partisan cry, but it comes from patriotic American citizens of every class, party, and creed, who believe in the great and immortal doctrine of American preservation and American supremacy.

THE COLOMBIAN TREATY.

But the tolls question does not exhibit the only striking illustration of the willingness of this administration to agree to unreasonable foreign demands. A few weeks ago the country was shocked to hear that our Department of State had negotiated a treaty with Colombia by which we were to pay that country a cool $25,000,000, and, in addition to that, render to that country an apology for refusing at the time we acquired the Panama Canal Zone to submit to its attempt at blackmail. Anyone familiar with the negotiations between Colombia and the United States from the beginning to the end knows that the former country, starting with small demands and gradually increasing them until they became extortionate and outrageous demands, has been attempting to hold up this country because of its acquisition of a narrow strip of land from the Republic of Panama, to be used in the canal enterprise. One might think, from the size of the demand, that we had taken the whole Colombian nation. The administration is lavish indeed in its promises and payments to other nations, and many there be who wish that such generosity could be transferred to the people of America, to the extent, at least, of adopting such policies as would give them work and prosperity.

THE MEXICAN POLICY.

At this present time it would seem that after Villa has finished his campaign of cold-blooded murder and rapine, the administration may be able to make terms of peace with him, and thus insure for a time the cessation of hostilities in Mexico. There are no hostilities now being carried on between the United States and Mexico, and so it is eminently proper that we should consider briefly the history of the administration's attitude and activities toward that benighted nation. First, we submit, as declared by the platform of the Republican Party of West Virginia, adopted in convention on May 20, 1914, that—either it was our duty to keep hands off in Mexico and recognize the existing Government, or else it was our duty to acknowledge our responsibility for the welfare of our sister Republic, and to take prompt and sufficient steps to prevent a continuation of the deplorable conditions which have existed in that ill-fated land. As the latter policy was adopted by the administration, we believe it should have been determined and vigorous, and worthy of the traditions of our great Nation. The policy of "watchful waiting," which, while denying recognition to the existing form of government, has, by listless inactivity, permitted the continuance of unspeakable atrocities, not only upon the citizens of Mexico, but upon American citizens—men, women, and children—is to be greatly deplored.

I recognize the fact that when an American citizen goes to or resides in a country where a state of war exists he must take his chances, if he gets in the way, of injury to his person or his property. But we do protest that this country should never have permitted, as it has done, American citizens to be especially picked out by Mexicans for insult, imprisonment, and slaughter, and we believe that had the administration taken a firm stand upon the killing there, under such circumstances, of the first American citizen, instead of waiting until after the killing of a British subject, the lives of many American citizens, men, women, and children, would have been spared.

THE RESERVE-BANK CITIES.

Many of us Republicans voted for the currency bill advanced by the administration because we believed that it was a step in the right direction and that its operation would serve to relieve the money stringency which would surely follow the passage and operation of the Underwood tariff law. After the passage of this currency bill the Secretaries of the Treasury and the Department of Agriculture took a vote of the national banks, calling for their desire as to location of from 8 to 12 reserve banks called for by that law. In addition to this, these enterprising Cabinet officers made a long and luxurious trip all over the country, presumably for the purpose of ascertaining the desires of the people in this regard. We had a right to expect that the result of this apparent anxiety to reach a right conclusion would bring beneficial results; but, on the contrary, it would seem that more accurate and more beneficial results would have followed from a blindfold drawing or from the toss of a coin. Time will not permit a discussion of this whole subject at this time, but as an illustration of the abject failure to carry out the spirit of this law, let me refer to the fate of my own State of West Virginia. First, it was split in two, in uneven and unequal parts; a part of it was fastened to the distant city of Cleveland, when the trend of business from that part was distinctly toward the city of Pittsburgh; and the other part of it was fastened to the city of Richmond, when the trend of business of that part was distinctly elsewhere. The result is that there will now be an artificial attempt to change the trend of business—a thing that will cause confusion worse confounded—and the time is now gone by when West Virginia can hope to derive much benefit from the new currency law. It has been suggested that the reason why Richmond was selected as the reserve city where most of the West Virginia national banks must do their business and must make their deposits was because if the Supreme Court of the United States should render a decision against West Virginia in her controversy with Virginia over the Virginia debt, Virginia could compel payment because she would have within her own borders an amount of money sufficient to pay that judgment. I can not bring myself, however, to believe that this motive entered into the selection of Richmond as a reserve city, nor that the Hon. John Skelton Williams, of Virginia, now Comptroller of the Currency, could or would have exercised such an influence.

THE VIRGINIA DEBT.

The people of West Virginia are vitally interested in that debt suit. I take the same position to-day that I took from the first—that West Virginia does not owe one single cent of debt to Virginia—and I will not admit such debt until and unless the Supreme Court of the United States, by a regular judgment, adjudicates that debt against my State. Who raised this debt question? Would it ever have been raised had not Virginia, by its voluntary act, seceded from the Union of States and thereby altered the implied contract which existed between her eastern and her western portions to remain a part of the Union. She chose to secede. Western Virginia refused to secede, as she had a right to do. If Virginia had not seceded there would be no Virginia debt question to settle. I therefore hold that she, having raised that question by her secession, must settle it herself, and she can not now call upon the loyal State of West Virginia to assume a responsibility which Virginia herself created. This is only one of many strong reasons against inflicting this huge debt upon the people of West Virginia.

A great deal of foolishness has been exhibited by a small portion of the Democratic press of my district in reference to the action of my predecessor, Hon. John M. Hamilton, in regard to this debt. While the case was pending in the Supreme Court, where it still pends, and before that court had rendered any judgment against West Virginia, which it has not yet done, Mr. Hamilton introduced a resolution in Congress which showed on its face that the owing of such a debt was recognized. This resolution was to the effect that it was the sense of Congress that the debt owing from West Virginia to Virginia should be paid by the United States Government. The introduction of this resolution at that time was a decided mistake for the following reasons:

First. When a case is pending before a court in which the defendant denies it owes any debt it surely does not help the defendant any in the minds of the court for the defendant to say, in effect, that what debt he does owe ought to be paid by somebody else.

Second. Even though the resolution had been passed by Congress, which it was not, it would have done absolutely no good, because it merely expressed the sense of Congress and did not appropriate one cent for the payment of any debt.

Third. Introduced as it was prior to the campaign of 1912, and prior, as stated before, to the rendering of any judgment against West Virginia, it created the impression in the minds of many people that it was merely a political move, and thereby the question which has no business there was injected into the maelstrom of politics.

Mr. Hamilton made an argument for the resolution, not before Congress, as I understand, but before a committee or subcommittee, and this argument has been heralded abroad by some of the Democratic press as if it were an argument made before Congress itself upon some vital matter pending before Congress. As a matter of fact, the resolution never was acted upon by Congress and did absolutely no good. And even the Democratic members of the committee to whom Mr. Hamilton's resolution was referred reported to Congress that the resolution was premature.

Now, there has been a whole lot of claptrap about this resolution in an effort to make the people of the fourth district of West Virginia believe that this was, indeed, their salvation and that its author was their savior in the Virginia debt matter. I said in a public speech last campaign that if West Virginia had to pay the debt, I also would be in favor of asking the United States to pay it and would agree with the principle of Mr. Hamilton's contention; and because I said that, I was misrepresented by that same small portion of the Democratic press, which tried to make it appear that I had given full indorsement to the action of my predecessor from beginning to end on this resolution. I repeatedly stated in subsequent speeches that if the debt was finally adjudicated against the State of West Virginia, I would introduce a bill in Congress—and not a mere empty resolution—for the appropriation of money out of the Treasury of the United States to pay the amount of the judgment against the State of West Virginia. And I still intend to do so should the Supreme Court render such judgment. Now, that is all there is to the political side of the Virginia debt question in my district, and I do not believe that falsification and misrepresentation on the part of a small portion of the Democratic press of that district will in the future even fool as many people as it did prior to the last election.

GOOD ROADS.

All of the Republican Representatives from West Virginia, I believe, voted at this session for the passage of the good-roads law. The particular law does not entirely meet with my approval. It does not, among other things, appropriate as much money as I think should be appropriated for national aid to good roads, and the working plan of the bill is not as I would have it. True to the promise I made to the people in the last campaign, I introduced in this Congress a good-roads bill, which was referred to the Committee on Roads, before whom I made an argument in its favor. I also made a speech on the floor of the House in support of my bill, but the committee, in its wisdom, recommended the passage of the bill introduced by its chairman, and rather than see all good-roads legislation fail, and believing that that bill, in part at least, covered the ground, I gave it my support. I hope that this will only be an entering wedge and that by congressional legislation we can in future years give a new impetus to that important national project of giving aid to the building, construction, and preservation of good solid highways for the use of the people.

THE TRUE FRIEND OF THE OLD SOLDIER.

It has been my pleasure, serving as a Member of this House, to support consistently and uniformly all reasonable measures that have come before the House for the relief of the old soldier. During the last campaign it was claimed by the Democrats of my district and elsewhere that the Democratic Party and its congressional candidates had become real friends of the old soldiers, but in a speech which I made in this House several months ago I showed by the RECORD that upon the passage of the original Sherwood bill almost every Member voting against that bill was a Democrat, and that upon the passage of the conference bill which finally became a law every single Member of the House voting against that bill was also a Democrat. In a debate in which I participated on the floor of the House some weeks ago my opponent, who is a Democrat from the State of Texas, admitted that the fact was that the Democrats had espoused the cause of the old soldier as a political bid for their support. The true friend of the old soldier is the Republican Party. It has been tried and tested on this question for almost 50 years, and the old soldiers, knowing their best interest, will not be led astray from that party by any claim made by the Democratic Party of new-formed friendship.

Mr. Speaker, ofttimes in the stilly night you can hear a faint and murmuring sound which amid the busy hours of day could not be heard. And so to-day amid the depressing quiet of industrial stagnation you can hear the approaching footsteps of the Republican host which, on the 3d day of November next, will reach the polls, and will there render a solemn verdict against the continued domination of that party that now, as in the past, has ever brought industrial depression and disaster to our beloved country. [Applause on the Republican side.]

And so, Mr. Chairman, I thus briefly go over the Democratic record on these measures, not, as some of my friends on the other side think, for the purpose of engaging in partisan controversy, but for the purpose here and now of calling attention to what has happened heretofore when some on this side of the Chamber have united in supporting some of the policies that have been advocated on that side, and to express the hope that while a great many Republicans and Progressives will support this measure—to express the hope, I say, that the administration of the same will not be attended by the results that have been witnessed with reference to the tariff and the currency bills. [Applause.]

Mr. GORDON. Will the gentleman yield to me for a question?

The CHAIRMAN. Will the gentleman from West Virginia [Mr. Moss] yield to the gentleman from Ohio?

Mr. MOSS of West Virginia. Yes.

Mr. GORDON. Has the price of farm products dropped in West Virginia?

Mr. MOSS of West Virginia. They are beginning to drop; yes, sir.

Mr. GORDON. What is the price of wool down there?

Mr. MOSS of West Virginia. What is the price of wool?

Mr. GORDON. Yes; compared with a year ago.

Mr. MOSS of West Virginia. I thought you wished to ask me a pertinent question.

Mr. GORDON. I did.

Mr. MOSS of West Virginia. Then ask me a sensible question.

Mr. GORDON. You were complaining, if I understood your remarks, that the farmers were terribly injured by this tariff bill.

Mr. MOSS of West Virginia. I am speaking of statistics.

Mr. GORDON. I am speaking of facts. I am not speaking of statistics. I want to know what the facts are. You live there.

Mr. MOSS of West Virginia. Yes; I certainly do. And I can tell you that the facts are that for the first time since we had the last Democratic administration we are feeling a business depression in West Virginia.

Mr. GORDON. Now, I want to interrogate you about that depression. Is it among the farmers?

Mr. MOSS of West Virginia. It is partly among the farmers.

Mr. GORDON. What farm products have you in West Virginia?

Mr. MOSS of West Virginia. You can not injure any set of people without injuring your neighbors.

Mr. GORDON. What farm products have suffered injury in West Virginia?

Mr. MOSS of West Virginia. When you injure a business man or a laboring man you injure the farmer.

Mr. GORDON. Name one farm product in West Virginia that has been injured.

Mr. MOSS of West Virginia. The gentleman keeps on talking, and gives me no opportunity to answer. The gentleman does not want an answer, evidently.

Mr. GORDON. I am asking the gentleman questions.

Mr. MOSS of West Virginia. It would, indeed, be inconsiderate of me did I not attempt at least to satisfy the thirst for knowledge of my good Democratic friend from Ohio [Mr. GORDON], who insists upon my stating to him the prices of various farm products. By his interruption he sought to convey the impression that I was wrong in my statement that the price of farm products to the farmer had suffered because of the operation of the Underwood tariff law. The bad effect of that law upon the farmers, as I stated, has begun to be felt, but it will be felt more and more as these farm products from foreign nations continue to be imported in increasing quantities. The fact is that just as soon as the country saw that a Democratic administration was inevitable, owing to a split in the Republican Party, and that therefore a free-trade tariff law was inevitable, the anticipation of these events caused a depreciation in some of the products of the farm. I now give to the House, for the benefit of my friend from Ohio, and also my inquiring friend from Indiana [Mr. CULLOP], statistics comparing the months of April and May, 1914, with the same months of 1912, showing the prices of corn, wheat, and wool, specially prepared by the Department of Agriculture:

Date.	In the United States.			In West Virginia.
	Wheat per bushel.	Corn per bushel.	Wool, unwashed, per pound.	Wheat per bushel.	Corn per bushel.	Wool, unwashed, per pound.
April:	Cents.	Cents.	Cents.	Cents.	Cents.	Cents.
1914	84.2	70.7	16.8	101	85	20
1912	92.5	71.1	17.3	105	89	21
May:
1914	83.9	72.1	17.2	100	87	21
1912	99.7	79.4	17.8	110	92	22

I trust that these conclusive figures will satisfy these gentlemen, as actual experience has already satisfied the farmers of this country, that the Underwood tariff law has reduced prices paid to the farmers, and thus injured them, as well as other classes of people in this country.

Mr. ADAMSON. Mr. Chairman, I yield 5 minutes to the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. CULLOP].

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Indiana [Mr. CULLOP] is recognized for 5 minutes.

Mr. CULLOP. Mr. Chairman, I am quite sure that the gentleman from West Virginia [Mr. Moss] would not want to make a great mistake in his speech, and I would therefore call his attention to the Underwood Tariff Act, page 57, paragraph 644. I will read it to the gentleman, to show that wheat is not on the free list, and the gentleman ought to correct his speech in that regard, as I am sure he desires, or ought to desire, to state the facts on this subject.

Mr. STEENERSON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Indiana yield to the gentleman from Minnesota?

Mr. CULLOP. Yes.

Mr. STEENERSON. Is not the gentleman reading from the free list?

Mr. CULLOP. Sir, if the gentleman will listen, he will find out the Underwood bill does not put wheat or flour on the free list, but, on the contrary, both are on the dutiable list.

Mr. STEENERSON. The gentleman is reading from the free list now.

Mr. CULLOP. Oh, if the gentleman from Minnesota will be patient for a moment, I will satisfy even him that wheat, under the Underwood bill, is not on the free list. I read:

644. Wheat, wheat flour, semolina, and other wheat products not specially provided for in this section: Provided, That wheat shall be subject to a duty of 10 cents per bushel, that wheat flour shall be subject to a duty of 45 cents per barrel of 196 pounds, and semolina and other products of wheat not specially provided for in this section, 10 per cent ad valorem, when imported directly or indirectly from a country, dependency, or other subdivision of government which imposes a duty on wheat or wheat flour or semolina imported from the United States.

Mr. STEENERSON. Now, if the gentleman will yield——

Mr. CULLOP. I decline to yield to the gentleman from Minnesota now. He can have his own time. I know he is impatient, but he must possess himself in peace. This refutes the charge, as the tariff act shows there is a duty of 10 cents a bushel on wheat. Wheat now is a better price under Democratic times than it was in 1912 under Republican rule. [Applause.]

Now, I desire to call the attention of the gentleman from West Virginia [Mr. Moss] to labor conditions, in order that he may correct his speech on this question, as I have no doubt he desires to give conditions as they really are and not as he and some of the calamity howlers would have them. Labor is in demand, as I shall show. I read from the St. Louis Post-Dispatch, an independent paper:

EIGHTY-TWO THOUSAND HARVEST HANDS NEEDED TO REAP WHEAT.

Kansas, Missouri, and Oklahoma raisers of wheat need at least 82,000 more men to help in harvesting their crops, and the commissioners of labor of those States have asked Secretary of Labor Wilson to have his department cooperate with them in obtaining the necessary workers.

The men will be wanted by June 15, and the pay, it is stated, will range from $2 to $3.50 a day. The period of employment will be from three to five or six months.

Mr. FESS. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Indiana yield to the gentleman from Ohio?

Mr. CULLOP. Let me get through reading this article. If the gentleman from Ohio will not be so impatient, he will have an opportunity to be heard. I know this is very unsatisfactory to him and a few of his associates.

Mr. FESS. I beg the gentleman's pardon.

Mr. CULLOP. I read further:

Various local organizations in the three States will arrange for distributing the men among the wheat farmers.

Now, Mr. Chairman, if the gentleman from West Virginia will look up his vast army of idle workmen about which he speaks, he can find remunerative employment for them; but he will look in vain. This idle army only exists in his fertile imagination; but I fear that the gentleman's prophecy about idle men in West Virginia is about as near correct as it was a year ago, when he made the prophecy that putting wool on the free list would drive the sheep husbandry out of the State of West Virginia. And yet at this time, this year, when wool is on the free list, it is selling at from 3 to 6 cents a pound higher than it sold at the same time last year, when there was high duty upon it. The sheep and wool industry is thriving better free of duty than it did a year ago under the high duties of the Payne-Aldrich law.

Mr. MOSS of West Virginia. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FESS. Now will the gentleman yield?

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman yield, and to whom?

Mr. CULLOP. Let me get through. I do hope the gentleman will possess his patience. I know these facts make him impatient.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman declines to yield.

Mr. CULLOP. I am sure the gentleman is not willing to have those idle workmen—if any are to be found there—leave his State and go to places where they can get remunerative wages, if they are not doing so now; but he will want them to remain in the State for the fall elections, with the hope that they will stand by the Republican Party, but I prophesy that in this he hopes in vain, as they will indorse the Democratic Party and its wholesome legislation and return an overwhelming majority against the Republican Party in the State of West Virginia. I know our Republican friends are frantic in their desperation, hoping that labor is idle, that wages are low, that business is stagnant, and that industry will shut down in order that they can howl calamity as the result of Democratic policies; but in spite of their frantic efforts business continues good, labor employed, and the people satisfied. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. FESS. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield now?

Mr. CULLOP. Certainly.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Indiana has expired.

Mr. FESS. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman may have one minute more.

Mr. DONOVAN. Regular order, Mr. Chairman.

The CHAIRMAN. The regular order is demanded.

Mr. MOSS of West Virginia. Mr. Chairman, my time has not entirely expired. I wish to answer the gentleman.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman's time has expired.

Mr. ADAMSON. Mr. Chairman, I yield to the gentleman from Colorado [Mr. SELDOMRIDGE] five minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Colorado [Mr. SELDOMRIDGE] is recognized for five minutes.

Mr. SELDOMRIDGE. Mr. Chairman, I am heartily in favor of the legislation proposed by the bill now pending before the committee.

I believe that the revelations which have recently been given to the country in connection with the management of some of our great railroad systems demonstrate beyond any question the need for legislation of this character. The Interstate Commerce Commission has been given authority over the income of the railroad companies through its control and regulation of rates, but no control has been given to the commission to regulate the issuance of stocks and bonds, to fix the amount of capitalization which should form the true basis of rate determination. A study of the financial management of the New York, New Haven & Hartford Railroad Co., the Chicago, Rock Island & Pacific Railroad Co., the Baltimore & Ohio Railroad Co., and other companies demonstrates conclusively to my mind that there is an urgent and pressing demand for this legislation. The truth of the matter is, Mr. Chairman, that those who have controlled the policy and management of our great railroad systems have not been altogether animated by the desire to develop those systems along just and honest lines. Railroads have fallen into the control of individuals and of interests that have exploited them for their own benefit and welfare, and the consequence has been that a toll has been levied upon the consumers of the country in the matter of transportation charges and in the shrinkage of investment values which, to my mind, has proven to be one of the most powerful factors in what we term the increased cost of living.

If this Congress has performed no other service of value to the country than this, it will receive the thanks and applause of the American people. In my opinion, it will not only be of benefit to the people but it will also firmly establish in public confidence the worth of the securities of railroad corporations. It will give to the investing public an assurance of stability and of fair dealing in the matter of railroad management, which has been so lamentably lacking. We are making history in the line of public welfare by the passage of this bill.

I am glad that the bill has come before the House so generously indorsed by members of the committee representing all shades of political opinion. It is a matter for congratulation that the committee and the membership of this House can consider a measure of such far-reaching importance divested of any political bearing, and I predict, Mr. Chairman, that there will be recognition given by the people of the country to the membership of this House for the service which is being rendered to the country by the passage of this bill. The time has come when the Government must step in and exercise its power in the interest of the great masses of the people. And I want to say that, as a member of the majority party, I will join forces with the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. STEVENS] in support of a measure providing for the Federal incorporation of railroads. I believe we have passed the point where we can deal with these great organizations of capital, reaching out and controlling the destinies of commerce in so many States, through the medium of the State governments. They require the oversight and the control of Federal authority, and the time will come in the near future, I believe, when the Government will, through legislation, seek to put all of these great corporations under the operation of some general directing law. Until that time comes we will find ourselves constantly beset by the necessity for piecemeal legislation, which, in my judgment, will be more or less ineffective. The time must arrive when we will face this problem from a national standpoint and when we will see the interests of the country demand that these corporations shall all be treated alike, and that there shall be some general law which will control them in all departments of their operation and that will not leave them to the conflicting acts of the various State legislatures. [Applause.]

Mr. ADAMSON. Will the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. STEVENS] yield some time?

Mr. STEVENS of Minnesota. I yield to the gentleman from Washington [Mr. JOHNSON].

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. BALTZ). The gentleman from Washington is recognized.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. Mr. Chairman, I wish to occupy a few moments of the time of the committee on the question of the transportation of lepers in interstate traffic, concerning which strict regulations exist.

A most distressing situation has arisen with regard to an unfortunate citizen of the United States, a veteran of the Spanish-American War, the leper John Early, who first turned up some four years ago in the city of Washington. He was most generously cared for by the people here, I am told, but was finally persuaded to leave the city of Washington to go where he pleased on condition that he would not return to this city. In the course of time he arrived near Tacoma, Wash., with a wife and several children.

Mr. RAKER. Is there any evidence that the authorities of the city of Washington knew that this man had leprosy and then turned him loose upon this country on condition that he would not return to the city of Washington, but go elsewhere?

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. I can not say as to all the steps taken at that time by the authorities of the District.

Mr. RAKER. Such a condition of affairs would be worse than turning loose a band of murderers.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. Let me say, however, that a dispute arose as to the disease from which the man suffered. Both the medical authorities of the United States Public Health Service and of the District of Columbia insisted that he had leprosy, and their diagnosis has since been confirmed beyond all question. However, a doctor came here from New York and insisted that Early did not have leprosy; and while the controversy was raging he was given money and urged to disappear. The District of Columbia, although it gave him a house and gave his wife another, disclaimed him as a citizen. They disclaimed him then; they disclaim him now; and they are starting the steps which they think will result in sending him back to the State of Washington.

Mr. Chairman, John Early is not a citizen of the State of Washington, but simply because he turned up there, because he was well treated there, and finally placed in the United States quarantine station at Diamond Head, in the congressional district which I have the honor to represent, it seems that all hands desire now to send him back there.

The point is this: Diamond Head is no more a leper colony than is Fishers Island, in Chesapeake Bay, between Cape May and Cape Henry. Diamond Head is a Government quarantine station, and until Early appeared there we never had any lepers there. Once Early was placed in that quarantine station the people of western Washington were good enough to raise no protest. They did not want the man persecuted. They did not, however, accept him as a citizen. They made no protest whatever until the Government commenced to send other lepers, one by one, to that quarantine station.

This kept on until there were at one time six lepers at Diamond Head.

Now, Early has escaped. He is back in the District of Columbia. A hue and cry is raised, and it is proclaimed that the unfortunate man must be sent back to my State almost by the first train. I have just received the following telegram from the governor of the State of Washington:

OLYMPIA, WASH., June 4, 1914.

Hon. A. JOHNSON,
Congressman, Washington:

Understanding that the District of Columbia Commissioners are urging the Secretary of the Treasury to return Leper Early to Diamond Head, in this State, on the ground that that point is an official leper colony, I beg to protest as chief executive of this State against his return. I also protest against having Diamond Head officially designated as a leper colony for the United States. Hope you will be able to convince the Secretary of the Treasury that such action would be unfair to this State and to the residents in the vicinity of Diamond Head.

ERNEST LISTER, Governor.

Mr. GARNER. Is this a Government station?

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. It is a quarantine station, just as is the station off the coast of Maine, the one at Golden Gate, or the one at Fishermans Point, and others elsewhere on both coasts.

Mr. GARNER. It is maintained at the cost of the Government?

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. Yes.

Mr. GARNER. Then would not the officials have a right to place a leper there?

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. Yes; but it is not officially a leper colony. Would the gentleman like some Government station or reservation in his district gradually worked over into a leper colony?

Mr. GARNER. No; but the gentleman was challenging the authority of the Government to send him there, or your governor was.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. No; the governor resents the sending of lepers across the United States to that station one after another, and his protest is based on the assumption that in the course of time that point will, through nonresistance, become an official colony for lepers.

Mr. RAKER. Will my learned and distinguished friend from Washington yield?

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. The gentleman flatters me; but I will yield.

Mr. RAKER. How did Early get out of the station at Diamond Head?

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. I have not the exact details, but it may be assumed that these unfortunate men are allowed in the main to care for themselves.

Mr. RAKER. The authorities let them come and go as they please?

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. Oh, no. But of necessity they let them care for themselves, and five of them have escaped—all except one.

Mr. RAKER. Are not the Government officials supposed to control them, or did they turn them loose?

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. They did not turn them loose, but the lepers have no nurse constantly by them, and no attendant wants to lay hands on or come in close contact with these men. If this man Early should be taken back across the United States, 3,300 miles, to Diamond Head, permission would have to be secured from every State through which he passed. He would be placed in a car alone, with no attendant in the car, keeping in the Molokai colony, in Hawaii, any citizen of the train at Chillicothe, Ohio, or Chicago or St. Paul or any other place.

Now, Mr. Chairman, I had no intention of going into details concerning this one case. There are other cases—not many, but enough to warrant the United States, as a matter of humanity and for the conservation of the health of its people, in taking a decisive step and taking that step now. I am addressing the committee for the purpose of calling attention to a bill which has been introduced to-day by myself after consultation with many interested persons. It is a bill proposing that the United States shall pay to the Territorial government of Hawaii for keeping in the Molokai colony, in Hawaii, any citizen of the United States who is so unfortunate as to be afflicted with leprosy.

Mr. ADAMSON. Mr. Chairman, I will yield the gentleman whatever time I may consume of his if he will yield.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. I will yield gladly.

Mr. ADAMSON. If the gentleman will kindly designate some place where afflicted people would be acceptable to the community, he would very greatly aid our committee. There are bills before the committee for a leprosarium and tubercularium, but we do not know where to put them. One time we brought in a bill locating one of these sanitariums in Arizona or New Mexico, and the gentlemen from that part of God's globe got up and got on our necks, and they beat us horse, foot, and dragoon, and I doubt if the bill received half the votes of the members of the committee when up in the House. No one wants them. If the gentleman can help us at all on that particular question we will know how to deal with these bills asking that these people be segregated and that a location be fixed for their entertainment and treatment.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. I am grateful to the gentleman from Georgia, and I make this suggestion: It seems to be impracticable to find any place in continental United States that will receive without protest these unfortunate people. I thought yesterday that one of the many islands comprising the Aleutian group in Alaska could be used as a leper colony; that they could be put to gardening and homesteading. The climate there is good; perhaps a little damp in winter. But the Delegate from Alaska protested almost immediately; and who can blame him?

I thought, too, that the United States might secure an island in Hawaii and there construct and maintain a leprosarium. But why go to such expense, when Hawaii already has a well-conducted colony at Molokai, and where we can care for our lepers better and at less expense than at Diamond Head or another point in the United States proper?

All of these plans for the purchase of islands contemplate the expenditure of a large sum—from $150,000 to $500,000. The smaller sum will pay for the care of the lepers we are likely to send to Hawaii in 20 years. There are but few in the United States. The most—about 200, I am told—are in a State colony in Louisiana. There are a few in Connecticut, a few in Minnesota, a dozen or so in New York City—and, by the way, these are allowed considerable freedom—and one remaining at Diamond Head, in my State. The disease is not so contagious or infectious as is believed. Since the days of Esther, described in the Old Testament, a leper has been an outcast, shunned and driven away with the cry "Unclean! unclean!" ringing in his ears.

In the Molokai colony, where lepers intermarry, I am told that 9 per cent of their progeny become afflicted. It is unfortunate, but a leper nowadays is pursued as he was long before Christ. He has no chance. He must go away. Mr. Chairman, I sincerely hope this Congress may provide a way to pay the Territorial government of Hawaii for the care of all American lepers who are willing to go to the colony at Molokai.

Mr. MURDOCK. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. Yes; certainly.

Mr. MURDOCK. I would like to ask the gentleman where Early came from this last time?

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. Originally he was a citizen of North Carolina, enlisted in the Army, fought in the Philippines, and there contracted this disease. Then he returned to North Carolina. It was a matter of dispute for some time as to whether he had the disease, and he came to Washington for the purpose of consulting the leading surgeons here. Then he left and bobbed up near Tacoma, in my State.

Mr. MURDOCK. He has been gone a number of years. Where did he come from this last time?

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. May 17 he escaped from the Diamond Head Quarantine Station in Washington, crossed the Straits of Fuca into Victoria, British Columbia, stayed there at the leading hotels, took one of the finest trains on the Canadian Pacific Railroad, and traveled east with some of the most prominent citizens of that country, among others former Attorney General Grey. He stopped in New York. He came here to this city and spent four or five days in one of the leading hotels here, went up to another and hobnobbed with officials of the United States, and finally called out to the Government, "I am Early, the leper, the unclean, helpless, dependent on you."

Mr. MURDOCK. He was probably at some time in the gallery of the House.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. I have no doubt that he was here, and if he could have addressed this House he would have said what he has said in an interview, as follows:

The John Early that was is dead to the world. I have put the world behind me. From now on I am willing to be isolated, to have the warning bell of the "unclean" rung as I approach, to feel that men shrink from me with the world-old fear of the terrible disease that has been laid upon me, but I want my appeal to be heard.

This unfortunate man also said to a reporter:

To demonstrate how easy it is for a leper to mingle in cities, I planned my present trip six months ago. I knew that it is only when a great truth is sent home to the hearts of the people that attention is paid to it. I knew that if I mingled among the well-to-do and the rich and exposed them to contagion that they would arise out of self-protection and further my plan of a national home. That is why I chose the Pullman car, why I slept at the best hotels, ate in the best restaurants. No one cares what happens to the poor. If I had kept to the slums in my travels, the agitation would have been little. I had no desire to hurt anyone. I do not believe that the present stage of my disease is contagious. I had the money to travel as I did. I saved my wages and my pension for months to do so, and I hope the lesson has struck home.

Mr. Chairman, this man is willing to go to Molokai. My bill provides for the sending of only those who are willing to go. It provides for the payment to each American leper who goes there a small gratuity—$20 a month. This is humane; it is right.

In an afternoon paper a charge is made that the city of Washington and the State of Washington have been unfair and ungenerous in the treatment of Early. This is not quite correct. Both city and State have done only what is so graphically depicted in Gen. Lew Wallace's great novel, Ben Hur. The city of Washington was generous to Early, and the city of Tacoma, in my State, was more than generous. Its people bought him a farm. They gave him a large purse. They provided well for his family. His acts have not repaid them, but he is forgiven.

The Nation has done what it could for him. It has given him a liberal pension. It has put him on the Government pay roll as a nurse to himself, but it has not given him a home. He is still an outcast.

Let me append an editorial appearing in this afternoon's Washington Times:

THE CASE OF EARLY.

The case of John Early, leper, has been an amazing series of demonstrations that American civilization is yet afflicted with a good deal of the barbarism of the Middle Ages.

Early has been handled in the District of Columbia, in the State of Washington, and elsewhere throughout the country, in a way that shows how liable the public is to fall into panic over that which it does not understand. Leprosy is a disease almost unknown in this country. It is said that there are perhaps 300 cases of it in continental United States.

Nowhere has provision been made for humane treatment of these unfortunates. They are a terror of society, largely because of its incapacity to determine how it shall deal with them; and the menace which they represent is of course vastly increased by reason of the hesitancy and uncertainty of the community in dealing with them.

Early crossed the continent without difficulty after getting away from his asylum in Washington State, traveled on the best trains, and returned to this city, the scene of his most pitiful experiences, immediately after he was authoritatively decided to be a leper. After he got here he went to a hotel, and not until he himself notified the authorities of his presence was it suspected.

Now, there is a renewal of the old quarrel as to what jurisdiction is responsible for him. Nobody wants him, and nobody, in the face of the strange, medieval terror inspired by his disease, seems concerned whether he shall be given civilized treatment; to get him as far away as possible and to insure that he will not return is the uttermost ambition of everybody and every community that he might possibly impose himself upon. It is a pitiful reflection of the inefficiency of provision for such cases.

I will add the regulations of the Government concerning the transportation of lepers:

TRANSPORTATION OF LEPERS IN INTERSTATE TRAFFIC.

Paragraph 9. Common carriers shall not, under authority of paragraph 8, accept for transportation nor transport in interstate traffic any person suffering from or afflicted with leprosy unless there has been obtained from the Surgeon General of the Public Health and Marine-Hospital Service or his accredited representative a permit stating that said person may be received under such restrictions as will prevent the spread of the disease, and said restrictions shall be specified in each instance: Provided, That, in addition to the above, permits shall also be obtained from the health authorities of the States, Territories, or districts to and from which the patient intends to travel.

Paragraph 10. No person knowing or having reason to believe that he is a leper shall accept transportation nor engage in travel in interstate traffic unless permits have been obtained, as set forth in the preceding section, and unless said person shall have agreed in writing to comply with the restrictions as specified in the permits mentioned above.

Paragraph 11. Any person who presents symptoms of leprosy and who is traveling or who has left the State where he resides, in violation of the above regulations, shall be detained, and if proven to be a leper shall be returned to such State or removed to such Federal quarantine station as the Secretary of the Treasury may designate and the proper health authorities notified.

Paragraph 12. Compartments or places in cars, vessels, or conveyances operated in interstate traffic and that have been occupied by persons afflicted with leprosy shall be immediately closed after being vacated by the patient and so kept until after proper disinfection.

And, in conclusion, Mr. Chairman, I appeal to the Congress f the United States to settle the matter along the lines which have been suggested, as generously, as liberally, and as quickly as possible.

I thank the Members for their attention.

Mr. STEVENS of Minnesota. Mr. Chairman, I yield to the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. VOLSTEAD] such time as he may desire.

Mr. VOLSTEAD. Mr. Chairman, some years ago I became interested in the question of whether Congress has the power to regulate the issue of the stocks and bonds of a railway corporation created by a State but engaged in interstate commerce.

I concluded that Congress has the power, but I find that the reasons that appeal to me in support of my faith differ from that usually assigned. It is generally urged that capitalization may be considered in fixing rates, and that therefore the power to control capitalization is a necessary power in fixing rates. I can not agree to this proposition. The market value of the capitalization may be considered in determining the physical value of the railway, but rates can not be fixed with reference to the par value of the stocks and bonds that a road may have outstanding.

I would rest the right to regulate the issue of stock and bonds upon different grounds. First, any corporation that engages in interstate commerce assumes the duty of making suitable provisions for and taking care of that commerce. This doctrine is emphatically laid down in the case of the Atlantic Coast Line v. North Carolina Corporation Commission (206 U. S., 1). It is a familiar doctrine. Much of our legislation in regard to common carriers rests upon it. It is a proper doctrine, as railways are necessarily monopolistic in character. They occupy the public highways, and if they do not discharge their duties to the public they obstruct traffic. As such it is necessary to make reasonable provisions for maintaining and increasing their facilities as traffic may require. To enforce this obligation Congress must have the power to prevent railway corporations from squandering their resources and impairing their credit.

To the extent that railway companies sell their stock or bonds below their value they deprive themselves of funds that could be used for maintaining and improving the service, and to that extent needlessly encumber their properties and deprive themselves of credit. It is self-evident that an overcapitalized corporation can not pay interest and dividends necessary to sus-tain its credit and at the same time make proper provisions for maintaining the service without charging excessive rates. While capitalization thus affects rates I am not willing to concede that rates can properly be based upon capitalization, and I think it is unfortunate to contend that the power to fix rates argues a right to regulate the issue of stock and bonds. The National Government is not only authorized to fix rates and charges, but its duty is just as imperative to see to it that the public highways are kept open for traffic and in a condition for service. It may be suggested that this is a good reason for controlling the issue of bonds, but not for the issue of stock. It is said that stock simply represents a share of the property of the corporation, and that it is immaterial whether a person has one or two certificates for the same share. Upon reflection this fallacy is easily exploded. To illustrate, take a corporation that has a hundred million dollars in stock that is worth 100 per cent, or a hundred million dollars. If a hundred million more shares of stock are issued, they could ordinarily be sold for the same as the old shares, or $100,000,000, but if sold at 50 per cent there would be a loss to the corporation of $50,000,000, a loss that might greatly impair its usefulness. The sale of stock is almost as valuable to a solvent corporation as a means for raising money as the issue of bonds. For many purposes stock may be considered an encumbrance. It seems perfectly apparent to me that Congress must have power to prohibit a corporation from doing anything that will so directly tend to impair its efficiency and value as a common carrier.

In addition to the foregoing consideration, I would urge as a further reason that Congress has this power under the well-known doctrine that all matters that affect interstate commerce, not local but national in character, may be governed by national laws.

Nearly all railways were at first mere local roads, beginning and ending in the same State, and were then only incidentally engaged in interstate commerce. They have outgrown that condition and have become national highways and national post roads, chiefly engaged in interstate commerce. State commerce in many States and upon many roads is incidental and almost negligible in quantity. These corporations have long since outgrown State lines. Their traffic extends from sea to sea and reaches even beyond that to distant continents. Take as an illustration the Great Northern, incorporated under the laws of my State. Its lines of rail cross five States and extend into a number of others. The prosperity of these States depends in a large measure upon the wise management of this road.

If Minnesota unwisely controls it, that State is not alone affected, but every State that the road serves. If Minnesota permits this corporation to waste its resources so that it can not perform its duties to the public, it may be more of an injury to other States than to Minnesota. If Minnesota has the power to control the management of this corporation in matters that affect service to the public, it follows that it may by its laws directly affect industries in other States and materially lessen or enhance their prosperity; in other words, legislate for other States. Shall these States for all time to come be compelled to depend upon the Legislature of the State of Minnesota for laws to control this corporation in matters of vital concern to their people?

If the National Government can not regulate the issue of stock and bonds of the Great Northern, it is evident that the State of Minnesota is the only power that can. None of the States can exclude it from doing an interstate business or regulate the issue of its stock and bonds. Should it be necessary to enlarge terminal facilities, better the tracks, or provide cars to do interstate business in the State of Washington, the Great Northern might apply to the State of Minnesota for leave to issue stock or bonds to secure the necessary funds therefor. Should the State deny this request, what remedy would there be? Practically none, unless the power which the United States has over interstate commerce is sufficient to afford the relief.

I have no doubt our Supreme Court would very promptly set aside such refusal as interfering with interstate commerce. The doctrine laid down in the St. Louis Southwestern Railway v. Arkansas (217 U. S., 136) not only makes that evident but is well-nigh conclusive.

The Supreme Court has repeatedly held that any matter that affects interstate commerce, which is not local but national in character, and that admits of and requires a uniform rule for its control, is exclusively for the will of Congress. It is said in Brown v. Houston (114 U. S., 622)—

That pilots, harbors, wharves, roads, bridges, tolls, and freights were for many years subject to State control.

State quarantine laws applied to interstate commerce until Congress passed a quarantine law. Safety appliances upon trains were matters of State regulation, but Congress superseded such regulations by the national safety-appliance act. The effect of overcapitalization of interstate carriers is not in any sense local, but national in character. It is much more so than most of the objects to which this rule has been applied. It is a matter that admits of and that public interest requires should be governed by some national law of uniform application that will protect the interests of all the people. It may be argued that Congress may restrict the capitalization of State corporations, but can not confer upon them the power to issue stock and bonds in violation of their charters. Is this distinction sound? I think not.

It may be said in support of the distinction that States possess only the power to exclude the foreign corporation or to prescribe conditions upon which it may do an intrastate business, but it does not follow that Congress is without other remedies. A State can not repeal or modify the laws of another State, but Congress can if such laws interfere with interstate commerce. Many State laws have been superseded by Federal laws. To give a concrete example: Could a corporation, in answer to a demand that it furnish the necessary facilities to reasonably care for interstate commerce, plead a provision in a State charter that forbade the issue of the necessary stock and bonds to obtain funds for that purpose? I doubt that anyone will contend that such a plea would be accepted. It seems to me that the plea would demonstrate the necessity for a Federal law and would show that Congress had power to pass such a law because of its necessity in protecting interstate commerce.

I can see no good reason why our Supreme Court should not hold that Congress may control a State corporation engaged in interstate commerce as fully as can the State that creates it. This is practically the doctrine laid down by Justice Brown in Hale v. Henkel (201 U. S., 43). He there said:

It is true that the corporation in this case was chartered under the laws of New Jersey and that it received its franchise from the legislature of that State, but such franchises, so far as they involve questions of interstate commerce, must also be exercised in subordination to the power of Congress to regulate commerce. Being subject to this dual sovereignty, the General Government possesses the same right to see that its own laws are respected as the State would have with respect to the special franchises vested in it by the laws of the State. The powers of the General Government in this particular are the same as if the corporations had been created by an act of Congress.

Mr. STEVENS of Minnesota. Mr. Chairman, I now yield to the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. STEENERSON].

[Mr. STEENERSON addressed the committee. See Appendix.]

Mr. STEVENS of Minnesota. Mr. Chairman, I now yield to the gentleman from Nebraska [Mr. BARTON].

[Mr. BARTON addressed the committee. See Appendix.]

Mr. STEVENS of Minnesota. Mr. Chairman, I now yield to the gentleman from Washington [Mr. BRYAN] for three minutes.

Mr. BRYAN. Mr. Chairman, I do not want to let a debate of this kind close without making what I consider the real vital argument, advancing the real vital proposition in connection with this whole situation. The Congress of the United States and the public men of the country have been handling the railroad problem with a great deal of energy since the creation of the Interstate Commerce Commission, and to-day we hear about Federal control, Federal organization, Federal license, Federal incorporation, and we are advancing step by step to a situation which simply demands the Government ownership of railroads. There is every reason in the world why the United States Government should take over these lines and own and operate and manage them. The railroads collect every year a toll from the people of the United States in excess of $3,000,000,000, over three times as much as it costs to manage this entire Government. The railroads have a capitalization on paper of over $20,000,000,000, in capital and bonds. Every obligation that exists against the railroads is a debt of the people on which toll will be collected by the railroads. Every bond they issue is a Government bond. The only difference is that they pocket the money and the people pay the debt, but in the case of sure-enough Government bonds the people get the money as well as pay the debt. There is no reason in the world why that kind of power and authority ought to be in the hands of any private institution or set of men. We are taking their power away every day, and we get a great chunk through this bill—that is why I favor it.

I just want to suggest three new pointers toward Government ownership of railroads, and I will amplify these suggestions in the RECORD later. In the first place, rates—the present controversy before the Interstate Commerce Commission to raise the freight rates in this country. That might be called a mental argument, appealing to the minds of the people. Then we have Mellen; that suggests a moral argument which involves corruption and the morality of the situation. Then we have the Panama Canal and Alaska—a physical argument, the real application of the proposition.

The Panama Canal, with the Panama Railroad and the steamship lines operated by the United States Government, was too big to be handled by any private corporation, and the Alaskan railroad was a proposition so involved that it could not be handled by individuals. So we have an argument here from every standpoint for Government ownership of railroads, and I am for this bill because it reaches out and closes just so much more of the gap that exists between private ownership and Government ownership. Brains and common sense demand Government ownership. Good morals and the Ten Commandments demand it, and it works out right in practice.

Mr. GARNER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BRYAN. Certainly.

Mr. GARNER. Is the gentleman speaking for the Progressive Party?

Mr. BRYAN. I am not speaking for any party. I am speaking my own beliefs, but I believe the Progressive Party will have Government ownership of railroads in its platform before long, because I believe the people of this country stand for Government ownership of the railroads, and that they are going to find expression of their sentiment in the Progressive platform more quickly than in the platform of either of the old parties.

Mr. GARNER. Does the gentleman come to that conclusion from talking with his colleagues and associates in the Progressive Party on this floor?

Mr. BRYAN. There are quite a number of my colleagues who are Progressives who believe in Government ownership of railroads.

Mr. GARNER. Does the leader, the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. MURDOCK]?

Mr. BRYAN. The gentleman from Kansas is entirely able to represent himself on the floor, and I am not authorized to speak his views.

Mr. GARNER. Then I will ask the gentleman if the real leader of the Progressive Party, Col. Roosevelt, is in favor of Government ownership?

Mr. BRYAN. I have never heard Col. Roosevelt express himself on the Government ownership of railroads, and I have never read anything from him on that subject, except that he said that if regulation failed we necessarily would go to Government ownership of railroads; and he did not go through all sorts of fits and spells as though he was scared to death at the prospect, either.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Washington has expired.

Mr. STEVENS of Minnesota. I yield the gentleman one minute more.

Mr. BRYAN. The man who was the head of the gentleman's party over here at Baltimore only a few years ago declared, when he came back from Germany and his trip around the world, that he was for Government ownership of railroads, and he has not changed his mind, either. And so William Jennings Bryan, who is supposed to be the leader of the party of the gentleman from Texas, and who was the leader at Baltimore, and I suppose he is the leader of your party to-day, as far as that is concerned, is for Government ownership of railroads, and I think the Democratic Party is subject to censure for not following his leadership and that the gentleman himself is subject to mild censure for lagging behind his party leadership.

Mr. FESS. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BRYAN. Yes.

Mr. FESS. Does the gentleman regard this legislation as a step toward it?

Mr. BRYAN. I believe it does fill up the gap a little. I believe we are taking a more complete hold on the railroads by this statute than has ever been done before, and the tighter the hold the better I like it. We will get them, bag and baggage, a little later.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has again expired.

Mr. STEVENS of Minnesota. We have no further speakers.

Mr. ADAMSON. Mr. Chairman, I am sure the gentleman from Washington is trying to beat this bill. [Laughter.] The gentleman says he is going to vote for it; but if his opinions and reasons are any account, his opposition to the bill outbalances his vote. Of course if we can not get his vote for a right reason, we will accept his vote for a wrong reason; but if we believed this legislation was going to result in Government ownership, I have no doubt there would be almost a unanimous vote to defeat the bill and consign it to the everlasting demnition bow wows.

Mr. BRYAN. That is the advantage of the situation; that it is such a good opportunity to put it over on the old-time statesmen of the country that we are going to do it.

Mr. ADAMSON. It looks like the gentleman is putting it over now. That appears to be their idea of doing things, "to put it over"; and judging from the gentleman's argument, he is now operating according to the way that gang usually proceeds. They seize upon whatever they think will strike a popular breeze and put in their platform whatever they think the people will stand for. That is the way I understand their principles. Mr. Chairman, I now take pleasure in yielding to the able gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. BARKLEY], who will close the general debate in a most able and eloquent address.

Mr. BARKLEY. Mr. Chairman, as a member of the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce, which framed this measure, I desire to discuss it briefly and call attention to some of the provisions of the bill and the reasons for their enactment. In doing so I am not unmindful of the temptation to wander far afield in discussions of railroads and their relations to the public; but I hope that this temptation may be somewhat restrained in view of the limited time allowed for debate, and the necessity for the speedy enactment of the bills now under consideration for strengthening the antitrust laws.

However, in considering a measure giving increased powers to the Interstate Commerce Commission for the regulation and control of the operations of the railroads of the country, we can not afford to lose sight of the public scope and character of their operations, nor the relationship existing between the common carriers and the public at large.

The history of railroad development in this country reads like a romance. It is perhaps true that in no other enterprise has there been invested so much of capital, so much of energy, so much of skill, so much of labor and of the inventive genius of man as in the establishment and improvement of the facilities of transportation throughout the United States. During the last half century we have seen vast stretches of wilderness transformed into fertile areas in which cities have grown, the whir and hum of the wheels of industry have been heard, and millions of people have found homes and employment. We have seen the pilot of the railroad engine push its nose into the density of the forest, bridging the streams and tunneling the mountains, until this whole Nation is spiked down with a network of railroads, bringing the people of every section into closer communication. This marvelous development did not take place without public approval or invitation. So anxious has this Government appeared in the past concerning railroad development, and the consequent development of mine, field, and forest, that it has granted to railroads and prospective railroads large areas of public lands as an inducement to them to extend their operations into the undeveloped regions of the country. Not only that, but in former days States and counties were authorized by law to issue bonds payable from the public treasury in aid of railroads which were contemplating the extension of their lines through such States and counties as did not possess railroad facilities. So flagrant and so far-reaching did this system become that many of the States were compelled to enact statutory and constitutional barriers against the continuance of this system.

In a new country seeking new enterprises and the improvement of older ones, it is but natural for speculation to run riot and cloud the judgment not only of individuals, but of the public as well. This was peculiarly true of railroad development. After the grants of public lands and other bounties had been received by the railroads, they drifted, or perhaps I might better say they voluntarily entered, upon a period of exploitation seldom experienced in this or any other country. After obtaining the favors of the public, which enabled them to become established, they became forgetful of the ladder upon which they had mounted, and "Scorned the low degrees by which they ascended," and proceeded arbitrarily to dictate not only the character of the service which they rendered to the public, but the rates which they would charge therefor. In many instances the service to the public was painfully inadequate, and the rates charged therefor exorbitantly high. This condition of affairs grew from bad to worse until Congress created the Interstate Commerce Commission and clothed it with authority to regulate and supervise not only the character of the service rendered to the public but the compensation they might receive therefor. This sort of public supervision and regulation was justified not only by reason of the conditions which prevailed as to service and rate but by reason also of the nature and scope of the corporations themselves.

Railroads and other common carriers are recognized both in fact and in law as public servants. They are more peculiarly clothed with the attributes of public servants than other and ordinary corporations, because, in theory at least, they were created and are permitted to exist, not primarily that their owners may become rich, but that the public may the better and more conveniently be served in the things that are necessary in these modern days than they could without their creation. Railroads and other common carriers are instruments of commerce, and Congress is by the Constitution given exclusive power to regulate commerce between the States and with foreign nations, which carries with it also the power to regulate the instruments of commerce.

The powers of the Interstate Commerce Commission over these interstate railroads has been gradually increased by act of Congress until they now have the authority to regulate the rates of charges of freight carried in interstate commerce, prescribe uniform systems of accounting among the railroads, prevent discrimination in rates, compel the installation of safety appliances designed to prevent the loss of life, as well as many other general and specific powers which need not be enumerated; and Congress has by recent enactment authorized the commission to bring about a physical valuation of all the railroad property in the United States for the purpose of using that information in connection with the fixing of rates and charges for the service rendered to the public. The commission, by the wise, patriotic, and beneficial manner in which it has constantly exercised the powers granted to it, has abundantly justified its creation and existence. Many of the evil practices of railroads have been eliminated. Many of the unfair methods of discrimination have been eradicated. Exorbitant rates have been lowered. The railroad companies have been thus compelled to abandon a policy which in the old days amounted almost to extortion, robbery, and exploitation, and adopt methods which recognize the rights of the public and are somewhat in keeping with the objects of their creation in the first instance.

However, there is yet prevalent one evil practice among the railroads which the Interstate Commerce Commission has not been able to reach for lack of authority, nor has any other agency of the Government been able to reach or prohibit it for the same reasons. That is the evil of overcapitalization, wildcat speculation, and other forms of money madness, which not only injure innocent stockholders and investors, but dissipate the power of the railroad or other carrier to perform its duty to the public.

That is the evil we are seeking to cure by the measure now under consideration. And this is a legitimate and proper exercise of the constitutional powers of Congress as well as of the commission which Congress has created as its agent to carry into effect the provisions of the law which it enacts. Not only so, but if Congress has the exclusive authority to regulate commerce as well as the agencies of commerce, it likewise has the power to regulate those matters which affect interstate commerce or the ability of interstate carriers to perform their full duties as agencies of commerce between the States and with foreign nations. No railroad company has a moral or legal right so to dissipate its assets or so manipulate its stocks or bonds, or its power to obtain credit, as to endanger its ability to measure up fully to the requirements of the public in its capacity as a public carrier. Whenever a railroad system is wrecked, the injury is not confined to the stockholders alone, but the public is also injured because of the lessening of the ability of the railroad to perform its duty to the public.

The remedy proposed in this measure is also made necessary and desirable because of the great diversity of laws of the communities and States through which an interstate railroad may run, many of them conflicting and incapable of harmonious observance.

Mr. GARNER. Will the gentleman yield there?

Mr. BARKLEY. Yes; I will yield.

Mr. GARNER. If I understand the purport of this bill as defined by the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. STEVENS], it provides that the Interstate Commerce Commission shall regulate the issuance of stocks and bonds of railroads that do an interstate business. Even if their mileage is entirely within a State, if they do an interstate business, then the question of issuing stocks and bonds is with the Interstate Commerce Commission.

Mr. BARKLEY. In so far as its traffic may be interstate traffic. If its traffic was wholly intrastate then this bill would not cover it.

Mr. GARNER. Take a concrete case in Texas. The Missouri, Kansas & Texas Railway Co. of Texas is one corporation. The Missouri, Kansas & Texas Railway Co. of Kansas is another corporation, but the entire line is known as the Missouri, Kansas & Texas, and its traffic originates in St. Louis and ends at Galveston. The entire mileage of the Missouri, Kansas & Texas Railway Co. of Texas is in the State of Texas, but it connects with the Missouri, Kansas & Texas of Kansas which runs to St. Louis. Now, the Interstate Commerce Commission will control the issuance of stocks and bonds, so far as the Missouri, Kansas & Texas of Texas is concerned, under this bill, will it not?

Mr. BARKLEY. Yes; in so far as the issue of such stocks and bonds may have to do with its character as an interstate carrier.

Mr. GARNER. It certainly would if it issued stocks and bonds——

Mr. BARKLEY. If it issued stocks and bonds for the purpose of assisting and furthering its ability to carry interstate commerce, for the purpose of better equipping its tracks for interstate commerce, then the Interstate Commerce Commission would step in and take authority.

Mr. GARNER. Yes; and that to the exclusion of the authority of the Railroad Commission of Texas, whatever that may be.

Mr. BARKLEY. Yes; the Texas commission has no control over interstate commerce.

Mr. GARNER. In other words, to make it perfectly plain, if the Railroad Commission of Texas that now has supervision of the issue of stocks and bonds of the Missouri, Kansas & Texas Railway of Texas should decline to permit them to issue certain stocks and bonds requested by that road, and they should then come to the Interstate Commerce Commission here and ask for permission to issue those stocks and bonds, and that permission was granted, the stocks and bonds could be issued under this law.

Mr. BARKLEY. Oh, yes; if it affected interstate commerce, the Interstate Commerce Commission would have authority to regulate it.

Mr. GARNER. Would the gentleman as a member of that committee object to an amendment to this bill that would say——

Mr. BARKLEY. I want to answer the gentleman a little more fully there.

Mr. GARNER. Would there be any objection to an amendment to this bill that would provide that wherever a railroad company has its entire mileage within a State, then the permission of the State railroad commission should be had before that railroad company could issue stocks and bonds under the interstate-commerce law?

Mr. BARKLEY. Let us see. For instance, are the two Missouri, Kansas & Texas Railway Cos. both under the same general management?

Mr. GARNER. Yes; they have the same stockholders.

Mr. BARKLEY. They are practically the same.

Mr. GARNER. Identically the same thing.

Mr. BARKLEY. For all practical purposes it is one railroad company?

Mr. GARNER. One railroad company.

Mr. BARKLEY. If the Missouri, Kansas & Texas Railway Co. of Texas should make application for permission to issue a certain amount of stocks and bonds, notwithstanding the fact that the Texas commission may have denied them the right to do it, the Interstate Commerce Commission would, of course, notify them of the application, and if it could be shown that this particular issue of stocks and bonds had no connection with interstate commerce, but was wholly within the State of Texas, the Interstate Commerce Commission would not have the authority under the bill to permit them to issue the securities. If they were to be used wholly within the State of Texas and had only to do with commerce that was wholly within the State of Texas and did not affect its character as an interstate carrier, the Interstate Commerce Commission would not have any authority to act. And if after notification to the railroad commission of Texas and they had come here and were able to show to the Interstate Commerce Commission that this issue of bonds was for intrastate purposes, I do not think the Interstate Commerce Commission would grant the power.

Mr. GARNER. After all, the bill leaves it entirely to their discretion?

Mr. BARKLEY. It leaves it to them to determine.

Mr. GARNER. As a member of the committee, would the gentleman object to an amendment to the bill that would make it specific and direct without equivocation, that where the entire mileage of the road is in the State that the matter of the issue of stocks and bonds should be left to the State commission?

Mr. BARKLEY. No; I would not commit myself to an amendment of that kind at this time, because the separate incorporation of blocks of railroad may have come about by design, and for all practical purposes it may be that the Texas Railway Co. did it for that purpose. The Missouri, Kansas & Texas Railway of Texas is just a part of the Missouri, Kansas & Texas system, which crosses several States.

Mr. GARNER. It was one continuous company until the State of Texas adopted a constitutional amendment in which they said that no railroad could run through that State without becoming a separate and distinct Texas corporation. Therefore there is not a single line of railroad in the State of Texas but that is a corporation with no outside influence.

Mr. BARKLEY. The fact that they have incorporated in Texas is a legal technicality to get rid of the provision of the Constitution.

Mr. GARNER. It is; and I want the State of Texas to reserve the right for our commission, elected by the people, to determine how much bonded indebtedness can be issued on the line that is wholly in Texas.

Mr. BARKLEY. If it were shown that the issue of bonds for the Texas corporation was to be used wholly in Texas on the lines owned by the Texas corporation, the Interstate Commerce Commission would not give authority, but it would be wholly for the State of Texas.

Every railroad that runs through different States is practically a home corporation to the extent that it has to comply with the laws of each State before it can enter and before business of any kind can be done, and yet that does not deprive it of an interstate character. That is amply provided for in the bill by the provision that no interstate corporation shall be permitted to issue bonds before the Interstate Commerce Commission shall give them authority to do it. They are required to notify the railroad commission of every State through which the line runs, and if there is no commission they are required to notify the governor and the attorney general, so that the State officers may have an opportunity to appear and present such facts as would protect the interests of the State.

Mr. ADAMSON. Mr. Chairman, touching the question asked by the gentleman from Texas [Mr. GARNER], the gentleman from Minnesota stated his views of the case and was satisfied with them. Our view as to the effect of this provision is that if the railroad in the State of Texas is authorized by the law of Texas and the commission of Texas to issue stocks and bonds, it could not be done until this Federal commission determines whether it will exercise the veto power or not. If the States of Texas refused to issue the bonds, that ends it, it could not be brought before the Interstate Commerce Commission under this bill.

Mr. BARKLEY. It could not be; but if it is an interstate corporation doing an interstate business under the bill they would have a right to make application. You could not deny them the right to make the application.

Mr. ADAMSON. Yes; they are not authorized to make application except for ratification of the issue authorized by the State authorities. This bill will not authorize the Interstate Commerce Commission to interfere until appealed to after action by State authority, and even then when the authority to issue is refused by the State authority.

Mr. BARKLEY. I am frank to say that I do not so construe the bill.

Mr. GARNER. In other words, taking the concrete case of the Missouri, Kansas & Texas Railway, if the officials of the Missouri, Kansas & Texas Railway, beginning at St. Louis and terminating at Galveston, should apply for a bond issue covering the entire line, and the Interstate Commerce Commission should grant them authority to issue it, they could issue bonds covering that portion of it in Texas.

Mr. BARKLEY. Is the gentleman referring to the bill originally introduced or to the substitute proposed?

Mr. ADAMSON. They are both exactly alike in substance.

Mr. BARKLEY. Mr. Chairman, I call the gentleman's attention to the fact that the language of this bill provides that, regardless of the local authority creating the corporation, the Interstate Commerce Commission shall have power over the issue of these bonds if it is an interstate transaction.

So, therefore, taking into consideration not only the welfare of the people who depend upon the railroads for transportation, but the stockholders themselves, who have frequently very little voice in the real management of the railroad company, this committee has brought into this House and asks it to pass this bill giving to the Interstate Commerce Commission the power to pass upon the proposed issue of stocks, bonds, or other evidences of indebtedness of railroad corporations, and prohibiting their issue for any purpose except for the legitimate purposes of enabling the railroad company to perform its duty to the public as a common carrier. I desire to read this exact provision at this point, so that there may be no misunderstanding of its meaning:

That it shall be unlawful for any common carrier subject to the act to regulate commerce, as amended, to issue any capital stock or any bond or other evidence of indebtedness or to assume any obligation as lessor, guarantor, or surety for the securities of any other person, natural or artificial, even though permitted by the authority creating the carrier corporation, except for some purpose within its corporate powers necessary to the proper performance of its service for the public and not tending to impair the financial ability of the carrier to discharge its duty to the public. Extensions and improvements of its railroads and terminals used in connection therewith, increasing and improving its equipment, refunding and retiring existing bonds, and similar and kindred purposes shall be held to be necessary purposes in the meaning of this paragraph—

And so forth. I will not read the whole paragraph at this time.

You will observe from this language that no railroad company or common carrier can issue any stock, certificate of stock, bond, or any other evidence of indebtedness, nor assume or become guarantor for any such obligation or indebtedness, except for the purpose of carrying out the legitimate objects of its existence as a common carrier. No common carrier under this provision can issue bonds or certificates of stock or borrow money and become liable therefor for the purpose of speculating in independent enterprises having no real or legitimate connection with the business of the railroad.

The necessity for such a provision is obvious. Suppose a railroad company wanted to issue bonds to the extent of $1,000,000 or $10,000,000 for the purpose of engaging in some hazardous speculative enterprise not connected with its own business of acting as a common carrier of freight and passengers for the people. Suppose that enterprise is a failure, involving the total loss of the amount invested. In the meantime the property of the railroad company has become liable for the amount of the indebtedness, and the carrier's power and ability to perform its functions as a public servant have been crippled in proportion to the extent of the loss. In many such cases the inevitable result has been the appointment of a receiver or other costly and tedious methods of rehabilitating the carrier in its own ability and in the confidence of the people. Who suffers under such conditions? The railroad company? Yes. The stockholders, many of whom may have invested all the little surplus they possessed in a few shares of stock and who had no voice in determining the policy of the company, frequently lose the value of their investment, and frequently, also, the financial pirates and manipulators of the artificial rise and fall of stocks and bonds have reaped a rich harvest at the cost of the legitimate investor. But whatever the result of such transactions, the public has been made to suffer, either by reason of crippled and insufficient service from the railroads or by the appalling loss of life due to faulty or defective equipment or by increases in freight charges based upon such fictitious increases in capitalization. The object, therefore, of this measure is to protect the public from the evils of railroad overcapitalization, from unlawful and unprofitable speculation, from stockjobbing and aviating on the part of these great public-service corporations in the altitudes of high finance to the injury and detriment of the public interests.

The bill further provides that—

It shall likewise be unlawful to issue any such stock or bonds for purposes hereinbefore mentioned or for any other purpose connected with or relating to that part of the business of such carrier governed by the act to regulate commerce as amended, unless and until upon application and after investigation in the premises by the Interstate Commerce Commission of the purposes and uses of the issue and the proceeds thereof, such issue is approved by said commission as necessary and appropriate for the purpose stated.

In other words, the meaning of these provisions simply is that no common carrier can issue any stocks, bonds, or other evidences of indebtedness except for legitimate purposes, and before it can issue them for that purpose it must make application before the Interstate Commerce Commission for its consent and lay all the facts connected with the proposed issue, as well as the facts concerning the financial condition, the purposes for which issued, and the uses which are to be made of the proceeds and receive the consent and approval of the commission before such issue may be made. And in exercising this power the commission is required to ascertain whether the proposed issue is for a purpose permitted under the law, for they could not authorize a carrier to involve itself in an indebtedness which the laws would not permit it to incur.

The commission may also require the carrier to submit periodical and special reports showing its income account, a balanced statement of its receipts and expenditures on capital account, and of its surplus of income accruing during the period covered by the report as well as all other financial transactions taking place during the period, with whom had, whether in cash, in securities, or other valuable considerations. And the commission may require the carrier to compile for the information of its shareholders such facts regarding its financial transactions as may be necessary for their protection and the protection of the public.

Under the provisions of this measure, when any common carrier subject to the act to regulate commerce shall apply to the commission for its permission to issue stock or bonds or evidences of debt as provided in the bill, it is made the duty of the carrier to file with the commission a certificate of notification, showing the following facts: The total amount authorized; the number and amount thereof outstanding prior thereto; the amount theretofore retired; the amount then undisposed of, and whether same is held in the Treasury as a free asset or is pledged, and the terms and conditions of the pledge; the number and amount to be issued, and whether sold or pledged or held as a free asset, and if sold whether any part of the consideration is to be received in property other than money; the par value of the stock; the preferences or privilege granted to the holders of any of such shares of stock; and the purposes or uses, in detail, to which the proceeds of the issue are to be devoted. In short, the application shall set forth in detail every fact connected with the transaction showing the condition of the company, the necessity for the issue, and the uses to which the proceeds are to be put, and the Interstate Commerce Commission is authorized to make public the information which it thus obtains as in its discretion it may deem proper.

It is believed that the publicity thus made possible under this bill concerning the financial transactions of these great public-service corporations, affecting as they do the public interests with such vital force, will go far to bring about a more wholesome condition that will in the end reflect itself in better service to the people, better equipment, better safeguards in behalf of the employees, and a more solid foundation upon which to construct these great arteries of commerce and maintain them in the future. Indeed, it has been contended by very earnest and very intelligent and patriotic men that publicity itself concerning these financial connections and operations would be sufficient to eradicate the evils against which we are seeking to legislate. But it has been deemed wise and proper to go further and provide for supervision and control, or, rather, the exercise of the veto power of the Government over the issue of such stocks and bonds and securities as vitally affect the ability of the common carriers to meet their obligations not alone to those who hold mortgages or debts against them but to the public, in whose interest they were created.

We recognize that railroad corporations, like other great business enterprises, are occasionally required to borrow large sums of money for the improvement of their equipment, for the extension of their lines, for the building of depots, terminals, and other necessary facilities for carrying on their business. And it is not the desire or the intention of Congress to abridge their right or their power to obtain credit or the loan of money in large or small quantities for such purposes. But the history of recent events in this country, revealing the exploitation and the wrecking of great railway systems through frenzied speculation in high finance, resulting in great loss to innocent stockholders, in loss of employment by hundreds of employees, and the impairment of the service to the public, has made it necessary for Congress to take notice of these tendencies and seek, if possible, to remedy them by appropriate legislation.

We believe the bill which we present to this Congress affords the remedy which is sought. It is approved by the Interstate Commerce Commission and by the business world in general and by the people. It is approved by this Democratic administration, which is now doing so much to aid business of every character to settle down upon solid rocks of financial strength sanctioned by law. It is approved by the Democratic platform, which declares against the overcapitalization of these public-service corporations, and in the end, if not already, it will be approved by the business conscience of the Nation and will be recognized as not only a lawful exercise of governmental authority, but a wise and proper exercise of such authority in behalf of the owners of the railroads, those who are employed by the railroads, and those who are served by the railroads in the transportation of the commerce of this Nation to and from its remotest boundaries. [Applause.]

I desire, in conclusion, to call attention briefly to the provision against the interlocking of directors in railroads engaged in interstate commerce. One of the great evils of this generation, not only in the managing of railroads but other large corporations as well, has been the fact that the same men have been and are officers and directors in many corporations which ought to be competing companies, but which, by reason of the duplication of directors and officers, are bound together by unnatural and unholy ties. We seek to change that condition in this bill with reference to railroads in an effort to unloosen the cords that join in unnatural wedlock concerns which ought to be and by nature and circumstances are competitors. We believe that the public will reap the benefit of this change by a clearing of the business atmosphere. And when these provisions are written into the law, we hope those who are affected by them will accept them in the spirit of patriotism and true devotion to the public cause, to the end that honest business and honest prosperity may walk hand in hand. [Applause.]

Mr. ADAMSON. The provision in the bill is that although the local authorities may authorize an issue it shall not be done until the Interstate Commerce Commission has approved it. That commission may veto it or approve it. This bill does not give them initial power in the matter, and their action does not depend on where the railroad is or how long it is nor in what county or State it is, but whether it is engaged in interstate commerce.

I yield to the gentleman from New York [Mr. CANTOR].

[Mr. CANTOR addressed the committee. See Appendix.]

Mr. ADAMSON. Mr. Chairman, I now yield to the gentleman from New York [Mr. TALCOTT].

Mr. TALCOTT of New York. Mr. Chairman, the supervision of the issue of stocks and bonds of railroads by a governmental body is not a new procedure. Many of the States now have statutes imposing this duty upon some State board or commission. The pending bill charges the Interstate Commerce Commission with such a duty in connection with railroads engaged in interstate commerce. It would undoubtedly have been of great public benefit if this had been done when the act to regulate commerce was enacted. But it is probable at that time, even if such legislation had been proposed, that it would not have been seriously considered. The States for a long period watched with apprehension every extension of the powers of the General Government, fearing possibly an interference with powers reserved by the Constitution to the States. There was deep opposition often to any extension of the application of the powers delegated to the General Government and a certain jealousy manifested sometimes of the exercise of those powers. This antagonism, which was often an obstacle and hindrance, happily has in great part passed away. And it seems that only by the exercise in full measure, when required, of the powers granted the Federal Government by the Constitution can the way be opened to national growth and prosperity.

But the conviction that the legislation of the States in relation to the issue of securities by railroad companies was of necessity incomplete and unsatisfactory became so widespread that in 1910 Congress provided for the appointment of a commission to examine the matter and to report concerning it. The commission was composed of men who had gained distinction in the study and discussion of the railway problems of this country. Hearings were held by the commission at New York and Chicago, as well as at Washington, and the report was submitted to the President November 1, 1911. It dwelt emphatically upon the importance of accurate knowledge of the facts concerning the issue of securities by railroad companies engaged in interstate commerce and the expenditure of their proceeds as the one thing upon which the Federal Government could effectively insist and the fundamental thing which must serve as a basis for additional regulation in the future. With the report was a supplementary statement containing suggestions relating to legislation to be enacted as amendments to the act to regulate commerce, so that proper publicity should be secured. The suggestions of the commission are embodied in the pending bill with other provisions relating to publicity, which render the legislation more effective. In this way a complete procedure is established for carrying out the recommendations of the commission. Although these recommendations were limited to methods by which publicity could best be secured, the report plainly discloses that the commission carefully considered the subject of the direct supervision by the Federal Government of the issue of stocks and bonds by railroad corporations; but while it found that enforced publicity was immediately needed, it reached the conclusion that enforced uniformity by substituting exclusive Federal control for the jurisdiction of the several States was not then attainable. Not only was there apprehension expressed that constitutional difficulties might stand in the way of accomplishing the latter object, but the commission was of opinion that, as a mere matter of expediency, the time was not ripe for any such immediate or forcible transfer of jurisdiction. Since the report of the commission was submitted to the President many events have occurred which have a direct bearing upon this question.

The decision of the Supreme Court in the Minnesota rate case has rendered more clear and definite the power of Congress over commerce, removing altogether many of the objections discussed by the commission to the direct control of the issue of stocks and bonds by the Federal Government. Many investigations have been instituted. The investigation of the United States Steel Corporation and the money power by committees of this House, the investigations of the Frisco's financial dealings and the involved affairs of the New York, New Haven & Hartford by the Interstate Commerce Commission have made public many facts in relation to railroad management which render direct control of the issue of railroad securities seem imperative. The evasions of law by which the affairs of railroad companies are brought under the complete control of persons outside their responsible management, the holding companies, the boards of directors that either do not direct or direct unlawfully, the presidents of companies who leave the real authority to others, and the sale of securities by a company when insolvent, all disclose the need of adequate regulation. In many cases there seems to have been a financial machine not unlike a political one, irresponsible but vested with all real power, and becoming at length an arbitrary system of administration. Such a system is not new. At the trial of Warren Hastings, Burke, attacking such a system in the Government of India, said:

> An arbitrary system indeed must always be a corrupt system. There never was a man who thought he had no law but his own will who did not soon find that he had no end but his own profit. Corruption and arbitrary power are of natural unequivocal generation necessarily producing one another.

Now, many railroad securities have been issued under the influence of an arbitrary system of control; they have been issued often without adequate consideration and they have been issued, too, for objects foreign to the proper purposes of the corporation. The power to supervise the issue of stocks and bonds of railroads will give the Interstate Commerce Commission the power to control their issue for a sufficient consideration and for lawful and reasonable purposes. It will not be a guaranty of the securities by the Government, but it will be proof that the securities are properly issued. It will be a restraining influence.

Recent revelations of railroad management have startled the country and safeguards will be necessary to restore the confidence which has been lost. The shock caused by these revelations is the chief cause of the present financial condition. It is not the loss of money alone, it is the distrust awakened in the service of those to whom great trusts are committed. Plain people suspect that Mr. Mellen was chosen president of the New Haven, not because of his strength but because of his weakness; not because of his ability to direct and administer but because of his willingness to take orders. This distrust among those seeking investments can only be removed by the knowledge that the reckless management of great railroads is at an end, that their resources can not be wasted nor their money lavishly and foolishly expended. It is not that wrongdoers alone feel the effects of this distrust, it has extended its blighting influence over many systems of transportation honestly administered and has unjustly created a prejudice where wholly undeserved. Such a condition of public distrust is serious, and especially so at a time such as this, when large sums are needed for railroad improvement. The necessity of improvement in equipment, ways, and terminals is admitted by everyone who has made only a casual examination of the operation of the railroads. The average capitalization of railroads per mile in this country is only $60.000; in England, $265.000; in France, $137.000; in Germany, $109.000; in Belgium, $177.000. Those countries have what we need and what in the next few years increased density of population and increased traffic will render indispensable here. If improvements are not made in a reasonable time, there will be an interference with traffic that will affect injuriously industrial production as well as agriculture. When the means of distribution become clogged and unreliable, production is embarrassed, for delay in reaching the market means a total loss in some cases and a serious loss in all. The problem is pressing for solution. It is not to be solved by hostility to railroads, by ill-judged, intemperate, and hasty legislation, but by the establishment of proper methods, by forcing officials to meet the full responsibility of the positions they hold, and by the encouragement of stockholders to take active participation in the affairs of the corporations of which they are members.

The remedy for corruption in government has not been an increase of power in those administering it, but an increase of civic responsibility by the direct primary, and the remedy for corruption in railroads is not Government ownership, but a quickened sense of responsibility in officials, directors, and stockholders. However successful Government ownership may have proven in other countries, I, for one, believe that conditions prevail in this country which render it impracticable. From their very nature railroads are monopolies and they must receive adequate regulation in order that private ownership may be responsible, efficient, and honest. The provisions of the pending bill, if enacted, will not produce all the results claimed by some who have advocated them, but they will exert a strong influence for better methods and more careful administration. By these provisions it is made unlawful for any common carrier subject to the act to regulate commerce to issue any capital stock or any bond or other evidence of indebtedness or to assume any obligation as lessor, guarantor, or surety for the securities of any other person, natural or artificial, except for some purpose within its corporate powers necessary to the proper performance of its service for the public, and not tending to impair the financial ability of the carrier to discharge its duty to the public.

It is likewise made unlawful to issue any such stock or bonds for such purposes or for any other purpose relating to the business of such carrier governed by the act to regulate commerce, unless, upon application and after investigation by the Interstate Commerce Commission of the purposes and uses of the issue and proceeds thereof, such issue is approved by said commission as necessary and appropriate for the purpose stated. It is provided that nothing contained therein should be construed to imply a guarantee or obligation as to such issues on the part of the United States, and that the provisions referred to shall not apply to notes issued by such carrier, maturing not more than two years after their date, when they do not at any time aggregate more than 5 per cent of the total amount of the stocks and bonds issued and outstanding, and further, that upon application to the Interstate Commerce Commission for approval of a proposed issue of stock and bonds notice shall be given to the appropriate authority of each State through which the railroad passes or through which the carrier making the application operates any portion of its lines, and the State authority thus notified shall have the right to present to the commission such representations as are deemed just and proper for preserving and conserving the right and interest of their people and the States, respectively, as involved in the proceeding, and the right to be fully heard touching the same. Issues of stock or bonds contrary to these provisions may be enjoined at the suit of the United States, or of any director, officer, or stockholder of the carrier proposing to make the issue. Directors, officers, or stockholders of any such corporation are rendered subject to fine or imprisonment, or both, for assenting to or concurring in any issue of securities so forbidden.

It is the hope that the courts will find these provisions valid under the Constitution. The construction of a railroad, the equipment, ways, bridges, terminals, by which its operation is made possible, are the legitimate objects for which money is provided by the sale of stocks and bonds. They are the direct instruments of interstate commerce. It is true that the Minnesota rate case involved the question of rates only, but is it to be inferred that the relation of rates to commerce is more intimate than the very instruments by which that commerce is established and continued? State legislation has been productive of much benefit, but it lacks the scope necessary to provide the proper supervision of the issue of stocks and bonds by railroads in interstate commerce. In the report of the Railroad Securities Commission the following example is given of inadequate and harmful State regulation:

> When the Chicago, Milwaukee & St. Paul Railroad wished to build its Puget Sound extension it had to pass through several States whose laws forbade corporations chartered under laws of other States to build roads within their borders except as a connection or prolongation of a road actually built to the State line. In order to conform to these restrictions the St. Paul road would have had to build its line slowly, step by step, instead of doing work in several States at once and putting the road through as promptly as possible. To avoid this difficulty, it had to organize a separate company to build the road in each State which had such a law. This in itself was not a serious evil; it simply involved additional expense—to have separate corporations do things piecemeal which might have been done as a unit without such intermediaries. But it tended to render State control less effective, instead of more so. The system thus forced upon the St. Paul road would give every opportunity for deception to a road which might want to deceive.

In the recent investigation of the Frisco and New York, New Haven & Hartford systems the need of Federal supervision is plainly shown, if the financial integrity of railroads is to be maintained. In relation to the power of Congress it is interesting to turn to the opinion in the Minnesota rate case, in which the court, after reviewing the decisions upholding the power of the State to prescribe rates for commerce within the State, said:

> To suppose, however, from a review of these decisions, that the exercise of this acknowledged power of the State may be permitted to create an irreconcilable conflict with the authority of the Nation or that through an equipoise of powers an effective control of interstate commerce is rendered impossible is to overlook the dominant operation of the Constitution, which, creating a nation, equipped it with an authority, supreme and plenary, to control national commerce and to prevent that control, exercised in the wisdom of Congress, from being obstructed or destroyed by any opposing action. But, as we said at the outset, our system of government is a practical adjustment by which the national authority, as conferred by the Constitution, is maintained in its full scope without unnecessary loss of local efficiency.

As decided in Smith v. Ames (169 U. S.), securities issued by a railroad have a relation to the reasonableness of its rates because their market value is an important element in determining the value of the property. The issue of such securities is necessary to the construction of the railroad and to its continuance and maintenance. The supervision of the issue of these securities is necessary in order to give assurance that they are issued for legitimate purposes and that the money obtained has been rightly expended. For many years the commerce clause of the Constitution has been the basis of a large amount of important legislation. It is the result of new conditions, the growth and advancement of the country, the spirit of discovery and invention, and the ceaseless energy of the American people. On every side industries have sprung up and prospered, while the products of the farm have increased in a still greater proportion. These activities, of great variety and enormous extent, have made necessary the development of the great systems of transportation by which the distribution of all the products and all the merchandise of the country is affected. These are the means by which the commerce between the States becomes possible. It is not necessary to speak of the relation it bears to the people of this country. Its public functions are many and important, and the efficient management of each unit in this vast system is a matter of deep public concern. So this bill seeks not only to protect these companies from the effects of legislation in every State through which each line may pass but to give assurance to the people themselves that in contracting new obligations the safeguards are extended so that the interests of the stockholders and the public will be fully protected by careful oversight of the purposes for which the issue of such securities is authorized and by a proper scrutiny of the manner in which the proceeds are expended.

Mr. ADAMSON. Mr. Chairman, under the agreement made in the House to-day, the general debate ends when we adjourn to-day. We have exhausted our general debate; and with the understanding that the bill will be read under the five-minute rule when we next meet, I move that the committee do now rise.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, general debate is closed. The question is on the motion of the gentleman from Georgia that the committee do now rise.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the committee rose; and Mr. UNDERWOOD having taken the chair as Speaker pro tempore, Mr. HULL, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that committee had had under consideration the bill H. R. 16586 and other bills embraced in the special order, and had come to no resolution thereon.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

By unanimous consent, leave of absence was granted to Mr. SMITH of Minnesota, for two weeks, on account of important business.

ADJOURNMENT.

Mr. ADAMSON. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House do now adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; and accordingly (at 5 o'clock and 49 minutes p. m.) the House adjourned until to-morrow, Friday, June 5, 1914, at 11 o'clock a. m.

EXECUTIVE COMMUNICATIONS.

Under clause 2 of Rule XXIV, executive communications were taken from the Speaker's table and referred as follows:

1. A letter from the Acting Secretary of the Treasury, transmitting copies of separate communications of the Postmaster General submitting estimates of urgent deficiencies in the appropriations for the Postal Service, payable out of the postal revenues, for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1914 (H. Doc. No. 1007); to the Committee on Appropriations and ordered to be printed.

2. A letter from the Acting Secretary of the Treasury, transmitting copy of a communication of the Acting Secretary of the Smithsonian Institution submitting suggested provision for inclusion in the sundry civil appropriation bill for fiscal year 1915, authorizing the Secretary of the Interior to permit the Smithsonian Institution to procure for the national collections specimens of elk and other animals from the national parks under the jurisdiction of the Secretary of the Interior (H. Doc. No. 1008); to the Committee on Appropriations and ordered to be printed.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES ON PUBLIC BILLS AND RESOLUTIONS.

Under clause 2 of Rule XIII, bills and resolutions were severally reported from committees, delivered to the Clerk, and referred to the several calendars therein named, as follows:

Mr. O'HAIR, from the Committee on Military Affairs, to which was referred the bill (H. R. 14155) to amend an act of Congress approved March 28, 1900 (Stat. L., p. 52), entitled "An act granting to the State of Kansas the abandoned Fort Hays Military Reservation, in said State, for the purpose of establishing an experiment station of the Kansas State Agricultural College and a western branch of the State normal school thereon, and for a public park," reported the same with amendment, accompanied by a report (No. 762), which said bill and report were referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union.

Mr. VAUGHAN, from the Committee on Foreign Affairs, to which was referred the bill (H. R. 12060) to enable the Secretary of War to pay the amount awarded to the Malambo fire claimants by the joint commission under article 6 of the treaty of November 18, 1903, between the United States and Panama, reported the same without amendment, accompanied by a report (No. 764), which said bill and report were referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union.

Mr. LEVER, from the Committee on Agriculture, to which was referred the bill (S. 110) to regulate trading in cotton futures and provide for the standardization of "upland" and "gulf" cottons separately, reported the same with amendment, accompanied by a report (No. 765), which said bill and report were referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union.

Mr. JOHNSON of Utah, from the Committee on the Public Lands, to which was referred the bill (S. 2068) to authorize the allowance of second homestead and desert entries, reported the same with amendment, accompanied by a report (No. 766), which said bill and report were referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES ON PRIVATE BILLS AND RESOLUTIONS.

Under clause 2 of Rule XIII,

Mr. GITTINS, from the Committee on Military Affairs, to which was referred the bill (H. R. 13329) to place the name of Charles B. Gaskill on the unlimited retired list of the Army, reported the same with amendment, accompanied by a report (No. 761), which said bill and report were referred to the Private Calendar.

CHANGE OF REFERENCE.

Under clause 2 of Rule XXII, the Committee on Pensions was discharged from the consideration of the bill (H. R. 10426) granting a pension to Rebecca Eldridge, and the same was referred to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

PUBLIC BILLS, RESOLUTIONS, AND MEMORIALS.

Under clause 3 of Rule XXII, bills, resolutions, and memorials were introduced and severally referred as follows:

By Mr. JOHNSON of Washington: A bill (H. R. 17040) providing for the payment to the Territorial government of Hawaii for the care of citizens of continental United States who are, or who may become, affected with leprosy; to the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce.

By Mr. FITZGERALD: A bill (H. R. 17041) making appropriations for sundry civil expenses of the Government for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1915, and for other purposes; to the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union.

By Mr. MOON: A bill (H. R. 17042) to amend the postal and civil-service laws, and for other purposes; to the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads.

By Mr. MORGAN of Louisiana: A bill (H. R. 17043) authorizing a survey of Tangipahoa River, La., from its mouth to Davies Iron Bridge; to the Committee on Rivers and Harbors.

By Mr. NEELEY of Kansas: A bill (H. R. 17044) to provide for the retirement of employees in the Postal Service; to the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads.

By Mr. BRITTEN: Resolution (H. Res. 529) providing for the appointment of a board to examine into the mental and physical condition of John R. Early, now confined under the quarantine regulations of the District of Columbia as a leper; to the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce.

By Mr. RAKER: Resolution (H. Res. 530) to print forest laws of States; to the Committee on Printing.

By Mr. LOBECK: Joint resolution (H. J. Res. 274) to remit, under certain conditions and for the year 1914 the penalties provided by the act approved October 3, 1913, for failure to properly return the income tax provided for in said act in cases where said returns are completed by July 1, 1914; to the Committee on Ways and Means.

PRIVATE BILLS AND RESOLUTIONS.

Under clause 1 of Rule XXII, private bills and resolutions were introduced and severally referred as follows:

By Mr. BURKE of South Dakota: A bill (H. R. 17045) for the relief of William L. Wallis; to the Committee on the Public Lands.

By Mr. CRAMTON: A bill (H. R. 17046) granting a pension to Norman B. Hyde; to the Committee on Pensions.

Also, a bill (H. R. 17047) granting an increase of pension to Mary Johnson; to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

By Mr. GILMORE: A bill (H. R. 17048) granting a pension to Walter A. Powers; to the Committee on Pensions.

By Mr. KAHN: A bill (H. R. 17049) granting a pension to Laurence Kidd; to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

By Mr. KIESS of Pennsylvania: A bill (H. R. 17050) granting a pension to John H. Hipple; to the Committee on Pensions.

By Mr. MORGAN of Oklahoma: A bill (H. R. 17051) granting an increase of pension to Josiah R. V. Atkinson; to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

Also, a bill (H. R. 17052) granting an increase of pension to Henry R. Boatman; to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

Also, a bill (H. R. 17053) granting an increase of pension to Jacob T. Martin; to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

Also, a bill (H. R. 17054) granting a pension to Harlan P. Reeves; to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

SENATE.

FRIDAY, June 5, 1914.

The Senate met at 11 o'clock a. m.

The Chaplain, Rev. Forrest J. Prettyman, D. D., offered the following prayer:

Almighty God, if there be master spirits among us who are capable of reading the signs of the times, if there be great souls that have healing in their touch, these are Thy gifts to us as a Nation and are tokens to all the people of Thy continued care for us. We pray Thee to give to Thy servants in places of power and authority the special qualifications for leadership, that Thou wilt endue them not only with wisdom concerning the passing phases of the world's life but with that deeper wisdom that understands the purpose of God in view of the ultimate end. This day may Thy blessing abide upon this Senate. For Christ's sake. Amen.

The Journal of yesterday's proceedings was read and approved.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary will call the roll.

The Secretary called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Mr. CHILTON. The Senator from New Mexico [Mr. FALL] is necessarily absent to-day. He is paired with me.

I wish to state that the Senator from Tennessee [Mr. LEA] is also necessarily absent.

Mr. MARTIN of Virginia. I wish to announce that the senior Senator from Maryland [Mr. SMITH] is detained from the Senate by official business. He is paired with the Senator from Vermont [Mr. DILLINGHAM].

The VICE PRESIDENT. Sixty Senators have answered to the roll call. There is a quorum present.

ENROLLED BILL SIGNED.

The VICE PRESIDENT announced his signature to the enrolled bill (H. R. 15190) to amend section 103 of the act entitled "An act to codify, revise, and amend the laws relating to the judiciary," approved March 3, 1911, as amended by the act of Congress approved March 3, 1913, which had previously been signed by the Speaker of the House.

FRENCH SPOLIATION CLAIMS.

The VICE PRESIDENT laid before the Senate communications from the assistant clerk of the Court of Claims transmitting the findings of fact and conclusions of law filed under the act of January 20, 1885, in the French spoliation claims set out in the annexed findings of the court relating to the following causes:

The schooner John, Walter Jeffrey, master (H. Doc. No. 1016);

The schooner Regulator, Stephen Chase, master (H. Doc. No. 1015);

The snow Light Horse, James Gibson, master (H. Doc. No. 1010);

The schooner Polly, Alexander Ross and Justin McCarthy, masters (H. Doc. No. 1017);

The brig Lydia, John Allison, master (H. Doc. No. 1013);

The brig Harmony, Richard Penniston, master (H. Doc. No. 1012);

The brig Clarissa, Daniel Brewton, master (H. Doc. No. 1011);

The ship Active, John Garde, master (H. Doc. No. 1019);

The sloop Rebecca, William Clark, master (H. Doc. No. 1020);

The schooner Phoenix, Robert Miller, master (H. Doc. No. 1018); and

The brig Friendship, Gad Peck, master (H. Doc. No. 1014).

The foregoing findings were, with the accompanying papers, referred to the Committee on Claims and ordered to be printed.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

The VICE PRESIDENT presented a telegram in the nature of a petition from the Marine Engineers' Beneficial Association, of San Francisco, Cal., praying for the enactment of legislation to protect the lives of passengers and crews of vessels at sea, which was referred to the Committee on Commerce.

He also presented petitions of sundry citizens of Yankton and Ethan, S. Dak.; of Greencastle, Ind.; and of Philadelphia, Pa., praying for the adoption of an amendment to the Constitution to prohibit polygamy, which were referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. President, I send to the desk and ask unanimous consent to have read a telegram communicating a resolution adopted by the Democratic State convention which met in North Carolina on yesterday concerning the matter of the repeal of the tolls exemption.

There being no objection, the telegram was read and ordered to lie on the table, as follows:

[Telegram.]

RALEIGH, N. C., June 4, 1914.

Senator F. M. SIMMONS,
United States Senate, Washington, D. C.:

The Democratic State convention this afternoon, by a unanimous vote, adopted the following resolution, introduced by me:

"Be it resolved, The Democracy of North Carolina, in convention assembled, guided by the fundamental principles of the party in opposition to subsidies and bounties, gives its full indorsement to President Woodrow Wilson in his position for the repeal of the Panama Canal tolls exemption clause, applauds the action of the United States House of Representatives in voting for such repeal, and calls upon the Democratic majority in the United States Senate to uphold the President and sustain the time-honored and underlying principles of the Democratic Party."

EDWARD E. BRITTON.

Mr. ASHURST. Mr. President, I also have received a large number of telegraphic dispatches and letters in relation to the Panama Canal question, and, following the example set by the eminent Senator from North Carolina [Mr. SIMMONS], I shall read one telegram. This which I now read is signed by a gentleman who is one of the most powerful orators and profound thinkers in our State. It is proper for me to state that this telegram is in response to a question I had asked of Mr. Cleary as to his opinion on the Panama Canal question. It is as follows:

[Telegram.]

BISBEE, ARIZ., May 29, 1914.

Hon. HENRY F. ASHURST,
United States Senate, Washington, D. C.:

There is but one way for you to vote, and that is against the repeal of free tolls. Have followed all arguments in Senate in favor of repeal. The one including our Nation in the term "all nations" is made absurd by the very reading of the entire treaty; the one on the ground of it being a subvention is weak, because even Jefferson stood for subventions relative to public schools; and your Underwood tariff law recognizes subventions as proper; besides, France, the most paternalistic country in the world, has its wealth more equally distributed. The one against the platform is perfidious. Lastly, Arizona, as well as the entire West, should not be denied nor curtailed in receiving the whole benefits of the canal. All Arizona against repeal save those connected with railroads and corporations. Be an American and stand for your country and Arizona will remember you.

WILLIAM B. CLEARY.

This telegram is signed by Mr. William B. Cleary. I ask that it may go with the telegram sent to the desk by the Senator from North Carolina.

Mr. CLAPP. Mr. President, I should like to inquire of the Senator from North Carolina if he is personally acquainted with the sender of the telegram that he had read?

Mr. SIMMONS. Of course I am.

Mr. CLAPP. Is he the man who held the Democratic convention at Baltimore for several hours in earnest protest against subsidy involved in the plank which declared for free tolls?

Mr. SIMMONS. I do not think Mr. Britton was a delegate to the convention. I never heard that he was.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The telegram read by the Senator from Arizona will lie on the table.

Mr. GALLINGER. I present a telegram in the nature of a protest, which I ask to have read.

There being no objection, the telegram was read and referred to the Committee on Interstate Commerce, as follows:

[Telegram.]

CONCORD, N. H., June 4, 1914.

Hon. JACOB H. GALLINGER,
United States Senate, Washington, D. C.:

At a meeting of the representatives of New Hampshire national banks, held in Concord June 4, 1914, the following resolution was unanimously adopted:

"Resolved, That we emphatically oppose the passage of House bill 15657 or any other measure which will prevent the same person from acting as a director in more than one national bank or in a national bank and savings bank and trust companies. We believe that any such measure would be detrimental to the best interests of both the banks and the people of the State, and that copies of this resolution be sent to our Senators and Representatives in Congress, with the request that they use their influence and vote in opposition to any such measure."

LESTER F. THURBER, Chairman.

Mr. WALSH. I send to the desk and ask unanimous consent to have read a letter concerning the radium bill received from a miner of carnotite ores in the State of Colorado.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection? The Chair hears none.

Mr. THOMAS. I was unable to understand what the Senator from Montana said.

Mr. WALSH. I send to the desk a letter received from a miner of carnotite ores in the State of Colorado in relation to the radium bill.

The Secretary read as follows:

NATURITA, COLO., May 29, 1914.

Hon. THOMAS J. WALSH,
Chairman Mines and Mining Committee,
United States Senate, Washington, D. C.

SIR: Speaking not only my own convictions, but also the sentiments of every bona fide prospector and miner in the carnotite region to whom I have talked, I earnestly pray the passage of the so-called radium bill, S. 4405, reported to the United States Senate on March 16, 1914.

I am owner of carnotite claims in both San Miguel County and Montrose County, and know that bill S. 4405 not only does not imperil any of my rights in these claims, nor in prospecting for and locating carnotite claims from lands now in the public domain, but that it offers to me the most positive encouragement in the vigorous prosecution of the mining of carnotite ore and acquirement of more property. Any man of good character can easily secure ample credit covering all legitimate expenses of the mining and transportation of carnotite ore if the United States Government is a steady buyer of the ore, as the facility of conversion of the value of the ore into cash and the absolute certainty attending such exchange makes the ore itself, in a way, a medium of exchange. These are the selfish reasons which actuate those engaged in the carnotite business in this region to favor bill S. 4405.

But in this carnotite region we have the most convincing proof of the curative powers of radium, for in this year one of our local miners was treated by radium for a deep-seated cancer by Dr. Howard A. Kelly. The terrible tortures of cancer had prevented this poor man from sleeping for three weeks; for many months he had been incapable of working; surgery had been ineffective. Nothing seemed before him but suffering, misery, and an early grave. That man came back home with clear eyes and buoyant spirits, 30 pounds heavier, and feeling 20 years younger, as he expressed it. Radium snatched this man from the grave. This is the proof which makes us steadfast in our faith in radium. When the Secretary of the Interior proposes that the hospitals of the Army and Navy shall be provided with sufficient radium to treat patients suffering from cancer and that this radium shall be furnished to those hospitals at actual cost, he is proposing only that which any decent man with knowledge of the facts must uphold him in.

You have reported a wise and efficient law and you have the support of the people of this carnotite region now, just as the United States Bureau of Mines will have the enthusiastic loyalty of our miners and prospectors in the practical operation of the law.

Respectfully, yours,

CHAS. F. CURRAN.

NATURITA, COLO., May 29, 1914.

Hon. JOHN F. SHAFROTH,
United States Senate, Washington, D. C.

DEAR SENATOR: I attach hereto copy of letter to Hon. THOMAS J. WALSH, chairman Committee on Mines and Mining of the United States Senate, in which I advocate the immediate passage of bill S. 4405, as reported to the Senate March 16, 1914.

When this bill was reported to the Senate it was taken for granted out here that it would become a law within a comparatively few weeks, but the long delay in its consideration has given us a very uneasy feeling, for I won't attempt to disguise the fact that our material prosperity is dependent upon the passage of this bill.

In securing amendments to the bill as originally framed by which the status of location, acquisition, and maintenance of carnotite claims was unaffected our neutrality was assured, but when provision was made that the Government should buy large quantities of the ore at competitive prices our position was changed to active partisans of the bill.

As an independent miner I realize that there is one concern operating in this region that has the resources to supply the European users of carnotite with all the ore they would require and cut off this European market entirely from the independent miner. If, then, that large concern should refuse to buy ore, the independent eventually would be forced to sell his holdings at whatever price the buyer might fix. This is a possibility which might easily become a probability if the situation is left as it exists to-day. Even the originally framed bill is preferable to such condition, for no sane miner will contend that it were better for the Standard Chemical Co. to fix values for profit than for Secretary Franklin K. Lane to fix them in the perfunctory exercise of the duties of his high office.

I know your notable record of service to the workingman, to the welfare and progress of the young man struggling to get a foothold in business and to swing himself onto the ladder of success. I know that you sympathize with men who, like me, have gone into the waste places and in sweat and toil try to acquire the minerals hidden by mother nature. I know that you understand the brutal callousness of big corporations in their relations with us, of the trickery, chicanery, and fraud to which they resort habitually, and that if we are left unprotected you would thereby foster the destruction of the very elements that are the very soul of independent manhood.

With sincere regards, I am,

Yours, respectfully, CHAS. F. CURRAN.

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming presented petitions of sundry citizens of Pine Bluffs, Powell, Carpenter, Wheatland, and Cheyenne, all in the State of Wyoming, praying for national prohibition, which were referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. BRISTOW presented petitions of sundry citizens of Plainville and Palco, in the State of Kansas, praying for national prohibition, which were referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

He also presented a petition of sundry citizens of Ottawa, Kans., praying for Federal censorship of motion pictures, which was referred to the Committee on Education and Labor.

He also presented a petition of the Farmers' Union of Pleasanton, Kans., praying for the enactment of legislation to make lawful certain agreements between laborers and employees and persons engaged in agriculture or horticulture and to limit the issuing of injunctions in certain cases, which was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. President, I have been requested by citizens of Longmont, Colo., to present and ask to have inserted in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD certain resolutions which they adopted at a mass meeting on May 25, 1914, relative to labor conditions in that State. I ask unanimous consent to have the resolutions inserted in the RECORD without reading, accompanying the request with the statement that I do not either approve of or disavow the sentiments therein expressed.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the request of the Senator from Colorado? The Chair hears none, and it is agreed to.

The resolutions referred to are as follows:

Resolutions adopted by a mass meeting of citizens of Longmont, Colo., May 25, 1914.

Whereas a certain class of people, whose only claim to publicity is their ability and purpose to breed contempt of law, to encourage riot, murder, and incendiarism, are posing before the world as the representatives of the patriotic citizens of the patriotic State of Colorado: It is

Resolved, That we deny that this small class of agitators represents in any large sense the public sentiment of this State, and we denounce as unworthy of citizenship these people who to advance their political ambitions, to gratify their silly vanities, and thrust their otherwise obscure personalities into the limelight would befoul the nest that shelters them, incite ignorance to lawlessness, plunge the State into anarchy, and hold it up to the world emasculate and unworthy a place in the galaxy of Commonwealths; and

Whereas all Denver daily newspapers, under the gaudy pretext of maintaining popular rights, are aiding and abetting lawlessness, riot, and anarchy: It is further

Resolved, That such newspapers are unworthy the moral or financial support of the law-abiding citizens of the State; and

Whereas the State militia called to service by the legally constituted authority and representing the sturdy manhood of the State has been doing its duty as fully as did the young men of a generation ago, who bared their breasts to the assaults of disunion, we protest against the unpatriotic, false, and libelous vituperation that has been so unjustly used against our young soldiers as destructive to a wholesome military spirit that may stand the Republic in good stead in the not-distant future; and

Whereas we believe that the sovereignty of the State of Colorado and not the private disputes of individuals or corporations is the issue we are facing to-day: We therefore Resolve, That it is the duty of every loyal citizen to sustain by word and deed the governor of the State at whatever cost in putting down rebellion, punishing treason by whomsoever instigated, and redeeming the State from the humiliation of standing as a mendicant, hat in hand, at the door of the White House, begging for the protection we are too feeble to afford ourselves, and to protest to the world that the mouthings of near statesmen, frenzied women, and patriots for revenue only is not the voice of the sovereign State of Colorado.

Mr. THOMPSON presented a petition of sundry citizens of Manhattan, Kans., praying for national prohibition, which was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. SHERMAN presented memorials of sundry citizens of Illinois, remonstrating against national prohibition, which were referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

He also presented petitions of sundry citizens of Illinois, praying for national prohibition, which were referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

He also presented a petition of sundry citizens of Illinois, praying for national recognition of the services of Dr. Frederick Cook in his polar efforts, which was referred to the Committee on the Library.

He also presented memorials of Pope Post, No. 411, Grand Army of the Republic, of Pana; of Dunham Post, No. 141, Grand Army of the Republic, of Decatur; of Abraham Lincoln Circle, No. 2, Ladies of the Grand Army of the Republic; of Corps No. 190, Woman's Relief Corps, of Pana; of Washington Alexander Post, No. 176, Grand Army of the Republic, of Bethany; of J. Q. A. Jones Post, No. 526, of Havana; and of Lovejoy Circle, No. 99, Ladies of the Grand Army of the Republic, of Brighton, all in the State of Illinois, remonstrating against any change in the American flag, which were referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

He also presented petitions of Local Division No. 302, Brotherhood of Locomotive Engineers, of Chicago; of the joint protective board, Brotherhood of Locomotive Firemen and Enginemen, of Murphysboro; of the Brotherhoods of Railroad Trainmen, No. 24, of Galesburg; No. 647, of Chicago; and No. 578, of Murphysboro; of Lodge No. 477, Locomotive Firemen and Enginemen, of Galesburg; of Friendship Division, No. 81, Order of Railway Conductors, of Beardstown; of sundry citizens of Decatur; of New Hope Baptist Church, of Lakewood; of the Brotherhood of Railroad Trainmen, of Douglas Park Lodge, and of Victory Lodge, of Chicago; of Brotherhood of Railroad Trainmen, Calumet Lodge, and Hobbs Lodge, of Chicago; of Brotherhood of Locomotive Engineers, No. 826, of Chicago; of the State legislative board, Locomotive Engineers, of Blue Island; of the legislative committee, Order of Railway Conductors, of Peoria, all in the State of Illinois, praying for the enactment of legislation to further restrict immigration, which were ordered to lie on the table.

He also presented memorials of members of United Mine Workers of America, of Bloomington, Willisville, Herrin, Girard, Thayer, Mount Olive, Cary, Coal City, Percy, and Murphysboro, and resolutions passed at the international Labor Day celebration at Rockford, all in the State of Illinois, remonstrating against labor conditions in the mining districts of Colorado, which were referred to the Committee on Education and Labor.

He also presented memorials of the medical societies of Fulton, Wayne, Clark, Cass, Mercer, Whiteside, and Kendall Counties, all in the State of Illinois, remonstrating against the enactment of legislation to prohibit the distribution and dispensing of narcotic drugs by physicians, dentists, and veterinarians, which were ordered to lie on the table.

He also presented a petition of the congregation of the Central Presbyterian Church, of Joliet, Ill., praying for the adoption of an amendment to the Constitution to prohibit polygamy, which was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

He also presented a memorial of Typographical Local Union of Danville, Ill., remonstrating against an increase of second-class postage rates, which was referred to the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads.

He also presented a petition of the Post Office Clerks Local Union No. 1, of Chicago, Ill., praying for the enactment of legislation to reduce night work and overtime work in the Chicago post office, which was referred to the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads.

He also presented a petition of the Young Men's Christian Association of Chicago, Ill., praying for an appropriation of $165,000 for the maintenance of the Children's Bureau, which was ordered to lie on the table.

He also presented a petition of the Trades and Labor Assembly of Bloomington, Ill., praying that an increase be made in the pay of printers employed in the Government Printing Office, which was referred to the Committee on Printing.

He also presented a petition of Camp No. 54, United Spanish War Veterans, of Chicago, Ill., praying for the enactment of legislation to provide pensions for widows and orphans of veterans of the Spanish-American War, which was referred to the Committee on Pensions.

He also presented a petition of District Council No. 6, United Garment Workers, of Chicago, Ill., praying for the enactment of legislation to regulate the interstate commerce of prison-made goods, which was referred to the Committee on Interstate Commerce.

He also presented a petition of the Retail Druggists' Association of Chicago, Ill., praying for the enactment of legislation to provide publicity of prices, etc., which was referred to the Committee on Interstate Commerce.

He also presented a petition of Douglas Lodge, No. 832, International Association of Machinists, of Villa Grove, Ill., praying for the enactment of legislation to provide a more thorough inspection of boilers and appurtenances, which was referred to the Committee on Interstate Commerce.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan presented petitions of the Woman's Christian Temperance Union of Wheeler, of the congregation of the First Baptist Church of Ithaca, and of sundry citizens of Dowagiac, all in the State of Michigan, praying for the adoption of an amendment to the Constitution to prohibit the manufacture, sale, and importation of intoxicating beverages, which were referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

He also presented a memorial of the Metal Polishers, Buffers, and Platers' Local Union No. 7, of Grand Rapids, Mich., and a memorial of sundry citizens of Michigan, remonstrating against the adoption of an amendment to the Constitution to prohibit the manufacture, sale, and importation of intoxicating beverages, which were referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. SHEPPARD presented petitions of sundry citizens of Texas, praying for the adoption of an amendment to the Constitution to prohibit the manufacture, sale, and importation of intoxicating beverages, which were referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

He also presented memorials of sundry citizens of Texas, remonstrating against the adoption of an amendment to the Constitution to prohibit the manufacture, sale, and importation of intoxicating beverages, which were referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. WEEKS presented memorials of sundry citizens of Worcester, Holyoke, South Boston, Boston, New Bedford, Chicopee, Roxbury, Lawrence, Lowell, Springfield, and Fall River, all in the State of Massachusetts, remonstrating against national prohibition, which were referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. TOWNSEND presented petitions of sundry citizens of Marley, Detroit, and Grand Rapids, all in the State of Michigan, praying for national prohibition, which were referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

He also presented memorials of sundry citizens of Grayling, Detroit, Ypsilanti, and Grand Rapids, remonstrating against national prohibition, which were referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. COLT. I present resolutions adopted by the Chamber of Commerce of Providence, R. I., which I ask may be printed in the RECORD and referred to the Committee on Commerce.

There being no objection, the resolutions were referred to the Committee on Commerce and ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Whereas the Chamber of Commerce of the United States of America having by referendum presented to this organization for an expression of opinion the recommendations of their special committee on trust legislation in regard to the proposals to create an interstate trade commission; and

Whereas Government supervision and control of business concerns and operations as outlined in pending legislation before Congress, among which is included a bill to create an interstate trade commission, is a subject fraught with momentous consequences to American business and should receive careful analysis and deepest study: Now, therefore, be it

Resolved, That the Providence Chamber of Commerce most emphatically protests against the enactment of such legislation as is contained in the above-mentioned bills pending before Congress until ample time shall have been given for the consideration and discussion of these new proposals by all the people of the country, that provision be made for obtaining testimony from business men and business organizations throughout the United States whose activities would prevent their appearing at Washington to express their views, and that in order to prevent hasty and ill-considered action it is urgently requested that Congress refer passing such or similar legislation until a later session of Congress, thereby allowing time for a clearer comprehension and more thorough discussion and a resulting complete expression of opinion throughout the country, to the end that what shall finally be determined upon shall be the product of mature judgment and that which will be likely to inure to the benefit and not to the injury of the interests of all the people; and be it

Further resolved, That the Providence Chamber of Commerce accordingly defer voting upon the referendum of the Chamber of Commerce of the United States of America at this time; and be it

Further resolved, That a copy of these resolutions be forwarded to said chamber, as well as to the President of the United States and Rhode Island Senators and Representatives in Congress.

PENSIONS AND INCREASE OF PENSIONS.

Mr. SHIVELY, from the Committee on Pensions, to which was referred the bill (H. R. 14738) granting pensions and increase of pensions to certain soldiers and sailors of the Civil War and certain widows and dependent children of soldiers and sailors of said war, reported it with amendments and submitted a report (No. 582) thereon.

BILLS AND JOINT RESOLUTION INTRODUCED.

Bills and a joint resolution were introduced, read the first time, and, by unanimous consent, the second time, and referred as follows:

By Mr. ROOT:

A bill (S. 5739) to present the steam launch Louise, now employed in the construction of the Panama Canal, to the French Government (with accompanying papers); to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

A bill (S. 5740) granting an increase of pension to Jacob C. Rennaker (with accompanying papers); to the Committee on Pensions.

By Mr. LA FOLLETTE:

A bill (S. 5741) granting a pension to Alice S. C. McNaught; to the Committee on Pensions.

By Mr. SHIVELY:

A bill (S. 5742) granting a pension to Daniel Howery; to the Committee on Pensions.

By Mr. CHAMBERLAIN:

A bill (S. 5743) granting an increase of pension to George W. Evans (with accompanying papers); and

A bill (S. 5744) granting an increase of pension to Jacob M. Stark (with accompanying papers); to the Committee on Pensions.

By Mr. PAGE:

A bill (S. 5745) granting a pension to Jennie C. Potter; to the Committee on Pensions.

By Mr. McLEAN:

A bill (S. 5746) granting an increase of pension to Horace Page (with accompanying papers); to the Committee on Pensions.

By Mr. TOWNSEND:

A bill (S. 5747) granting an increase of pension to Margaretta B. Smyre; to the Committee on Pensions.

By Mr. GORE:

A bill (S. 5748) to establish a fish-cultural station in the State of Oklahoma; to the Committee on Fisheries.

By Mr. O'GORMAN:

A joint resolution (S. J. Res. 156) providing for a commission to contract for finishing the historical frieze in the Rotunda of the Capitol; to the Committee on the Library.

AMENDMENT TO SUNDRY CIVIL APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. OLIVER submitted an amendment proposing to appropriate $20,000 to purchase 25 oil portraits of the justices of the Supreme Court of the United States, etc., intended to be proposed by him to the sundry civil appropriation bill, which was referred to the Committee on the Library and ordered to be printed.

WIDOWS' PENSIONS.

Mr. JONES. Mr. President, I offer an amendment which I intend to propose to House bill 13044. I ask that it may be read, and I call the attention of the Committee on Pensions to the amendment, because I expect to press it when the bill referred to is called up for consideration.

The VICE PRESIDENT. In the absence of objection, the Secretary will read the amendment.

The Secretary read as follows:

Amendment intended to be proposed by Mr. JONES to the bill (H. R. 13044) to pension widows and minor and helpless children of officers and enlisted men who served during the War with Spain or the Philippine insurrection or in China, between April 21, 1898, and July 4, 1902, viz: At the proper place insert the following as section 3:

"SEC. 3. That every widow who is now receiving or may hereafter be entitled to a pension under present laws of less than $20 per month by reason of the Civil War shall, upon due proof that she was the wife of a soldier at any time during said war and continued his wife until his death, be entitled to a pension of $20 per month, the same to begin from the date of filing her application under the provisions of this act."

Mr. JONES. I ask that the amendment lie on the table and be printed.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The amendment will lie on the table and be printed.

PANAMA CANAL TOLLS.

Mr. SUTHERLAND submitted an amendment intended to be proposed by him to the bill (H. R. 14385) to amend section 5 of an act to provide for the opening, maintenance, protection, and operation of the Panama Canal and the sanitation and government of the Canal Zone, approved August 24, 1912, which was ordered to lie on the table and be printed.

WOMAN SUFFRAGE.

Mr. CLAPP. I ask to have printed in the RECORD the views of the minority submitted by Hon. Thomas B. Reed, of Maine, from the Committee on the Judiciary of the House of Representatives April 24, 1884, relating to the right of suffrage to women.

There being no objection, the report was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Mr. Thomas B. Reed, of Maine, from the Committee on the Judiciary, submitted the following views of the minority:

No one who listens to the reasons given by the superior class for the continuance of any system of subjection can fail to be impressed with the noble disinterestedness of mankind. When the subjection of persons of African descent was to be maintained, the good of those persons was always the main object. When it was the fashion to beat children, to regard them as little animals who had no rights, it was always for their good that they were treated with severity, and never on account of the bad temper of their parents. Hence, when it is proposed to give to the women of this country an opportunity to present their case to the various State legislatures to demand of the people of the country equality of political rights, it is not surprising to find that the reasons on which the continuance of the inferiority of women is urged are drawn almost entirely from a tender consideration for their own good. The anxiety felt lest they should thereby deteriorate would be an honor to human nature were it not an historical fact that the same sweet solicitude has been put up as a barrier against every progress which women have made ever since civilization began. There is no doubt to-day that if in Turkey or Algiers, countries where women's sphere is most thoroughly confined to the home circle, it was proposed to admit them to social life, to remove the veil from their faces and permit them to converse in open day with the friends of their husbands and brothers, the conservative and judicious Turk or Algerine of the period, if he could be brought to even consider such a horrible proposition, would point out that the sphere of women was to make home happy by those gentle insipidities which education would destroy; that by participation in conversation with men they would learn coarseness, debase their natures, and men would thereby lose that ameliorating influence which still leaves them unfit to associate with women. He would point out that "nature" had determined that women should be secluded; that their sphere was to raise and educate the man child, and that any change would be a violation of the divine law which, in the opinion of all conservative men, always ordains the present but never the future.

So in civilized countries when it was proposed that women should own their own property, that they should have the earnings of their own labor, there were not wanting those who were sure that such a proposition could work only evil to women, and that continually. It would destroy the family, discordant interests would provoke dispute, and the only real safety for woman was in the headship of man, not that man wanted superiority for any selfish reason, but to preserve intact the family relation for woman's good. To-day a woman's property belongs to herself; her earnings are her own; she has been emancipated beyond the wildest hopes of any reformer of 25 years ago. Almost every vocation is open to her. She is proving her usefulness in spheres which the "nature" worshiped by the conservative of 25 years ago absolutely forbade her to enter. Notwithstanding all these changes, the family circle remains unbroken, the man child gets as well educated as before, and the ameliorating influence of woman has become only the more marked. Thirty years ago hardly any political assemblage of the people was graced by the presence of women. Had it needed a law to enable them to be present, what an argument could have been made against it! How easily it could have been shown that the coarseness, the dubious expressions, the general vulgarity of the scene, could have had no other effect than to break down that purity of word and thought which women have and which conservative and radical are alike sedulous to preserve. And yet the actual presence of women at political meetings has not debased them, but has raised the other sex. Coarseness has not become diffused through both sexes but has fled from both. To put the whole matter in a short phrase: The association of the sexes in the family circle, in society, and in business having proved improving to both, there is neither history, reason, nor sense to justify the assertion that association in politics will lower the one or demoralize the other.

Hence we would do better to approach the question without trepidation. We can better leave the "sphere" of woman to the future than confine it in the chains of the past. Words change nothing. Prejudices are none the less prejudices because we vaguely call them "nature" and prate about what nature has forbidden when we only mean that the thing we are opposing has not been hitherto done. "Nature" forbade a steamship to cross the Atlantic the very moment it was crossing, and yet it arrived just the same. What the majority call "nature" has stood in the way of every progress of the past and present, and will stand in the way of all future progress. It has also stood in the way of many unwise things. It is only another name for conservatism. With conservatism the minority have no quarrel. It is essential to the stability of mankind, of government, and of social life. To every new proposal it rightfully calls a halt, demanding countersign, whether it be friend or foe. The enfranchisement of women must pass the ordeal like everything else. It must give good reason for its demand to be or take its place among the half-forgotten fantasies which have challenged the support of mankind and have not stood the test of argument and discussion.

The committee claim that suffrage is not a right, but a privilege to be guarded by those who have it, and to be by them doled out to those who shall become worthy. That every extension of suffrage has been granted in some form or other by those already holding it is probably true. In some countries, however, it has been extended upon the simple basis of expediency, and in others in obedience to a claim of right. If suffrage be a right, if it be true that no man has a claim to govern any other man except to the extent that the other man has a right to govern him, then there can be no discussion of the question of woman suffrage. No reason on earth can be given by those who claim suffrage as a right of manhood which does not make it a right of womanhood also. If the suffrage is to be given man to protect him in his life, liberty, and property, the same reasons urge that it be given to woman, for she has the same life, liberty, and property to protect. If it be urged that her interests are so bound up in those of man that they are sure to be protected, the answer is that the same argument was urged as to the merger in the husband of the wife's right of property, and was pronounced by the judgment of mankind fallacious in practice and in principle. If the natures of men and women are so alike that for that reason no harm is done by suppressing women, what harm can be done by elevating them to equality? If the natures be different, what right can there be in refusing representation to those who might take juster views about many social and political questions?

Our Government is founded, not on the rule of the wisest and best, but upon the rule of all. The ignorant, the learned, the wise, and the unwise, the judicious and the injudicious are all invited to assist in governing, and upon the broad principle that the best government for mankind is not the government which the wisest and best would select, but that which the average of mankind would select. Laws are daily enacted, not because they seem the wisest even to those legislators who pass them, but because they represent what the whole people wish. And, in the long run, it may be just as bad to enact laws in advance of public sentiment as to hold on to laws behind it. Upon what principle in a Government like ours can one-half the minds be denied expression at the polls? Is it because they are untrained in public affairs? Are they more so than the slaves were when the right of suffrage was conferred on them? It should also be considered, upon the proposition that to admit women would be temporarily to lower the suffrage on account of their lack of training in public duties, that what is now asked of us is not immediate admission to the right, but the privilege of presenting to the legislatures of the different States the amendment, which can not become effective until adopted by three-fourths of them. It may be said that the agitation and discussion of this question will long before its adoption have made women as familiar with public affairs as the average of men, for the agitation is hardly likely to be successful until after a majority, at least, of women are in favor of it.

We believe in the educating and improving effect of participation in government. We believe that every citizen in the United States is made more intelligent, more learned, and better educated by his participation in politics and political campaigns. It must be remembered that education, like all things else, is relative. While the average American voter may not be all that impatient people desire, and is far behind his own future, yet he is incomparably superior to the average citizen of any other land where the subject does not fully participate in the government. Discussions on the stump and, above all, the discussions he himself has with his fellows, breed a desire for knowledge which will take no refusal and which leads to great general intelligence. In political discussion, acrimony and hate are not essential, and have of late years quite perceptibly diminished and will more and more diminish when discussions by women, and in the presence of women, become more common. If, then, discussion of public affairs among men has elevated them in knowledge and intelligence, why will it not lead to the same results among women? It is not merely education that makes civilization, but diffusion of education. The standing of a nation and its future depend not upon the education of the few, but of the whole. Every improvement in the statuts of woman in the matter of education has been an improvement to the whole race. Women have by education thus far become more womanly, not less. The same prophesies of ruin to womanliness were made against her education on general subjects that are now made against her participation in politics.

It is sometimes asserted that women now have a great influence in politics through their husbands and brothers. That is undoubtedly true. But that is just the kind of influence which is not wholesome for the community, for it is influence unaccompanied by responsibility. People are always ready to recommend to others what they would not do themselves. If it be true that women can not be prevented from exercising political influence, is not that only another reason why they should be steadied in their political action by that proper sense of responsibility which comes from acting themselves?

We conclude, then, every reason which in this country bestows the ballot upon man is equally applicable to the proposition to bestow the ballot upon woman, that in our judgment there is no foundation for the fear that woman will thereby become unfitted for all the duties she has hitherto performed.

ADDRESS BY SENATOR ASHURST.

Mr. O'GORMAN. Mr. President, I ask consent of the Senate for the insertion in the RECORD of some remarks made by the Senator from Arizona [Mr. ASHURST] at a meeting of the Society of the Friendly Sons of St. Patrick, of Philadelphia, on the 17th of last March. They bear in part upon a question that is now agitating the country and receiving the attention of the Senate, and make special reference to the Panama Canal controversy.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the request of the Senator from New York? The Chair hears none, and it is agreed to.

The matter referred to is as follows:

"THE UNITED STATES," HON. HENRY F. ASHURST.

Mr. Toastmaster and members of the Friendly Sons of St. Patrick, my first duty is to return my thanks to the members of the committee who honored me with their kind invitation to be present upon this occasion, and I congratulate your society upon arriving at its one hundred and forty-third anniversary. Your freedom from sectarian and political bias is commendable, and worthy of emulation by many societies throughout our land.

The response you have assigned to me, "The United States," is so vast and varied that, in speaking upon it, I feel as if I were trying to grasp a globe so large that it permits the hand to obtain no hold.

If a student of the firmament, whose vigils are consecrated to exploring the skies and searching the heavens, were asked to describe in a single speech the influence of the sun upon our solar system, the student would stand amazed at the immensity of his task. Not less immense is the task of the speaker who attempts, in a single speech, to respond to the toast, "The United States."

Commencing with the War for Independence and extending down to this good hour, a great nation was and still immeasurably is in the making; fundamental principles of government, of infinite importance to the human race, have been and are now being applied and tested; new ideas are constantly taking hold; new truths constantly being discovered; reforms are being made in institutions and laws; a population noted for tireless energy and unconquerable spirit has pushed its way westward, founded towns, cities, and States, built roads, bridged rivers, joined great lakes by waterways and canals, built factories, mined for metals, covered prairies with mantles of waving grain, and dealt on a gigantic scale and in a new manner with economic, scientific, and financial problems in a vast country where nature has poured forth her resources with generosity, yea, extravagance.

Civilizations were built up in ancient times, notably in Greece and Rome, but it is an unhappy circumstance that it occurred to but few of the moral philosophers and statesmen of those early civilizations that to build an enduring State all the people must have equal civil and natural rights, and the recognition of this truth by our early statesmen largely accounts for our growth and opulence.

The discovery of America gave birth to an amazing awakening, for soon the stories of the discoveries of Columbus kindled the imagination of men. These discoveries doubled the earth, and ships of conquest, adventure, glory, and science began to cut through the billows of every sea. The expanse and magnificence of this new physical world thus opened had, as such things always have, its beneficent influence upon human character and the trend of the world's events, because a contemplation of the external charms of nature inevitably produces a mental and moral evolution and growth which excite a lively and intense interest in human existence.

In 1771 the population of the American colonies was composed principally of the descendants of persons who had felt the oppression of European tyrants, and had emigrated hither to enjoy freedom of conscience, speech, and worship.

The American colonists were descended from the most persevering, thrifty, and energetic races—they were intolerant of restraint and possessed a noble enthusiasm for civil and religious liberty, which even to-day is the dominant and characteristic trait of the American people. Large numbers of the sons and daughters of Erin's sturdy race, a race noted for bravery of spirit and loyalty to free government, were scattered through the colonies. Their ancestors had been tortured in dungeons, murdered on scaffolds, robbed of the fruits of their sweat and toil, scourged by famine, plundered by the avarice of heartless power, and driven by tyrants and despots like the leaves of autumn before the keen wintry winds. These various families of men, transplanted to this new soil and welded together by events and years, became a race of blood and iron. They evolved the Declaration of Independence and with their bayonets wrote another charter of American liberty on the backs of the fleeing soldiers of Gen. John Burgoyne and Lord Cornwallis. [Applause.]

If by the potent influence of some magical wand, or some mysterious chant, we could be transported to the time when, 143 years ago, your ancient and honorable society held its first banquet, and then compare the conditions of 1771 in North America with the conditions of 1914, we would almost be persuaded to forsake our disbelief in Aladdin's lamp and Fortunatus's purse. In the intervening time between your first and your one hundred and forty-third annual dinner there has sprung up a nation, "The United States," which for strength and growth is unparalled in the annals of the human race, and the wildest hyperbole becomes prosaic in attempting to describe the social and moral advance made by our people during this period: the progress in mechanical and electrical contrivances, transportation, scientific research, educational facilities, and the multiplied accomplishments of liberty and civilization which have made life broader, more useful, and beautiful. [Applause.]

Your society held its first annual dinner just five days after Sam Adams had written to Mr. Charles Lucas and said, "The man who nobly vindicates the rights of his country and mankind shall stand foremost in the lists of fame." I would say nothing in this splendid presence that might savor of invidious distinction in any offensive sense; yet, how may one eulogize Pericles and not speak of the glories of Athens; how may one commemorate Cæsar and be silent concerning the achievements of his legions; how, then, may I speak of the United States at a banquet of the Friendly Sons of St. Patrick and omit to make the observation that the Irish race has nobly vindicated the liberty of our beloved country, and, therefore, is entitled, in the eloquent language of Sam Adams, "to stand foremost in the lists of fame." [Applause.]

When you held your first annual dinner, had any traveler possessed the fortitude—yea, the hardihood—to endure the discomforts and brave the dangers of a journey through the thirteen colonies, over the wretched roads, in jolting buckboards, ramshackle stagecoaches, or irregular packet boats, he would have found less than 3,000,000 people. Here in Philadelphia our traveler would have found Dr. Benjamin Franklin, known even then in the most remote corners of civilization as our American pioneer of experimental science—Dr. Benjamin Franklin, who later stood unabashed before kings and princes and challenged the admiration of Europe's best trained diplomats.

It is said that when Thomas Jefferson appeared before the King of France as the successor of Franklin, before that glittering court of letters and fashion, the King exclaimed to Jefferson, "So you have come to take the place of Dr. Benjamin Franklin?" and that Jefferson replied, "Sire, no man will ever take the place of Dr. Benjamin Franklin; I simply succeed him."

Our traveler would have found Chestnut Street, now so cluttered with banks and trust companies, to be the fashionable walk where ladies, wearing gorgeous brocades and taffetas and shoes with high wooden heels, gravely returned the stately salutations of gallant gentlemen wearing colonials and their faces besmeared with a prodigious profusion of white powder. Our sojourner would have found Philadelphia all unknown to the distinction which was later to come to her as the city where were to be enunciated the immortal principles of the Declaration of Independence. Our traveler would have found in the Eastern States a sturdy people, engaged largely in shipbuilding. Indeed, writing of the extent to which American timbers were found in English ships, Allen, a poet of ante-Revolutionary fame, says:

> Even the tall masts that bear your flag on high
> Grew in our soil and ripened in our sky.

And these same timbers a few years later furnished the gallant little navy that was baptized with the blood of fighting "Jack" Barry and John Paul Jones. [Applause.]

Our traveler would have found that George Washington had marched with Gen. Braddock to the fatal field of the Monongahela and had there exhibited a dauntless courage in the face of danger, disaster, and hardship, surpassed only by the wisdom, fortitude, and iron will he later exhibited in holding the little colonies united and determined amid all the grief and all the glory of Valley Forge and Yorktown.

At the time of your first annual banquet James Madison and Aaron Burr were students in Princeton, Thomas Jefferson had shown himself to be a young lawyer of erudition and ability, and was serving with distinction as a youthful and useful member of the house of burgesses. Alexander Hamilton, aged 14 years, was showing signs of genius at his desk in a countinghouse on the island of Nevis, and freckle-faced, sandy-haired Irish Andrew Jackson was 4 years of age, down on Waxhaw Creek, waiting in homely indigence the summons that was later to call him to New Orleans and immortal fame.

Looking back through the dust of history over the mutations of time we are justly proud of our country's achievements. We are the heirs and beneficiaries of heroes who sacrificed much that we might enjoy the rights which we exercise today. American citizenship is an inheritance which has been attained only by virtue of stupendous sacrifices that have been made by those who have gone before to secure this inestimably valuable boon for us. [Applause.]

While we of the present day are enjoying the fruits of the labors of those who have passed across the disk of human existence, we should not proceed with smug indifference to enjoy these blessings, for destiny casts upon us a duty as great, if not greater, than the duty so faithfully performed by our people in the past. Not only must we retain the advanced ground they nobly won, but we must resolutely attempt to solve the problems of the present and the future. The happiness of the people now in existence and the rights of our innocent and unborn posterity should ever engage the attention and solicitude of the statesmen of the present, for civilization's mighty sweep is each year multiplying our problems and augmenting their complexities.

I shall now briefly discuss the question concerning a certain strip of land, 10 miles wide and 49 miles long, owned by the United States and called the Panama Canal Zone.

Through this zone, at an expense to the American people of $435,000,000, we have constructed a ship canal. And in discussing this question I do so without reserve, for neither the proprieties of this occasion nor the careful guarding of official speech require that an American Senator shall withhold an open expression of the opinion he maintains upon the imminent questions of the day. Moreover, I was never much given to the habit of immersing my words in a tank of diplomatic antiseptic before I allowed them utterance. I represent, in part, a great Commonwealth—Arizona—whose heroic history shows that she has never been enamored of those public men who in their mind harbor one thought while their lips tell another. We are in full possession of the Canal Zone, having acquired this territory from the Republic of Panama. The United States, by the express terms of the grant, is made the sovereign and proprietor of the zone and the land through which and in which the canal is built. The American Flag flies over the canal and over the zone; the American Congress makes laws for the governing of the canal and zone. The zone and canal are as much the property of the United States as is Alaska. Of the nations of the world that have assumed any burden in constructing the canal the United States of America is the only one. Of the multitudes of the earth, the Americans are the only people who have been taxed to build this canal. Great Britain has protested that if we exempt our coastwise vessels passing through the canal from the payment of tolls we will have discriminated against her. How specious becomes such protest when we remember that foreign vessels are by law prohibited from engaging in our coastwise or local trade and that England, under an act not dissimilar, passed in 1815, guaranteeing equality of ships for 99 years, favored her local shipping.

Granting, for the sake of argument only, that the exemption of our own coastwise shipping from the payment of tolls is not a wholesome domestic policy, we would still be unable to adopt the British view, for its adoption would be the entering of the thin wedge which sooner or later would mean that our canal would be controlled from London instead of Washington. It does not require the services of a soothsayer to foretell that if we should yield to Great Britain on this point, the inexorable logic of the situation would compel us to yield to Great Britain on other points, for the present attitude of Great Britain on this question is simply the initial move on her part of a series of moves yet to be made by her, looking to the degrading of our country at Panama from the position of sovereign to the position of tollgate keeper.

In conclusion, allow me to say I believe that as the years glide by your society and its descendants will maintain the same record for virtue, rectitude, and patriotism that you have maintained during the past 143 years. [Applause.]

COMMITTEE SERVICE.

On motion of Mr. KERN, it was Ordered, That the Committee on Cuban Relations be reestablished with five members, as follows:

Senator J. L. BRISTOW, of Kansas, chairman.
Senator SMITH, of Michigan.
Senator SUTHERLAND, of Utah.
Senator WHITE, of Alabama.
Senator WEST, of Georgia.

On motion of Mr. KERN, it was Ordered, That Senator HOKE SMITH, of Georgia, be appointed a member of the Committee on Rules to fill the vacancy occasioned by the death of Senator Bacon.

On motion of Mr. LODGE, it was Ordered, That the following appointments be made to the committees of the Senate:

Mr. DU PONT to the Committee on Expenditures in the Department of Justice;
Mr. STERLING to the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads;
Mr. KENYON to the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry;
Mr. SHERMAN to the Committee on Pensions.
Mr. FALL to the Committee on Privileges and Elections;
Mr. MCLEAN to the Committee on Claims; and
Mr. COLT to the Committee on Military Affairs.

Mr. KENYON was, at his own request, excused from further service on the Committee on Military Affairs.

PENSIONS AND INCREASE OF PENSIONS.

Mr. SHIVELY submitted the following report:

The committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the House to the bill (S. 4260) granting pensions and increase of pensions to certain soldiers and sailors of the Regular Army and Navy, and of wars other than the Civil War, and to certain widows and dependent relatives of such soldiers and sailors, having met, after full and free conference have agreed to recommend and do recommend to their respective Houses as follows:

That the Senate recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the House numbered 2, and agree to the same.

That the House recede from its amendment numbered 1.

BENJ. F. SHIVELY,
CHARLES F. JOHNSON,
REED SMOOT,
Managers on the part of the Senate.

JOHN A. KEY,
WM. H. MURRAY,
Managers on the part of the House.

The report was agreed to.

Mr. SHIVELY submitted the following report:

CLAIMS OF SISSETON AND WAHPETON SIOUX INDIANS.

Mr. GRONNA. Mr. President, I inquire if morning business has closed?

The VICE PRESIDENT. It has.

Mr. GRONNA. I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill (S. 5255) conferring jurisdiction on the Court of Claims to hear, determine, and render judgment in claims of the Sisseton and Wahpeton Bands of Sioux Indians against the United States.

Mr. President, I wish to state that this is a bill to which there can be no possible objection. The Indians who are interested in this legislation have for years been coming to Congress asking that a commission be appointed to investigate their claims. The Department of the Interior was opposed to the appointment of a commission, but drew a bill recommending that the claims be referred to the Court of Claims. The bill for which I ask consideration is practically the bill that was drawn by the department. The Committee on Indian Affairs unanimously recommend that the bill be passed, and in order that it may go to the House and be enacted into law at this session of Congress it is necessary that action here should be taken upon it immediately.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. GALLINGER. Let the bill be read first, Mr. President.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary will read the bill.

The Secretary read the bill (S. 5255) conferring jurisdiction on the Court of Claims to hear, determine, and render judgment in claims of the Sisseton and Wahpeton Bands of Sioux Indians against the United States; and there being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to its consideration.

The bill was reported from the Committee on Indian Affairs with amendments, on page 3, line 1, after the words "by the," to strike out "Court of Claims" and insert "Secretary of the Interior," and in line 4, after the word "exceed," to strike out "5 per cent of the moneys found to be due said bands of Indians" and insert "$15,000," so as to make the bill read:

Be it enacted, etc., That all claims of whatsoever nature which the Sisseton and Wahpeton Bands of Sioux Indians may have or claim to have against the United States shall be submitted to the Court of Claims, with the right to appeal to the Supreme Court of the United States by either party, for the amount due or claimed to be due said bands from the United States under any treaties or laws of Congress; and jurisdiction is hereby conferred upon the Court of Claims to hear and determine all claims of said bands against the United States and to enter judgment thereon. If any such question is submitted to said court it shall settle the rights, both legal and equitable, of said bands of Indians and the United States, notwithstanding lapse of time or statute of limitations. Such action in the Court of Claims shall be presented by a single petition, to be filed within one year after the passage of this act, making the United States a party defendant, which shall set forth all the facts on which the said bands of Indians base their claims for recovery; and the said petition may be verified by the agent or authorized attorney or attorneys of said bands, to be selected by said bands and employed under contract approved by the Commissioner of Indian Affairs and the Secretary of the Interior, in accordance with the provisions of existing law, upon information or belief as to the existence of such facts, and no other statements or verifications shall be necessary. Official letters, papers, reports, and public records, or certified copies thereof, and oral testimony, depositions, and sworn statements by members of said bands of Indians may be used as evidence. Whatever moneys may be found due the Sisseton and Wahpeton Bands of Indians under the provisions of this act, less attorney's fees, shall be placed to their credit in the Treasury of the United States: Provided, That the compensation to be paid the attorney or attorneys for the claimant Indians shall be determined by the Secretary of the Interior, but in any event shall not be greater than the amount named in the approved contract: Provided further, That such compensation shall in no event exceed $15,000.

The amendments were agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendments were concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

GLACIER NATIONAL PARK, MONT.

Mr. WALSH. I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill (S. 5433) to amend an act entitled "An act to establish the Glacier National Park in the Rocky Mountains south of the international boundary line, in the State of Montana, and for other purposes," approved May 11, 1910. The bill was reported from the Committee on Public Lands on Tuesday last, the 2d of June.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. President, I shall not object to the request, provided no debate follows——

Mr. WALSH. I should not ask unanimous consent otherwise.

Mr. SIMMONS. But I give notice at this time that I shall object to further requests for unanimous consent to consider bills this morning.

Mr. SHAFROTH. I should like to know the nature of the bill before consent is given.

Mr. WALSH. The bill, Mr. President, provides for the exchange of land held in private ownership within the Glacier National Park in the State of Montana for dead, decadent, and matured timber within the park, and for the exchange of lands held in private ownership within the park for lands within national forests outside of the park, the exchange to be made by the Secretary of the Interior; but if the lands are selected outside, the selection to be made only with the approval of the Secretary of Agriculture.

I will state, Mr. President, to the Senate the immediate purpose of the bill. The Glacier National Park is entered from the western entrance at Belton by a magnificent boulevarded road 3 miles long to the lower end of the central feature of the park, Lake McDonald. That road is bordered by a magnificent grove of cedar trees. I should like to give you some kind of an idea of the beauty and grandeur of the cedars in that section of the country, but I will not take time now further than to say that many of them are at least 20 feet in circumference and tower to a height of a hundred feet, with magnificent spreading branches. This beautiful grove of cedars, just on the border of this boulevarded road, is on land held in private ownership. The owner of the land, as a matter of course, desires to avail himself of the timber upon it, but he is also desirous of preserving the beauty of the park. He does not want those trees destroyed, and he offers to exchange that land for dead, decadent, and matured timber somewhere else in the park, to be designated by the Secretary of the Interior. We desire to have an opportunity to make that exchange, and thus preserve the beauty of the scenery through which the road passes.

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. President, I should like to inquire of the Senator from Montana whether the Northern Pacific Railroad Co. owns any lands in this park, to be exchanged for other lands?

Mr. WALSH. No, Mr. President; it does not own any; nor does any railroad company.

Mr. THOMAS. Of course, the Senator well knows that large amounts of worthless railroad lands have been intentionally included in a great many of these reserves and parks which have afterwards been exchanged for the finest timberland in the country. Inasmuch as there is just a little of it left outside of the lands which thus far they have been able to secure under the operations of the forestry system, I am a little suspicious of all bills of this character.

Mr. WALSH. The question of the Senator is quite pertinent, and I am very glad to assure him that the Northern Pacific grant does not extend that far. The Northern Pacific Co. owns no land within the park.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there any objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. SHAFROTH. Mr. President, this bill does not affect the exchange of lands in any other place than in the State of Montana?

Mr. WALSH. None except those within the Glacier National Park. It is intended to preserve the trees that line the routes of travel within the park.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, I notice there is no report from the department on this bill. Does the Senator know whether or not it has been passed upon by the different departments?

Mr. WALSH. The Senator will find there is a report. The report of the committee says:

> The necessity for the legislation contemplated by this bill is suggested in the Annual Report of the Secretary of the Interior for the fiscal year ended June 30, 1912, wherein he discusses the matter of securing title to private holdings in the various national parks.

I speak from personal knowledge of every feature of the park and the particular grove of trees that it is intended thus to preserve.

Mr. SMOOT. I think myself the object of the bill is a worthy one, and I have no objection whatever to its provisions.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there any objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. President, I make the reservation that I indicated a few moments ago.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill, which was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Interior, for the purpose of eliminating private holdings within the Glacier National Park and the preservation intact of the natural timber along the roads in the scenic portions of the park, both on patented and park lands, is hereby empowered, in his discretion, to obtain for the United States the complete title to any or all of the lands held in private or State ownership within the boundaries of said park, by the exchange of dead, decadent, or matured timber that can be removed from any part of the park without affecting the scenic beauty thereof or from the Government lands within the metes and bounds of the national forests within the State of Montana, and also, in his discretion, to exchange for patented lands in the Glacier National Park Government lands of equal value within the metes and bounds of the national forests within said State: Provided, however, That the lands in the national forests to be offered in exchange shall be determined by the Secretary of Agriculture.

SEC. 2. That the value of all patented lands within said park, including the timber thereon, offered for exchange, and the value of the timber on park lands, or on Government lands within the metes and bounds of the national forests within the State of Montana, proposed to be given in exchange for such patented lands, shall be ascertained in such manner as the Secretary of the Interior and the Secretary of Agriculture may jointly in their discretion direct, and all expenses incident to ascertaining such values shall be paid by the owners of said patented lands; and such owners shall, before any exchange is effective, furnish the Secretary of the Interior evidence satisfactory to him of title to the patented lands offered in exchange; and if the value of timber on park lands or on the Government lands in the national forests within the State of Montana exceeds the value of the patented lands deeded to the Government in exchange, such excess shall be paid to the Secretary of the Interior by the owners of the patented lands before any timber is removed, and shall be deposited and covered into the Treasury as miscellaneous receipts. The same course shall be pursued in relation to the exchange of patented lands in the park for Government lands in the national forests within said State: Provided, That the lands conveyed to the Government under this act shall become a part of the Glacier National Park.

SEC. 3. That all timber on Government lands in the park must be cut and removed under regulations to be prescribed by the Secretary of the Interior, and any damage which may result to the roads or any part of the park or the national forests in consequence of the cutting and removal of the timber therefrom shall be borne by the owners of the patented lands, and bonds satisfactory to the Secretary of the Interior and the Secretary of Agriculture, jointly, must be given for the payment of such damages, if any, as shall be determined by the Secretary of the Interior so far as the same relates to lands within a national park and by the Secretary of Agriculture where the same relates to lands in the national forests.

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. Mr. President, this seems to be almost entirely a local matter; therefore, I shall not oppose the bill. I do wish, however, to call attention at this time and in connection with this bill to the manipulations that are constantly going on in regard to our forest reserves, of which this is but another sample.

Many of the western Members of Congress and Senators have protested against the creation of so many of these forest reserves. They have been met by the forest reservists and others with the argument that the timber is absolutely necessary; that it should be protected for the future; and that the forest reserve embraces country that should not pass into private ownership under any circumstances. It has also been urged that land within the forest reserve, whenever it should be discovered to be available for agricultural purposes, should be thrown out of the reserves and made subject to agricultural purposes.

I understand from the Senator from Montana that this bill meets the approval of the departments of the Government. It is simply and solely an exchange by which private individuals are allowed to go into the national forests and acquire public lands. It seems to me that it is not consonant with the avowed purpose of the Forestry Service, in meeting objections, that when lands should be found to be not necessary for forest reserves they should be passed into private ownership through the operation of the general land laws.

It seems, however, that in the national forests of Montana there are areas, large or small, which the Forestry Service do not consider necessary for the purposes of that service and the purpose for which the forests were originally reserved, and this bill proposes to exchange those lands for patented lands now held within the Glacier National Forest. It is only of a piece with the sort of legislation and manipulation that has been going on in regard to the public lands, forested and unforested, in the West and Northwest.

I desire to enter this statement now so that it can not be assumed by anybody that the effect of this bill is not understood.

It is understood, and perhaps at some future time attention will be called to it.

Mr. SHAFROTH. Mr. President, I should like to ask the Senator before he takes his seat whether or not this bill simply limits the exchange to a national park. I do not like the idea of the ordinary forest reserves——

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. No; as I understand—and if I am incorrect, the Senator from Montana will correct me—the bill provides that the Secretary of the Interior may exchange lands now in private ownership in the Glacier National Park for dead or matured timber in the park, or may exchange it for other lands in national forests in Montana. I think that is what the bill provides.

Mr. WALSH. The Senator has correctly stated the substance of the bill.

Mr. SHAFROTH. I do not see any objection, if the Government is going to have a national park out there, to its having absolute control of every foot and every acre of it. I am very much opposed to that policy as applied to the ordinary forest reserves, because they are supposed to be open to entry for homesteaders, and also for mining; and for that reason there is no occasion for any such exchange as to forest reserves. As to a park, however, it seems to me that it occupies a different position from a forest reserve, because there the Government is supposed to exercise jurisdiction and sovereignty over it. A national park is something of which it has control in every respect, whereas in forest reserves the Government is not supposed to have that control.

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. I think the Senator from Colorado hardly understood my view upon the matter. I am not objecting to the Government getting under its administration and control and owning all the land within the borders of the Glacier National Park. I think that is proper; I think it is right for the proper administration of the park which has been created. I am, however, calling attention to the fact that the department and the Forestry Service are now saying that they are willing to let private individuals come in and acquire portions of the national forests. We have insisted all the time that if there are any portions of the national forests that are not absolutely required for the purposes for which they were created, they should be thrown open to the general public, and that a man should not be given an advantage simply because he owns a piece of land in a national park. That is the statement I wish to make.

Mr. SHAFROTH. I will state to the Senator that I am heartily in accord with that. I think it is proper.

Mr. SIMMONS rose.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. President, if the Senator will indulge me, we can dispose of this bill, I think, in just a few moments.

I merely desire to say that I trust no Senator will regard this as in any sense a local matter. The preservation of the beauty of the Glacier National Park as a national park is most distinctly a national consideration in the very highest sense. I trust that most of us shall live to see the day when that region, very appropriately spoken of as the Switzerland of America, will attract annually the great crowd of tourists who flock to the real Swiss mountains instead of visiting the beauties of our own country as they are there disclosed.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, and read the third time.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, before the bill is passed I simply wish to say that I have no objection to it, but I do object to the Senator from Montana taking from New Hampshire the appellation of "the Switzerland of America."

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is, Shall the bill pass?

The bill was passed.

PANAMA CANAL TOLLS.

Mr. O'GORMAN. I ask that the tolls bill be laid before the Senate.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (H. 14385) to amend section 5 of an act to provide for the opening, maintenance, protection, and operation of the Panama Canal and the sanitation of the Canal Zone, approved August 24, 1912.

Mr. STONE. Mr. President, I take advantage of this occasion to say what I wanted to say yesterday.

Mr. BRISTOW. Mr. President, will the Senator from Missouri yield to me for just a moment, for a resolution?

Mr. STONE. I will.

THE COMMITTEE ON CUBAN RELATIONS.

Mr. BRISTOW. Mr. President, I submit a resolution and ask for its immediate consideration. I desire to say that it requires no appropriation to provide for these clerks, for it is already provided in the appropriation bill.

Mr. STONE. Mr. President, I will say to the Senator that I have no personal objection to it, but I rather think that can not be done under the rules.

Mr. BRISTOW. If the Senator was making a speech, that is perhaps true, but I did not think the Senator had begun his speech.

Mr. STONE. I had addressed the Chair. I make no objection, however.

The resolution (S. Res. 387) was read, considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to, as follows:

Resolved, That the Committee on Cuban Relations be, and it hereby is, authorized to appoint a clerk, at $2,220 per annum; an assistant clerk, at $1,440 per annum; and a messenger, at $1,200 per annum.

PANAMA CANAL TOLLS.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. 14385) to amend section 5 of an act to provide for the opening, maintenance, protection, and operation of the Panama Canal and the sanitation of the Canal Zone, approved August 24, 1912.

Mr. O'GORMAN. Mr. President, do I understand that the tolls bill is now before the Senate?

The VICE PRESIDENT. It is. The Senator from Missouri [Mr. STONE] has the floor.

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President, will the Senator from Missouri yield to me?

Mr. STONE. Mr. President, the Senator from Iowa was not present when the bill was laid before the Senate, and I had addressed the Chair with the intention of making some remarks. The Senator had the floor at adjournment yesterday, and if he especially desires to proceed at this time I will yield.

Mr. CUMMINS. I am perfectly willing that the Senator from Missouri shall make the address that he has it in mind to make. I assume that it is not upon the tolls bill.

Mr. STONE. No; it is not.

Mr. CUMMINS. The Senator very kindly yielded to my appeal yesterday morning, and I do not feel that I ought to interpose any obstacle in the way of his making the address this morning. Therefore I shall very gladly wait until the Senator from Missouri has finished.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, I suppose the Senator from Iowa will not object to one or two other Senators following the Senator from Missouri?

Mr. CUMMINS. No, Mr. President; I will not. I realize the fairness and justice of the discussion being completed when once begun. I hope, however, that if I do not go on now, I shall not be required to go on until Senators have had an opportunity to get their lunch. I do not care to speak while they are eating.

Mr. STONE. Mr. President, on May 23 the Senator from Washington [Mr. JONES] presented a resolution calling on the Postmaster General to furnish the Senate with complete information respecting the resignation, discharge, and demotion since March 4, 1914, of employees in his department and in the Washington City post office who had ever served in any war of the United States, together with their efficiency ratings.

On Monday last the Postmaster General made his reply to this resolution, submitting the information called for. This resolution was the outgrowth of a "teapot tempest" raised by a rather odd combination of people in Washington over the alleged dismissal of 18 or 20 old Civil War veterans—that was the indefinite number stated more than once in the press—who had been employed in the Post Office Department and in the Washington City post office.

Several partisan newspapers, one or two partisan local Grand Army officials, and a lot of Washingtonians who are seeking to force the enactment of a law to pension civil employees of the Government have worked in concert to stir up a popular feeling against this administration because of these alleged dismissals, and thus force along the larger scheme for civil pensions. Public meetings have been held which have adopted denunciatory resolutions, and a number of newspapers have been filled with pictorial and printed stories to show that a great outrage has been committed. But back of all this furor has been a purpose, starting with using the names of old, decrepit soldiers to promote this civil-pension proposition. This propaganda has been apparently managed by one Fulton R. Gordon, a gentleman whose time seems to be chiefly employed in promoting various schemes out of which he gets a lot of free advertising, even though he may get nothing else.

Mr. GALLINGER. I did not understand the gentleman's name. Will the Senator repeat it?

Mr. STONE. Fulton R. Gordon.

Mr. GALLINGER. He is a lawyer here.

Mr. STONE. He has a long tin horn which he toots from day to day, gathering promiscuous crowds before whom he shows himself that he may exploit his beneficent deeds arduously done for the public good.

One of his fads now is the civil-pension fad, his noble purpose being to organize and lead on a valiant fight to pension a great body of people who have been in the civil service of the Government, drawing salaries, for many years. For evident reasons we know it is not a difficult task to arouse a responsive sentiment in Washington to a movement of that kind.

When this story about the discharge of these old soldiers was started Mr. Gordon was in the front of it, clamoring for the restoration of these scarred veterans of war, and hoping out of the fuss and fume to find a chance for promoting his larger scheme for a civil-pension law.

On Monday night last a meeting was held here in Washington to consider this whole subject, over which Mr. Gordon presided as permanent chairman. According to the press reports, he was full of ardor and the glowing fire of a great enthusiasm. He made a speech to this meeting, from which I quote:

> We are going to take this battle to headquarters. We are not going to allow these old men to be made the sport and toy of politicians. * * * Furthermore, we will not allow the aged civil-service employees of Washington to be the coin with which political debts may be paid back home.

He speaks with the high tone of one in authority. He is dictatorial, and seems determined, willy-nilly, to force Congress into obedience. Whether there is merit in this propaganda, I will not say. Indeed, there may be. We can better discuss that, however, after Mr. Gordon has marched in under the dome of the Capitol and laid down his ultimatum at the door of the Senate. I wish now merely to say that it is easy to make a noise if men are permitted to invent their facts, to exaggerate and discolor the truth, and can find sympathetic newspapers to do the necessary exploiting. The sensational publications with which this community and other communities have been recently flooded have led many people to believe that 18 or 20 old soldiers had been, in fact, peremptorily and arbitrarily dismissed from the service of the Post Office Department since the 4th day of last March. That impression has been scattered through the country. Now, what are the real facts? Not a soldier—not one—has been dismissed or demoted in the Post Office Department since March last. Not only so, but, with one exception, not a soldier who ever served in any war on any side has been dismissed or demoted in the Post Office Department since Woodrow Wilson was inaugurated as President on March 4, 1913. The one exception was that of George Marshall, a colored laborer in the department, who served in the Spanish-American War. He was demoted from $720 per year to $660 per year as a disciplinary measure because he had been guilty of the excessive use of intoxicants; but this demotion was with the understanding that he would be restored to his former grade at the expiration of two months provided he should abstain from the use of liquor. Accordingly on May 24, that being the end of the two months' period, he was restored to his former position. That is the only instance of the dismissal or demotion of an ex-soldier serving in the Post Office Department during this administration.

Now, as to the Washington City post office. This post office, of course, stands on the same plane of any other city post office. The postmaster, Mr. Praeger, reports that since March 4, 1914, six Union soldiers employed in the city post office have resigned, two have been dropped from the rolls, and one reduced from $1,000 to $800 per year; also, that one ex-Confederate soldier had been reduced from $1,000 to $800 per year. That covers the whole case since March 4, 1914. Prior to that only one other ex-soldier serving in the Washington City post office had been dismissed or demoted since the incoming of the Wilson administration. That one was Henry L. Johnson, whose salary was reduced in 1913, when the postmaster was a Republican. This reduction was based on charges contained in a letter from Mr. Fulton R. Gordon—the same Gordon who now cries out so vociferously against the crime of demoting an employee who has ever served in the Army of the United States.

From all this it will be seen that since this administration began, 15 months ago, 6 ex-Union soldiers have resigned, 2 have been dropped without their consent, and 2 have been demoted, making 10 in all. One ex-Confederate soldier has also been demoted, as I have stated. There are very few ex-Confederates in the departmental service or in the city post office. Postmaster Praeger states in his letter to the Postmaster General, printed in Monday's RECORD, that all these changes, except in the case of Henry L. Johnson, demoted on Gordon's charges, resulted from a necessary reorganization of the Washington City post office, when a large number of changes were made in the clerical force, the reasons for which are clearly stated in Mr. Praeger's letter. I will ask leave to print as a supplement to these remarks a table furnished by Mr. Praeger, explaining in each individual case why the changes were made. An examination of this table will show that, considering the number of ex-soldiers employed in the Washington post office, the per cent of soldiers affected by the reorganization was small. So much for the facts.

Now, I wish to make a few general observations with reference to this matter. I cordially agree that the Government and people of the United States should deal generously with the men who have endured suffering and honorably imperiled their lives in the military service of the United States. No matter in what war our soldiers fought, it is the patriotic duty of the American people to care for them with tender and generous hands; and that, happily, this Government and people have done. No other nation in the whole history of the world has ever even approached the liberality which this Nation has displayed in caring for those who have fought and suffered under the American flag. We have allowed liberal pensions not only to the men who wore the national uniform, but to their widows and dependents even unto the second and third generations. Pensions have been allowed not only to those who served in the regular organizations in times of war or peace, but also to many who, when the stress of war was on, rendered service to the Government outside of any regular organization. Thousands upon thousands of special bills have passed Congress to pension men who could not establish a legitimate claim under the terms of the law. Since 1866 the United States have paid out in pensions $4,586,966,346.

In 1913 $176,714,907 were appropriated for the current fiscal year, and the report of the Commissioner of Pensions for that fiscal year shows that there are on the pension rolls at this time 820,200 persons, and this more than 50 years after Fort Sumter was fired upon. In addition to that, the United States have established 10 or 12 homes and branch homes for Federal soldiers in different parts of the country. These soldiers' homes are established on a magnificent scale. One of them near this city embraces a broad, picturesque domain of several hundred acres beautifully improved in every way, and with quarters on a splendid scale for the accommodation and comfort of the inmates. Recently I had occasion to visit the home at Hampton, Va., on the shores of Chesapeake Bay, which is one of the most beautiful and attractive spots in all the South. No expense is spared to make these places real and attractive homes for the old men who enjoy their hospitalities. For the support of these establishments we appropriated for the current fiscal year ending June 30, 1914, the munificent sum of $3,981,265. In addition to this, many of the States have provided State homes, run, for the most part, at State expense, as agreeable habitations for the old soldiers living within their borders. We have one such home in my State of Missouri. For this Federal soldiers' home the State makes annual appropriations. The General Government aids the States in the maintenance of these establishments. During this fiscal year we have appropriated for that purpose $1,200,000. Altogether, for the support of soldiers' homes, State and National, we are now appropriating out of the Federal Treasury between $5,000,000 and $6,000,000 per year. In addition to all that, we have enacted laws which give to old soldiers in the civil employment of the Government privileges and preferences not common to the people at large. Yes, Mr. President; the American people have been appreciative of the services rendered the country by the men who have borne arms in its defense. Far from begrudging this generous action, I applaud the patriotic American spirit which has prompted it.

But, Mr. President, we have no civil pension law nor civil pension list—at least, not yet. It may be that in the near future the Government, moved thereto by Fulton R. Gordon and like effervescent patriots, will be prevailed upon to load an additional burden of multiplied millions upon the taxpayers for the support of men and women who have long been favored with positions with good salaries in the civil service of the Government. But so far civil pensions have not been authorized; but to the contrary we now have, at least for the regulation of the Post Office Department, a law against civil pensions. By an act of Congress approved April 1, 1909, it is provided that—

> The establishment of a civil pension roll or an honorable service roll, or the exemption of any of the officers, clerks, and persons in the Postal Service from the existing laws respecting employment in such service, is hereby prohibited.

Now, what would you do with an old soldier employed in the civil service who becomes incapacitated? What would you do with a man who becomes mentally or physically so infirm as to be unable to perform with efficiency the duties of the place he may hold? Suppose a man should be paralyzed so that he lost the use of both hands and arms, what would you do with him? Suppose one became stone blind in both eyes, what would you do with him? Suppose one became old, infirm, and so utterly deaf that he could only be communicated with by writing, what would you do with him? Suppose one should be afflicted with a contagious or infectious disease, such as malignant cancer, what would you do with him? Such cases are cited by the Washington City postmaster in his communication printed in the RECORD. Would you allow these unfortunate men to hold their desks nominally, and crowd them into rooms occupied by numerous associate clerks and maybe subject them to the danger of disease? What would you do in such cases? If a man is incapable of performing the service for which he is employed, but is still kept on the pay roll, would not that be in effect a civil pension—a civil pension added to his military service pension—and would that not be in violation of the statute of 1909, which I have quoted? Of course, we sympathize with those who have grown old, infirm, and incapacitated, whether they have served in the Army or not; but there is no provision made by the law to care for them, except in the case of soldiers who draw a pension for military service and who can enter a soldiers' home if necessary. In the meantime it should not be forgotten that the public work must go on if the Government is to be effectively administered. If a man who can not perform the duties of his position is kept at his post, then the public service must suffer. If the work committed to an employee, man or woman, is important, then it must be efficiently performed, or else the public service will be impaired. If the work is useless or unnecessary, then it would be a waste of public funds to continue it. The executive departments were not intended to be eleemosynary institutions. Mr. President, men should be reasonable, and I think the people generally will be reasonable, about matters of this kind. Strive as they may, it will be a difficult task for any set of men to inflame the public mind against the Government or the administration, when only things reasonable and fair and just are done. In this connection it is apropos to call attention to this provision of an act approved March 4, 1913, as follows:

That the appropriations made for the officers, clerks, and persons employed in the public service shall not be available for the compensation of any persons incapacitated, otherwise than temporarily, for performing such services.

Is not that a proper and just law, and is it not in the public interest? Mr. President, partisanship may cut fantastic capers before the country, but not many people will be misled by fustian intended to deceive. The people are quick to detect a pretense. One might suppose from the sensational partisan accounts printed during the last month that no old soldiers had ever been dismissed or demoted, and that no resignations had ever been accepted, until since the Wilson administration was inaugurated; but all these things were done under Taft, under Roosevelt, and under previous administrations. I hold in my hand a list showing the demotion in 1911 of 15 old soldiers in the Post Office Department alone. I ask leave to insert this table at the end of my remarks.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, permission to do so is granted.

The paper referred to will be found at the end of Mr. STONE'S remarks.

Mr. STONE. Mr. President, these 15 demotions of Civil War veterans occurred, mind you, not in the Washington City post office, but in the Post Office Department itself, and occurred under a Republican Postmaster General; and here I call special attention to the fact that on July 1, 1913, 2 of the 15 men demoted—L. S. Mortimer and A. Anderson—were restored by Postmaster General Burleson to their former positions and salaries. No one heard any roar from Fulton R. Gordon or Dr. Cleeson or any other man about these demotions in 1911, nor did you hear any roar from anybody about demotions, dismissals, or resignations in the Post Office Department or any other department during any year of former Republican administrations. Of course not, for that was a gray horse of another color. It appears to have been all right in the estimation of these men and papers who assail Gen. Burleson if a Republican Postmaster General demoted or fired employees who had seen service in the field.

Mr. GOFF. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Missouri yield to the Senator from West Virginia?

Mr. STONE. Yes.

Mr. GOFF. Does the table to which the Senator from Missouri alludes, relative to the resignation of these soldiers, give information as to the number of requests for resignation that were made during the present fiscal year?

Mr. STONE. No; I think not. The table contains several columns under proper headings, stating the facts.

Mr. GOFF. I desire simply to know whether or not the information which the Senator has shows the requests that were made by the department for resignations?

Mr. STONE. I will undertake to say that the department has not requested the resignation of any man.

Mr. GOFF. I mean, as a matter of course, those in authority over the parties who did resign.

Mr. STONE. The table, to which I suppose the Senator from West Virginia refers, was prepared by Mr. Praeger, the postmaster of Washington City, which I have asked and obtained leave to insert at the end of my remarks, and which, of course, the Senator may examine.

Before closing there is one other thing of more immediate concern to the Senate to which I might allude. When some 14 or 15 years ago the Republicans regained control of this body they speedily fired Democratic Senate employees, whether ex-soldiers or not, and substituted Republicans. Only the other day—in fact, during the present week—an old ex-Civil War veteran from Ohio, who was severely wounded in battle, told me that he was dismissed from the position he held as a Senate employee to make room for a Republican ex-soldier whom Senator Dick, of Ohio, desired to have appointed. The name of this soldier is James W. Byrne, now residing in Washington. He is a Democrat, and he told me that he was discharged solely to make room for a Republican. After you Republicans had about cleaned the platter, and when at a later period the weather began to grow squally for you and Democratic prospects were brightening you passed this resolution in the Senate:

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Senate and the Sergeant at Arms of the Senate are hereby directed to retain in the employ of the Senate those persons who served in the Union Army during the late Civil War and whose service in the Senate is necessary and satisfactory and who are not otherwise provided for, and to continue such persons in their positions until cause for their removal shall have been reported to and approved of by the Senate and their removal directed.

July 11, 1911, is the date of that resolution. When the Democrats recovered control of the Senate, on March 4, 1913, we found 30 ex-Federal soldiers on the Senate pay rolls. Since then 2 of these 30 employees have voluntarily resigned and 2 have died. Of the remaining 26 only 1 is a Democrat and 25 are Republicans. But we have let the resolution of 1911 stand. We have made no effort to repeal it or to modify it. These 25 Republicans remain, although some of them are so old and feeble that long leaves of absence have been necessary and have been granted. Still they have been retained on the roll. This situation affords a striking contrast and shows how much greater consideration Democrats pay to old soldiers, without regard to politics, than Republicans accord them.

Mr. President, all these things are well calculated to make reasonable men who believe in fair and honorable fighting exceedingly fatigued and somewhat painfully weary over such outbursts as have recently regaled our ears. I wanted to say this much so that the Senate, the press, and the country might have some reliable information respecting these matters about which such a hullabaloo has been made. And yet, after all, I can not much blame Republicans. Since they are so hard pressed and can find no serious mistakes to criticize and no large things to complain of, they must of necessity invent something, even though very small, to quarrel with us about. But, as usual in such cases, the "thunder in the index" dwindles into a low, muffled growl as the story unfolds under the subduing light of truth.

The matter referred to by Mr. STONE is as follows:

Reductions of Civil War veterans during the year 1911, Post Office Department.

Hon. POSTMASTER GENERAL,
Washington, D. C.

SIR: Supplementing my letter of this date, giving the information called for in the Senate resolution of May 23, I herewith transmit a complete list of all demotions and separations from the service resulting from the reorganization of the Washington post office. In this connection I would call attention to the fact that the ratings given are misleading and valueless as an indication of the value of the employee to the Postal Service, inasmuch as the ratings generally took into consideration the past history and past standing of the superannuated employees, particularly war veterans.

The complete list is hereto attached.

Very respectfully, OTTO PRAEGER, Postmaster.

EMPLOYEES RESIGNED.

Name.	Salary.	Age.	Years of service.	Rating.	Character of work.	Remarks.

[1] Only 7 months.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, I think the Senator from Missouri [Mr. STONE] will acquit me of any intention whatever of inflaming the mind of the public or of any particular class of people against the administration. What I have said in relation to the demotion and the discharge of old soldiers—and I now wish to say that I have said very little, indeed—I have said, because I think that a wrong has been done them. I know that I never would treat men who worked for me as long as some of the men discharged have worked for the Government in such a way as they have been treated by the Government, nor would I think, if men had saved my very existence, as the old soldiers did the existence of our Nation, of ever discharging them from my service so long as I had the power to give them employment.

Mr. President, I have read the report made in answer to the resolution of the Senator from Washington [Mr. JONES], and I want to call the attention of the Senate now to the cases reported by the Postmaster General of dismissals and demotions. I shall call them to your attention in detail, but before doing so, I want to call attention to a law that has been passed by Congress, later than the one that was read by the Senator from Missouri, referring particularly to the employment of old soldiers by our Government.

This is the law:

Provided, That in the event of reductions being made in the force in any of the executive departments no honorably discharged soldier or sailor whose record in said department is rated good shall be discharged or dropped, or reduced in rank or salary.

Any person knowingly violating the provisions of this section shall be summarily removed from office, and may also upon conviction thereof be punished by a fine of not more than $1,000 or by imprisonment for not more than one year.

Mr. President, let us take the names of the ex-soldiers who have been dismissed from the service, not in the Post Office Department but in the city post office, as stated by the Senator from Missouri.

Mr. STONE. Mr. President, will the Senator yield to me for a moment before he does that?

Mr. SMOOT. Certainly.

Mr. STONE. The law the Senator read is contained in a proviso in the legislative, executive, and judicial appropriation bill, is it not?

Mr. SMOOT. Yes; of the date of August 23, 1912.

Mr. STONE. It is an appropriation bill. The Senator will observe that it forbids, under penalties, the removal of any soldier serving in one of the executive departments. That is the language of the law. It does not, by any fair construction, relate to the post office.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, the law does not say "executive departments." The law specifically says:

No honorably discharged soldier or sailor whose record in said department is rated good shall be discharged or dropped or reduced in rank or salary.

Mr. JONES. Mr. President, will the Senator permit me a word?

Mr. SMOOT. Yes; I yield to the Senator.

Mr. JONES. The first part of the section of which the proviso the Senator read is a part is as follows:

SEC. 4. The Civil Service Commission shall, subject to the approval of the President, establish a system of efficiency ratings for the classified service in the several executive departments in the District of Columbia based upon records kept in each department and independent establishment——

Mr. SMOOT. Yes; "independent establishment."

Mr. JONES (reading)—

With such frequency as to make them as nearly as possible records of fact.

Then the proviso appears at the close of that section.

Mr. SMOOT. Which, of course, includes the Washington City post office.

Mr. JONES. It includes everything.

Mr. SMOOT. Now, I want to call attention to the name, the age, the length of service, the efficiency rating, and the action taken in each of the cases referred to by the Senator from Missouri, and let the Senate decide for itself whether these men should have been dismissed from the service upon the rating that has been given them. I wish also to call attention to the fact that this rating has been given to them since this administration has been in power.

Take William E. Tew. His age is 74. His length of service is 37 years. His rating is 78.4. "Resigned."

Now, I want Senators to understand that these resignations were not given because the old soldiers desired to resign. They were requested.

Mr. STONE. I should like to ask why they resigned, if, as the Senator contends, the law making it a crime to dismiss them applied to the city post office. Of course I insist that the law does not apply to the city post office, for it says specifically, in words, that they shall not be dismissed from the executive departments.

Mr. SMOOT. No, Mr. President.

Mr. STONE. I have it right before me, and the language is as I have stated.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, if the Senator will allow me to conclude, I am perfectly willing that he shall put in the RECORD the exact words of the law. They have already been put in the RECORD by the Senator from Washington; and I am perfectly willing to have Senators judge whether that language applies only to the executive departments or whether it applies to all of the departments of the Government, including the independent establishments.

Mr. STONE. But the Senator ought not to make such a statement, and insist upon it, when the very language of the law is, "in the event of reductions being made in the force in any of the executive departments."

Mr. SMOOT. I will let the law speak for itself, just as it reads.

Now we will take Samuel R. Strattan. His age is 71. The report says he has a length of service of seven months, with an efficiency rating of 85; "resigned." What are the facts? Mr. Strattan has been in the employment of the Government for nearly 20 long years, working in the dead-letter office in this city. Only seven months ago he was transferred from the dead-letter office to the Washington City post office, and, of course, the record shows that he served only seven months, whereas every Senator who knows him knows that he has been here nearly 20 years, and knows that he is an efficient man. Why, his very rating of 85 proves that he is efficient, and yet he is classed as one who "resigned."

William A. Hutchins; age 77; length of service, 19 years; with a rating of 84.4 per cent.

Joseph Randall; age 77; length of service, 47 years; with a rating of 94.6 per cent.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. In what department?

Mr. SMOOT. In the Washington City post office, with a forced resignation.

Mr. GALLINGER. Did I understand you to say that those ratings have been recently made?

Mr. SMOOT. They have. All of the ratings have been given since this administration has been in power.

I am not going to go into the record of all, because there is no need of taking the time of the Senate to do so; but I do not believe there is a Senator in this Chamber who will say that a man holding a rating under the civil service of 94.6 per cent is inefficient——

Mr. GALLINGER. With a Democratic commission.

Mr. SMOOT. Or that he should be dismissed, or virtually dismissed, from the service of our Government.

It is true that one of the old soldiers is deaf, and perhaps it is true that every order that is given him by his superior must be given to him in writing. I want to say to the Senators that it was fighting for the preservation of the Government, and it was the roar of cannon that caused that affection. Now, for efficiency's sake, for economy, this man who offered his life for his country, and through that service brought an affliction of deafness upon himself, must, because there may be a younger and more capable man, be demoted and driven from the service of this Nation.

Mr. President, where a man has worked for this Government, and is a soldier of the Civil War, with a service of 47 years, and there is not a charge against his character, and during that whole time his rating has been good, I do not believe there is a community in all the United States that would justify his dismissal from the service of the Government.

Is it only in the city post office? If it were only these few that I have named, this whole question might have been called a "tempest in a teapot"; but I wish to say to the Senate that it is in nearly all the departments of this Government. Not only that, but it is in the Senate itself.

It is true that there were 30 old soldiers in the service of the Senate when the Democratic Party came into power, and it is true that those who have not resigned and those who have not died are still in the service of the Senate; but what is their position? Every one of them, with the exception of four, has been demoted—demoted from the highest salary of $2,500 to $1,440; from a salary of $2,250 to $1,200; from a salary of $1,440 to $720.

Mr. President, we find right at the doors of this Chamber men who have served in the Civil War, who were wounded in that war, with a service in the war of three years and a service in the Government of nearly a quarter of a century, drawing salaries of $840 a year, while others, doing exactly the same work, guarding the same doors, are drawing salaries of $1,440. It is not that the old soldier who is drawing the $840 does not attend to the doors as well as anyone else, for he does, but it is a change made by the powers that be.

Mr. President, the Senator referred to the fact that there is no law for paying a man when he is inefficient and when he is incapable of performing his duty. How many Senators are there in this body now who do not remember, only three years ago, when there was a committee appointed by this body to consider the question of patronage. Do you not remember that the report to the Senate showed that there were certain individuals who never served one day in the year, who were continually away from Washington, who were drawing a salary? I remember when the vote was taken upon the continued payment of wage to John Jones. He was not in the city; he was absolutely incapable of doing any work; but because he was the bodyguard of Jeff Davis he was allowed to draw his salary, and is drawing it to-day.

If we are going to economize, I believe we ought to begin with the legislative appropriation bill, which will be considered by this body in a very few days, and strike from that bill clerks of Senators who spend very little time in the city of Washington. If we must have economy, let us not begin with the old soldier. Let us not cut him off. I believe the Senator from Missouri himself, if he had a man working for him as long as these men have worked for the Government, would be inclined to take care of him, particularly if he had saved the Senator's home or his family.

The Senator asks, "What would you do with an old soldier who has become physically incapable of performing his labors?" Mr. President, the report that is made to the Senate of the United States from the Post Office Department does not show that they are incapable of performing their duties. A man who holds a rating of 94 per cent is capable of performing his duties. I want to say frankly to the Senate and to the country that as far as I am concerned every old soldier would be kept in his position, even if some other person had to supervise his work, as intimated is the case in the report.

Mr. President, I want to say to the Senate that I have told the people of the intermountain country more than once that the expense of running this Government is greater than it ought to be; I have told them that it could be cut in many departments; and when I called their attention to the fact that there is one class of citizens in the Government service who perhaps could be discharged and others more competent employed and make a saving to the Government, but that was a class who saved this Nation, men in the departments with one arm, with one leg, with one eye, and in no instance has there been a single one who ever objected to the money paid to the soldiers of the Civil War by our Government.

I wish to say to the Senator that the honorary Senate roll of the Senate, created nearly a quarter of a century ago, is not composed of all Republicans. When I first came into the Senate a third of those on that roll were Democrats, and they have remained on the roll until death came to them, and I believe the Senate as a whole think they should have remained until they resigned or death took them to the great beyond.

Mr. President, I do not think that this question ought to be a partisan one. What I am saying here to-day is not a criticism of the party in power. I believe when the attention of the country is called to it this administration will rectify the wrong and see that these old soldiers are taken care of as long as they live. If we do that nobody will complain, no citizen of the United States will object.

Mr. President, there is not an appropriation bill passed at this session of Congress that with only a part of the appropriations for many items would pay the salary of every old soldier in the Government service, and as far as I am concerned I would just as leave see the money go to taking care of them in their last days, and a great deal more so, than to have the hundreds and thousands and millions of dollars appropriated for the eradication of imaginary bugs.

Mr. President, the happiness of an old soldier to me is just as dear as the happiness of a man who might have saved my home or my life, and I want, for one, to protest against any movement on the part of Congress to demote or dismiss them from the service.

I hardly think, Mr. President, that I will say more to-day. I want it understood that I have not the least feeling in my heart against anyone, and I only speak because I believe an injustice has been done to these few old men. I trust, as I stated before, that when attention is called to it it may be rectified.

Mr. JONES. Mr. President, I introduced this resolution simply for the purpose of getting the facts. I was not consulted by anyone before it was done. I had seen these statements and charges in the papers with reference to the discharge and demotion of soldiers in the Post Office Department and in the city post office, and I wanted to get the facts. It was not done to further any civil-pension propaganda or anything of the kind.

The Senator from Missouri has suggested that this is a political or partisan matter. I want to say that until he suggested it it never entered my mind, as far as that is concerned. There ought not to be any partisanship about it. There ought not to be any politics in it; and, if there should be any politics developed from it, it will come probably from what the Senator from Missouri has said and suggested and those who try to justify the acts taken and excuse the facts that appear to exist.

The resolution called for the facts. Some have asked why the resolution is confined to the time since the 4th of March of this year. The only reason why it was done was that no suggestion of any improper discharges or demotions or transfers had been made until lately, and that date was supposed to cover all the necessary facts in connection with this controversy. The fixing of that date had no significance whatever. If any suggestions had been made of improper transfers or demotions or discharges before that time—even a year or two years back—I should have been glad to have covered that time, because it would not make any difference to me what administration is in power with reference to a matter of this kind.

It seems to me that the facts as disclosed by this report show that injustice has been done to some of these soldiers, and that our Democratic friends and the administration should be just as anxious to rectify it as I am, because in nothing that I shall suggest shall I intimate that they are any more unfriendly to the old soldiers than anyone else. I hope they regard him and his services and sacrifices as highly as I do.

Attention has been called to the record by the Senator from Utah [Mr. SMOOT]. I want to reiterate it and to call attention to two or three or more of these discharges and as to what the ratings here show, because as to whether or not the soldiers were efficient and whether their discharge is justifiable will appear from the record itself. If we take the facts that have been sent to us by the department, it seems to me that they show clearly that an injustice has been done whether intentional or not.

Here is George Dean, who was dropped. He has been in the service for 41 years and his rating is 88. The statute says that if the rating is good the old soldiers shall not be dropped. I assume that that rating of 88 would be considered as good.

Mr. LEE of Maryland. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. JAMES in the chair). Does the Senator from Washington yield to the Senator from Maryland?

Mr. JONES. Certainly.

Mr. LEE of Maryland. I should like to ask the Senator two questions. The first is, are not these ratings made upon past services going back 30 or 40 years?

Mr. LODGE and Mr. JONES. Oh, no.

Mr. LEE of Maryland. I was so advised by the department, and that these ratings do not show the present efficiency. I should like to ask——

Mr. LODGE. The rating is made from year to year. They are given fresh every year.

Mr. LEE of Maryland. There is a fresh statement every year, but based upon considerations that go back for many years.

Mr. LODGE. The Senator is mistaken. The ratings are made from year to year. They do not make them 40 years back.

Mr. LEE of Maryland. But are they not made upon that basis? That is the question.

Mr. LODGE. They do not average them.

Mr. JONES. I understand that the ratings are based on service and the capacity for service not 40 years past, but the present. Under the law that we passed in 1912 we require the Civil Service Commission to "establish a system of efficiency ratings for the classified service in the several executive departments in the District of Columbia based upon records kept in each department and independent establishment, with such frequency as to make them as nearly as possible records of fact." That must mean records of fact up to date, not 40 years ago, and under this law these ratings must have been made.

Mr. LODGE. If the Senator will allow me, in the city post office the ratings are constantly made because the promotions are automatic and according to the ratings.

Mr. SMOOT. It may be one thing one year and another thing another year.

Mr. LODGE. Yes; it may be one thing one year and another thing another year. They do not average the ratings over a period of 40 years anywhere.

Mr. STONE. Postmaster Praeger states in his communication that the ratings cover the entire service and are based upon that.

Mr. JONES. They must be based upon the existing capacity of the employee. We have no right, it seems to me, to assume anything else.

Mr. LODGE. One of the men had been only seven months in the department, and his rating must have been for seven months. It could not have been for anything else.

Mr. LEE of Maryland. Obviously different facts are presented here, because I am advised by the assistant postmaster that the ratings go back over a large number of years and do not necessarily show present efficiency. That is a subject to be inquired into.

Mr. President, there is one other question——

Mr. LODGE. Does the Senator mean to tell the Senate that the ratings are averaged?

Mr. LEE of Maryland. That is what I have just been told by the assistant postmaster.

Mr. LODGE. The assistant postmaster is mistaken. They do not take the average for 1900, 1901, 1902, 1903, and then average them for 1914. They do not average the rating; at least they never did before. Probably the present man is doing it. I should think he is capable of it.

Mr. LEE of Maryland. The service for a number of years is considered in these ratings, I am advised. The question is whether the statement of the Senator from Massachusetts is the fact or the statement of the assistant postmaster to me is the fact.

Mr. LODGE. I say I think the assistant postmaster of the city, whoever he may be, who has just come in, evidently, does not understand the postal business. It is not surprising that he should not.

Mr. LEE of Maryland. It is a civil-service process, is it not?

Mr. LODGE. What is a civil-service process?

Mr. LEE of Maryland. The whole rating business.

Mr. LODGE. The rating is civil service.

Mr. LEE of Maryland. There is one other question I should like to ask the Senator. Has the place of this particular employee who was demoted or discharged been filled by any other person? My advices are that only three of these places have been filled at all, and those places that have been filled have been filled strictly from the civil-service list, the next person available in order.

Mr. JONES. They could not be filled in any other way.

Mr. LEE of Maryland. Then, of necessity, there was no political sinister meaning or significance in their removal.

Mr. JONES. I have not said anything and I have not suggested anything of the kind. I only said that I thought injustice had been done, and I am trying to suggest that if any injustice has been done when attention is called to it, it will be rectified by the administration. I am not concerning myself about the filling of these places, the dismissals are what is in issue now.

Mr. OLIVER. Will the Senator allow me?

Mr. JONES. Certainly.

Mr. OLIVER. Alluding to the statement of the Senator from Maryland that only three places have been filled, I should like to say there is no doubt whatever that quite a number more than three have been unfilled, and that is what we are talking about.

Mr. JONES. There is no question raised here as to the filling of the positions after the vacancies were created or putting somebody else in or anything of that sort. I do not understand that they were dropped in order to put somebody else in their place, but the question is whether these people have been justly and properly dropped from the service.

William W. Mills, mentioned here, is 77 years of age, has been in the service 42 years, and his rating is 88. That is a pretty high rating. I may be mistaken, but I understand the rating for admission into the service is 70. Here is a man who has a rating of 88 of efficiency of service, and yet he is dropped. Others may be put in on a rating of 70. I do not mean in this class, but I mean in general under the law. It seems to me that those are facts which show that injustice has been done.

The Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. OLIVER] has called my attention to one sentence in the report of the Postmaster General that is printed here. It reads as follows:

> The ratings here given were made on January 1, 1914, and covered the period from July 1, 1913, to December 31, 1913. They were the only ratings with which the men were credited either on March 4, 1914, or at the time of their demotion or separation from the service.

That apparently shows that they have not gone back over many years and averaged up, but that the rating that he made shows his capacity as of the last year.

O. T. Putnam, 71 years of age, has been in the service 11 years. He has a rating of 75.

G. T. Galliher is 68 years of age. A great many men of 68 are very efficient. He has been 32 years in the service, and he has a rating of efficiency of 85, 15 per cent higher than is necessary for admission into the service. He has been reduced.

Then here is Augustus Ridgely, 78 years of age, 51 years in the service. His rating is only 69.1. He is a little below what would allow him to enter the service in the regular way. There might be some justification for his reduction or dropping him from the roll, although I do not think so myself; but on the figures and on the facts shown there is some justification for that.

Then here is John J. B. Lerch, 81 years of age, 56 years in the service, and his rating is 59.2 per cent, still lower.

Then here is Joseph Randall, 77 years of age, 47 years in the service, with a rating of 94.6 per cent. It seems to me that shows clearly that Mr. Randall has been unjustly dealt with and that there is no excuse for his discharge. Ninety per cent is a high rate in any work, and a man who maintains that rating is surely entitled to great consideration, whether a soldier or not, and when a soldier no thought of disturbing him should enter the mind of anyone.

Then here is William A. Hutchins, 77 years of age, 19 years in the service, 84.1 per cent rating, or 14 above the percentage required for admission into the service of those first taking the examination.

In this report it is stated that several of these employees have resigned, and that is all that is said about it. That gives the impression they left the service voluntarily. I am reliably informed, as the Senator from Utah [Mr. SMOOT] also mentioned a while ago, that these resignations were forced and brought about in this way: Some time ago these employees were told that unless they resigned to take effect on the 30th of June they would be dropped from the rolls on the 15th of May, and under those conditions the resignations were sent in. I have this from such a source that I consider it as a fact, and as a fact that ought to get into this record and ought to be considered in passing upon the justice of the action taken by the postmaster.

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Washington yield to the Senator from Wyoming?

Mr. JONES. Certainly.

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. I understood the Senator from Missouri [Mr. STONE] in his statement to give what I supposed to be authority that that was not the fact. It seems that there is a dispute here as to the facts. I understood from the Senator from Missouri that these resignations were absolutely voluntary and the persons seemed to be very ready and quick to separate themselves from the service.

Mr. JONES. Of course, that does not look to be reasonable. It looks to be very unreasonable. Men holding these positions so long and as efficient as they appear to be would not voluntarily resign.

Mr. STONE. I made no such statement that the Senator from Wyoming credits me with. I said nothing about their resignations except that they had resigned. I said in answer to the Senator from West Virginia that no resignations had been asked by the Post Office Department.

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. Of course it was my dull comprehension—I should suppose that under the statement of the Senator from Washington that that was pretty definite asking for the resignations. Of course the Senator from Missouri and myself may misunderstand the import of that sort of language.

Mr. JONES. I understand the Senator from Missouri confined his statement, whatever that was, to the executive department. Apparently from his contention in reference to the law that we have read here that does not include the city post office, and these employees were in the city post office.

So I do not think now there is any difference with reference to the facts. It must be conceded and is conceded that the resignations of these men were asked for and they were told unless they did resign they would be dropped from the roll on the date stated.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, I want to say to the Senator from Missouri I do not know whether it is true or not, but one of the old soldiers of the Post Office Department told me that there was a request from the Post Office Department for the resignation of 13 old soldiers. The letters were handed to them to sign, and the following day they were told not to sign the letters, that there had been a mistake made, and that their resignations were not called for. I say that is what they tell me. Whether it is true or not, of course I can not say.

Mr. JONES. Mr. President, we have the facts with reference to these discharges and these demotions. The facts show that there were a number of soldiers discharged or their resignations forced in the city post office. The record also shows that their record of efficiency in many cases was high, and so far as the record discloses there was no justification for the dismissal or the forced resignation of several of these men.

I am in favor of efficiency in the Government service. I am in favor of economy. I believe that our service should be as efficient as possible, that it should be done as economically as possible. I think there are many places in the Government service where we can begin to economize without impairing efficiency, but I do not believe we ought to begin or that the country expects or asks us or hopes that we will begin upon the old soldiers in the public service, even though those soldiers may not be as efficient as others who might take their places. I do not believe that even if we find an old soldier in a place where the work he is doing is not really necessary that simply for the purpose of saving a few dollars the people of the country expect or ask us or expect or ask any department of the Government to discharge that man and put him aside into the world without anything and without any way or means of sustenance. He helped to save this country when it needed the best of our men. They responded in the country's need, and they have a right now in their need and old age to expect that they will be taken care of by the people and by the Government, and the people themselves expect it. I am satisfied that the people will not condemn any administration even if it allows men of this character to be on the roll when their services are not efficient or not really necessary. I do not believe they would condemn it. I know I would not. I do not feel that these discharges have been made out of hostility to the soldier. I do not feel that at all, and I hope that is not the case; and I therefore look to see this injustice righted without delay.

I accept the statement of the postmaster here that he wants to reorganize his service and make it efficient and make it economic; but I do say he ought to take into account and consider these men and their services and what they have rendered the Government, and the way in which the people of the country regard them and ought to regard them. If he does that, if that is done by the administration, I am satisfied that some care and provision will be made for these men for their remaining few years. A man of 88 years will not be long with us. He will not be a burden upon the Government very long, and we can well afford to take care of these men in the positions that they are filling, and which the facts show they are capable of filling with efficiency, until the grim reaper takes them to their reward. Let us make their last days happy. Let them not feel embittered against the Nation they helped to save because of its apparent ingratitude in their declining years.

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Washington yield to the Senator from North Carolina?

Mr. JONES. I yield.

Mr. SIMMONS. I was going to ask the Senator to permit me to interrupt him for a parliamentary inquiry. I wish to inquire of the Chair if the unfinished busness is before the Senate, notwithstanding the fact that it was not laid before the Senate when the morning hour expired? I wish to inquire if it is still before the Senate?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The unfinished business was laid before the Senate prior to the time when the Senator from Missouri [Mr. STONE] took the floor.

Mr. SIMMONS. It is still before the Senate, notwithstanding the expiration of the morning hour?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. It is.

Mr. JONES. Now, just a word with reference to the employees of the Senate. I have not given any particular attention to that phase of this matter, and I do not know anything about the details except as to one employee of the Senate. The Senator from Missouri suggested that several old soldiers had resigned from the Senate roll. I know one of the old soldiers who as soon as the reorganization of the Senate took place, who had been filling a position on the Senate roll, was directed to take another place at a lower salary where he could not possibly do the work. He was directed to go away down into the folding room somewhere and put on overalls and do some heavy work. He could not stand that work. He was too old for it. He could fill efficiently the place he had been holding, but he could not do this work. It looked like it was done for the purpose of forcing him to resign, just as these men were forced to resign. While I have not looked into it, I know it was suggested that in a great many cases old soldiers who were employees of the Senate were placed in positions and placed at work where it was reasonable to suppose they could not stand it, and, whether that was the purpose or not, it was thought that the purpose was to force them to resign. Now, it may be that that is one reason why several of those to whom the Senator from Missouri referred have separated themselves from the Senate roll.

Mr. STONE. Only two.

Mr. JONES. I understood the Senator suggested that about 26 had resigned.

Mr. STONE. Oh, no; only two.

Mr. JONES. I misunderstood the Senator.

Mr. STONE. I said 26 are now on the roll; that there were 30 when the Democrats became the majority party in this body; that 2 had died since and 2 resigned.

Mr. JONES. I misunderstood the Senator, then; but many of them have been reduced, as the Senator from Utah [Mr. SMOOT] has just suggested, and put in other positions or continued in their old places at lower salaries, while increases have been made in other positions.

Mr. NORRIS. I should like to inquire if the Senator can give any information as to how many of these 26 have been demoted and are getting a less salary than when the Senate changed political control.

Mr. JONES. I have not gone into that myself, and I can not give the Senator that information.

Mr. SMOOT. All but four, I will say to the Senator.

Mr. NORRIS. They are demoted?

Mr. SMOOT. Yes; if the Senator does not——

Mr. KERN. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Washington yield to the Senator from Indiana?

Mr. JONES. Yes.

Mr. KERN. On the reorganization of the Senate there was a very earnest desire expressed on the part of some people that the example set by the Republicans of this body some years ago be religiously followed—that the soldiers' roll be maintained as heretofore, but that the Republican soldiers should give way to Democratic soldiers of equal merit. That proposition, apparently fair in the game of politics, was regarded as fair by the Republican Members of this body. It was regarded as fair throughout the country where Republicans were in control. It was voted down in the Democratic caucus, and there was a declaration made that these old soldiers, notwithstanding their politics, should be kept in office—not in the choice places which they held. We thought we were dealing generously by them in the way of comparison when we permitted them to remain here at all and did not fill their places from among the ranks of thousands of ex-soldiers of equal valor who are Democrats, who fought as they did to maintain the flag and honor of the country. There are thousands of old Democratic soldiers in this country to-day, of equal merit to any of these, who would be glad to have these places, and who point us to the example set by the Republicans and want to know of us why there are no places about the Senate for them.

It seems to me in view of this generous treatment on the part of the majority of these men it comes with poor grace for Senators now to claim that there has been bad treatment of any ex-soldier here on the part of the Democratic majority.

So far as I know, and I have talked with many of them, the old soldiers who have been kept on the roll here, notwithstanding their partisanship, in the place of Democratic soldiers who want their places, are very well satisfied that they are kept here. I have heard no complaint from them. I know there were some from my own State who were personal friends of mine who were very glad to hold their places at a reduced salary, and regarded the treatment as generous because their places were not taken from them and given to Democratic ex-soldiers of equal merit.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Washington yield to the Senator from Nebraska?

Mr. JONES. Certainly.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, it seems to me that this system, whether practiced by a Democratic Senate or by a Republican Senate, is wrong. It is just as bad for the Republican organization to take partisanship into consideration and to remove men from office and to replace them with others of a different political faith as it is for Democrats to do it. In neither case do we get the most efficient service. I recognize, as I think everybody else does, that when the Democrats came into control of the Senate they were confronted with a large number of constituents and friends who had been out in the cold for a great many years, and they did not have nearly enough places to go around; they were in a very difficult position, and they are yet in that position. There is not any doubt that so long as you fill these places as a reward for political service, when a political party takes control of a body of this kind or of a similar body, the same difficulty will arise.

I understand it to be the fact that there is a law applying particularly to the old soldiers who are employees of the Senate. No matter how bad that law might apparently hurt, it ought to be enforced in good faith. If there is a law against the removal of an old soldier who is on the Senate roll, and that old soldier is transferred, as the Senator from Washington suggested had been done in some cases, to some work that he is unable to do, in order to put him in a position where he can not perform his work and would necessarily either have to resign or be discharged, it seems to me that is not the enforcement of the law in good faith.

I believe these places ought to be under some kind of a civil-service arrangement, not only with the idea of getting more efficient service but for the protection of the men themselves who have to dole out this patronage. It is a mistake in the Senate, as it is everywhere else, to think that the man who has a lot of political patronage to dole out is therefore in a position of advantage over the man who does not have any, as I presume a great many Democrats who have been out of power for a great number of years have learned since they came into power; at least many of them have said so to me privately. The greater reason why, as I look at it, it is wrong is because it does not bring about the most efficient service. As I understand from what I have heard Senators say here and from what little information I had before, there is a law making specific provision in regard to the employment of old soldiers in the Senate. There is a law—and it has been read here to-day—applying to the appointment of old soldiers in the several departments that has been often violated, I think, from information that has come to me not only in the Senate—I have not got any information in regard to the Senate—but in the departments in a great many instances, for partisan political reasons. When Republicans came into power after the Democrats, they did the same thing; they removed men for partisan political reasons. Democrats have done the same thing when they came into power. That, as a matter of fact, in my judgment, is a violation, in spirit at least, of the civil-service law.

Several old soldiers in the different departments have come to me and told me privately of being demoted and of being asked to resign. Several who were not old soldiers told me they were asked to resign, and were frankly told the reason for it was that the party in power had to have their places for Democrats.

When the Republicans came into power after the Democratic administration went out some of those men who were still in office, particularly in the Government Printing Office, were removed for the same offense. It is not a thing, in my judgment, that can be charged up alone to one party; but, nevertheless, it is a thing to be regretted. As I view it, it would be to the benefit not only of good service, but to the members of the political party in power themselves to say: "We will enforce the law in good faith; we are not going to resort to any circumlocution in order to put one man out and put another one in because they are of different political faiths."

Mr. JONES. Mr. President, I agree fully with what the Senator from Nebraska has said.

Mr. WEEKS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Washington yield to the Senator from Massachusetts?

Mr. JONES. I yield to the Senator from Massachusetts.

Mr. WEEKS. Mr. President, the suggestion has been made by two or three Senators that there may be some difference in the construction of the ratings of the men who have been referred to in this discussion, but certainly there can be no dispute as to the quality of the service of those men who are immediately under the eye of the Senate. I am not surprised that Democratic Senators wish to avoid any possibility of being charged with unfairness to the old soldiers.

The Senator from Indiana [Mr. KERN] has said that, in his judgment, the old soldiers on the roll of the Senate were treated generously when the present organization of the Senate was made at that time. In my judgment, if Republican soldiers had been replaced with Democratic soldiers, Democratic Senators could not have been charged with unfairness, but that course was not followed in some cases and it was not done in the case of a few men who are serving right on this floor. Now, there are 14 doorkeepers employed on the floor of the Senate. Of those 14 men, 11 are Democrats and 3 are Republicans. The 11 Democrats are receiving an average of $1,520 per year and the 3 Republicans, all of whom are old soldiers with excellent, if not distinguished, records, are receiving an average salary of $946 a year.

Mr. KERN. Will the Senator state to the Senate how many Democrats were employed at those doors during the time of the Republican control of the Senate?

Mr. WEEKS. I am not complaining because Democrats have been employed at these doors, but there were two Democrats employed at that door over there [indicating], the Democratic door, under a Republican administration. One of them was paid a salary of $1,800 a year.

Mr. KERN. They are there yet, are they not?

Mr. WEEKS. They are there yet, and one of them, a distinguished veteran of the Confederacy, was paid a salary of $1,800 a year, which he is now receiving, and I do not complain of that, but I do complain that the man occupying a corresponding place at this door [indicating], a Republican with a distinguished record, is paid $840 a year. This Democratic Congress has demoted him from $1,440 to $840. The Democrats of the Senate owe it to themselves to see that these men who are performing the same service on this floor that they were performing before March 4, 1913, the same service that is being performed by Democrats in the same positions, should have their salaries restored to what they were before the change. It is an outrage that old soldiers who were occupying such places, and who have always performed their duties acceptably, should be reduced from $1,440 to $840 a year, as has been done in this case.

Mr. SMOOT. And in some cases to $720.

Mr. WEEKS. And I hope calling the attention of the Democratic Senators to this case will be sufficient to restore such salaries.

Mr. KERN. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Washington yield to the Senator from Indiana?

Mr. JONES. I yield.

Mr. KERN. I understand the Senator from Massachusetts—or was it some other Senator—said the Democrats would have been entirely justified if they had taken those places and filled them with deserving and worthy Democratic soldiers.

Mr. WEEKS. Mr. President, I said that I did not think the Democrats could have been greatly criticized if they had done it, but I think they can be greatly criticized if they demote these men who are perfectly able to perform the duties which they are performing. If you are looking for an economical administration, here is an opportunity to put it into force. You are saying that Republican doorkeepers should only be paid $1,000 a year and that Democratic doorkeepers be paid, on an average, $1,520 a year. If a thousand dollars a year is enough for a Republican, it is certainly enough for a Democrat, and you can save $6,000 every year here on the floor of the Senate.

Mr. KERN. If the Senator will allow me, the thing I had in mind when I asked the question was this: I know an old soldier in my State, I have known him for many years, indeed since my boyhood, who lost an arm at Shiloh. He served, I think, up to the Battle of Shiloh, and has gone lame through life ever since. When the Democrats came into control of the Senate, he came to me and insisted on knowing why he should not have a place on the soldiers' roll of the Senate. He called my attention to the fact that none of these soldiers were maimed as he was, that none of them could be quite as deserving so far as disability was concerned, that none of them had a higher character. Many of them he said had been on the pay roll for years, while he had never received any recognition of any kind at the hands of the Government, and he appealed to me as the caucus chairman—for it was after I was made caucus chairman—to use what little influence I had to take the place of some one of the Republican soldiers who had been on the pay roll here for years, and give it to him. Notwithstanding the loss of limb, he was entirely able to sit at a door. I turned a deaf ear to his request. He wanted to be on the soldiers' roll; it was the roll of honor; and he called my attention to the fact that when the Republicans came into control of this body every Democratic veteran was fired out. He wanted to know why, in view of those circumstances, he would not be permitted to sit at a door here as a long-deferred reward for the service he had rendered the country.

If the man who sits at the door is complaining that his salary was reduced, that under a Democratic administration he does not receive as much money as he did before, if these gentlemen are not satisfied with their salaries, if there is a disposition here to complain, I will agree to find one-armed and one-legged Democratic soldiers—men who lost a leg or an arm at Shiloh or at Antietam or at Gettysburg, as good soldiers as ever wore the blue—to fill every one of these places with men who will be satisfied.

I thought when we maintained this soldiers' roll of Republicans that we were rendering a favor to those men. If it is not so regarded, then men can be brought here who are every whit as worthy, men who are maimed, men who need the places, men who have never had an office, men who are willing to come here and take these places without any murmuring.

Mr. WEEKS. I understand perfectly well, and so does the Senate, that the majority can take that course if it sees fit; and if it sees fit to do so, I am not going to make complaint; but what I say to the Senator is that he had the power to give that maimed soldier a place, because there have been nine changes made among the doorkeepers on the floor of the Senate, and many of these places have been filled by men who are not maimed or who did not wear the blue, or the gray either.

Mr. KERN. Are they on the soldiers' roll?

Mr. WEEKS. Not on the soldiers' roll.

Mr. KERN. I am speaking of the soldiers' roll.

Mr. WEEKS. That could have been provided at the time. What I am saying is that you are asking Republican soldiers with distinguished records to perform the same service, one at $840 a year and two others at a thousand dollars a year, for which other men are receiving an average of $1,520 a year. That is the complaint I make.

Mr. KERN. I understood that we were rendering favors to these men when we permitted them to remain here. If it is not to be regarded as a favor, if it is not to be regarded as an act of generosity on our part, then we had as well understand it.

Mr. WEEKS. I am speaking for myself entirely. I do not consider it a favor or an act of generosity; I consider such a condition an insult to the men who wore the blue.

Mr. JONES. Mr. President, just a word, and then I am through. This resolution, as I have said, was introduced to get the facts with reference to certain resignations and removals in the departments and in the Washington post office. Certain facts have been secured and others that were not in the report have been brought out here in the discussion. They show that certain soldiers were discharged; that, while they are set down in the record here as having resigned, those resignations were forced; and that many of these soldiers had a very high rating of efficiency at the time of their resignation or discharge. It appears also that we have a law, the spirit of which at least says that no soldier who is efficient shall be discharged, removed, or demoted; that this law was passed as late as 1912, and that it expresses the sentiment not only of Congress, but of the country.

I do not know anything about the politics of the men who have been discharged. I do not think there ought to be any politics in this matter. There was no politics in my mind when I introduced the resolution, and there will be no politics made out of it, so far as I am concerned, unless it is shown that the wrong which has been done them is not rectified, and I hope that the administration will rectify the wrong which, in my judgment, has been done these men without delay.

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Washington yield to the Senator from Colorado?

Mr. JONES. I yield.

Mr. THOMAS. I should like to inquire of the Senator, if he will permit me, whether he does not think that the basis of this whole thing is politics?

Mr. JONES. I do not think so. I am speaking for myself, and I want to say to the Senator that I had no idea of politics when I introduced the resolution. I know that when matters of this kind come up statements are sometimes made in the newspapers that are not in accordance with the facts; I know that things are represented that do not exist; I know that there are two sides to these questions; and I introduced this resolution simply to get the facts with reference to this matter, and, so far as I am concerned—and I speak for myself—at any rate I have not endeavored to make politics out of it. I do not want any politics in it. I simply want justice done to the men who helped save this country, and whom our Democratic friends, I believe and hope, honor just as much as I do, and who would do them an injustice just as unwillingly as I would. That is the spirit that animates me. This Nation can not pay the debt it owes these men. They gave of their youth in its defense, and it can not afford to deny them aid, help, and a competence in their hour of need.

Now, Mr. President, I ask that I may print in the RECORD section 4 of the act of 1912, and it will speak for itself.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, permission to do so is granted.

The section referred to is as follows:

SEC. 4. The Civil Service Commission shall, subject to the approval of the President, establish a system of efficiency ratings for the classified service in the several executive departments in the District of Columbia based upon records kept in each department and independent establishment with such frequency as to make them as nearly as possible records of fact. Such system shall provide a minimum rating of efficiency which must be attained by an employee before he may be promoted; it shall also provide a rating below which no employee may fall without being demoted; it shall further provide for a rating below which no employee may fall without being dismissed for inefficiency. All promotions, demotions, or dismissals shall be governed by provisions of the civil-service rules. Copies of all records of efficiency shall be furnished by the departments and independent establishments to the Civil Service Commission for record in accordance with the provisions of this section: Provided, That in the event of reductions being made in the force in any of the executive departments no honorably discharged soldier or sailor whose record in said department is rated good shall be discharged or dropped or reduced in rank or salary.

Any person knowingly violating the provisions of this section shall be summarily removed from office and may also upon conviction thereof be punished by a fine of not more than $1,000 or by imprisonment for not more than one year.

Mr. STONE. Mr. President, as the Senator from Washington has obtained permission to print the entire section 4 as a part of his remarks I will not make the same request, as I had intended to do, but I will call attention to the proviso in that section, as follows:

Provided, That in the event of reductions being made in the force in any of the executive departments no honorably discharged soldier or sailor whose record in said department is rated good shall be discharged or dropped or reduced in rank or salary.

That is the language of the proviso in the statute; so, clearly the impression which the Senator from Utah had and which he gathered from a newspaper from which he read is inaccurate.

I do not care to add more than a word or two to what I have said. The Senator from Washington [Mr. JONES] has disavowed any partisan purpose or thought in offering his resolution, and I accept his disclaimer. He has not made a partisan speech to-day; and that is in accord with what he declares to have been his purpose. The Senator from Utah [Mr. SMOOT] has injected a little more of the virus of partisanship into his observations. I agree with the Senator from Colorado [Mr. THOMAS] that this whole business was started and has been prosecuted, in the main at least, in the hope of deriving some partisan advantage from it. It has been exploited all through the country with that object in view.

There is one thing that makes it clear to my mind that partisanship is at the base of this propaganda. Old soldiers were discharged and demoted in salary and station under the administrations which preceded the present one, and no complaint was made here or by the people who started this noise around Washington and in the press. I have called special attention to the year 1911, when 15 veterans of the Civil War were demoted, one of them demoted twice during that year, or nearly twice as many soldiers as have been demoted during this entire administration. We did not hear anything about that. The Senator from Utah occupied a seat in this Chamber at that time, and so did the Senator from Washington. This was two and a half years ago or less. How did it happen that the Argus-eyed representatives of the Republican section of the press did not exploit that? How did it happen that Dr. Gleason and Mr. Gordon, of this city, and others cooperating with them in this city, did not then call public meetings to adopt resolutions of protest and denunciation? Not a word, however, was printed in the press or couched in resolutions or uttered in public speech; but when this administration, not in a department, but in a local post office, finds it necessary in the reorganization of its force in the interest of economy and better administration to separate from the service or demote fifty-odd employees, nine of them being ex-soldiers, a great uproar is started, and an effort made to impress the remnant of the old soldiers of the land with the idea that this being a Democratic administration they might expect the grossest injustice done them. To arouse prejudice, passion, and partisanship was the primary purpose of this movement, and, though Senators on the other side may say that they have no partisan feeling, when they stand here to defend what has been done on the outside, the color of partisanship is reflected on them.

Now, Mr. President, just a word more. When Mr. Cleveland went out of office as President of the United States it is a fact that practically every Democrat in the various departments of the Government was separated from the service or demoted, old soldiers included. I was told but a moment ago by a Senator that it was a fact within his knowledge that a number of old Democratic soldiers from his State, who had been given places in the public service during the Cleveland administration, were demoted on the incoming of the Republicans, to the end that Republican soldiers might be given their places. I am not complaining that that was done; I have never complained, and never will; but what I complain of is that if a Republican soldier found holding a position in any department of the Government is demoted and a Democrat put in his place we are accused of unfriendliness to the men who wore the blue and fought the battles of the Republic. Right here in the Senate, when Republicans got control some years ago, Democratic soldiers employed by the Senate were not demoted, but dismissed. Our friends who have spoken on the other side are not entirely ingenuous or disinterested. What are you trying to do, if you are not trying to make party capital out of this?

I do not like to hear men disclaiming a partisan purpose, with honeyed words and soft speech, while at the same time their words and conduct can have but one intelligent meaning, and that is to arouse partisanship.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. President, it has been nearly five decades since Jefferson Davis was captured, and the War between the States thereby terminated. This administration, a Democratic administration, has made a rule for admission into the public service under which no ex-Confederate soldier "need apply." Every one of them is barred by the age limit. The boy that entered the Confederate Army in 1862 at 14 years of age—and there were some of them—is barred by the age limit. The statute books bear an expression of preference for ex-Union veterans which must be obeyed.

The War between the States, five decades ago, has ended. At that time the States of these United States were separated into two independent groups. One group retained the old name, "The United States of America"; the other group assumed a new name "The Confederate States of America." The muse of history will never contemplate a picture equal to that of those two warring factions of the States, of those who stood by their States, because the northern soldier stood by Iowa and Massachusetts just as much as the southerner stood by Mississippi and Texas. There will be no picture of human valor, when the end comes, to equal that which both sides displayed. It is pitiable that now, five decades afterwards, men should seek to stir the embers of the old strife for pitiable, miserable, contemptible partisan advantage; and that, too, when there were more Federal soldiers dismissed and discharged and demoted under McKinley than under either Cleveland or Wilson.

It was a psychological problem. The Democratic Party had been accused of disloyalty, and it dared not discharge even inefficient Federal soldiers; whereas a man who had been major in the Federal Army, like Mr. McKinley, upon becoming President of the United States, could disport himself freely.

I wish to read a list of the men who were demoted, forced to resign, or discharged under the McKinley administration from March 4, 1897, to December 31, 1898; and after I have read it I hope this discussion will cease.

SOLDIERS AND SAILORS AFFECTED ADVERSELY FROM MARCH 4, 1897, TO DECEMBER 31, 1898.

Aspinwall, A. A., reduced from chief of division, $2,000 to $1,800.
Albert, A. D., reduced from principal examiner, $2,000 to $1,300.
Ake, W. S., reduced from $840 to $720.
Archer, J. W., reduced from $1,400 to $1,200.

These are chiefs of division as a rule.

Bell, H. C., resigned (?).
Bassett, George T., dismissed.

Every one of these is a Union soldier.

Bonorden, H. S., reduced from $1,400 to $1,300 to $1,200.
Boorom, C. R., reduced from $1,400 to $1,200.
Browa, Henry B., reduced from $1,400 to $1,300.
Buckley, J. D., reduced from $1,400 to $1,300.
Bliss, W. W., reduced from $750 to $720.
Britton, Wiley, reduced from $1,300 to $1,200.
Clayton, E. P.,* reduced from $1,000 to $900.
Clements, John T., reduced from $1,400 to $1,300.
Crosby, W. O., reduced from $1,300 to $1,200.
Chipp, Rodney, reduced from $1,400 to $1,300.
Clark, Eben E., reduced from $1,400 to $1,300.
Clark, John B., reduced from $1,000 to $900.
Davis, M. C., reduced from $1,400 to $1,300.
Davis, J. A., reduced from $1,400 to $1,300.
Davis, William P., reduced from $2,000 to $1,400.

They seem to have been a little hard on the Davises; I do not know why, particularly; perhaps because they are a good old Welsh family and because Jeff Davis bore the name.

Dick, J. M., dismissed.
Dungan, Irvine, dropped.

As I put these names in print Senators will notice that some of them bear the asterisk. The asterisk indicates that the men belonged to the Regular Army or Navy. The balance of them were volunteers.

Ellis, H. G., reduced; dismissed.
Elliott, Edward P., reduced from $1,400 to $1,200.
Erdman, Adolph, dropped.
Eager, J. H. L., reduced from $1,400 to $1,200.

Mr. Eager, as I am informed, was a member of the old Howard Eager family of Baltimore who kept the Star-Spangled Banner afloat when Key wrote about it.

Elliot, James H., reduced from $1,400 to $1,300.
Fleming, George B., dismissed.
Frisbie, W. R., reduced from $2,000 to $1,400.
Fuss, W. H., reduced from $1,300 to $1,200.
Fernald, George W., reduced from $1,400 to $1,300.
Fairbanks, Charles, reduced from $1,400 to $1,300.
Fawcett, Thomas R., dismissed.
Fierce, W. W., dropped.

Oh, I am not complaining about these things, Mr. President. I expect these men were inefficient from superannuation; but if a Federal major and a Republican President could afford, without hostile criticism, to do all these things, I say it is time for you to shut your mouths when you are talking about this administration.

Foote, J. M., reduced from $1,400 to $1,300.
Freeland, John J., reduced from $2,000 to $1,600 to $1,400.
Fritts, James R., reduced from $1,800 to $1,600 to $1,400 to $1,300.
Fairhurst, Jeremiah F., reduced from $750 to $720.
Gray, Thomas P., reduced from $1,200 to $900.
Gallenne, J. B.,* reduced from $1,000 to $900.

By the way, I happened to know something about him. He was in the Regular service, and had done remarkably good service, and he was reduced from $1,000 to $900.

Guernsey, A. W., reduced from $1,300 to $1,200.
Goldstein, Moses,* dismissed.
Gury, Louis C., reduced from $1,000 to $900.
Hanback, Charles, reduced from $1,600 to $1,400.
Harris, C. E., reduced from $1,300 to $1,200.
Hughes, William, reduced from $1,400 to $1,300.
Hale, James D., dismissed.
Halley, Noah W., reduced from $2,000 to $1,400 to $1,300.
Harding, A. C., dismissed.
Helpbringer, William H., dismissed.
Hersey, S. R., reduced from $2,000 to $1,800 to $1,400.
Harnit, J. N., reduced from $1,400 to $1,300.
Hoffiger, P. J., reduced from $1,300 to $1,200.
Hunter, A. J., reduced from $1,300 to $1,200; dismissed.
Hursh, E. G., reduced from $1,400 to $1,300.
Ingram, Thomas D., reduced from $2,000 to $1,400.
Jefferson, Ralph, reduced from $1,400 to $1,300.
Johns, L. E., reduced from $1,600 to $1,400.
Johnson, William L., dismissed; watchman.
Jones, F. C., dismissed.
Kennedy, James N., reduced from $1,400 to $1,300.
Kinney, A. T., reduced from $1,400 to $1,300.
Livingston, George S., reduced from $1,800 to $1,600.
Lucas, N. A., reduced from $1,400 to $1,300.
Lake, D. D., reduced from $1,400 to $1,300.
Lamson, H. P., reduced from $1,400 to $900.
Loomis, George C. dismissed.
Lake, D. D., reduced from $1,400 to $1,300.
Liverpool, W. H., reduced from messenger to assistant messenger.
Lowe, Heman, dropped.
McClain, Dow, reduced from $1,400 to $1,300.
Macy, W. W., reduced from $1,400 to $1,300.
Maxwell, E. H., reduced from $1,400 to $1,200.
Maxwell, H. P., reduced from $1,400 to $1,200.
Mays, Charles P., reduced from $1,400 to $1,300.
Miller, Martin B., reduced from $1,300 to $1,200.
Moler, Henry H., reduced from $2,000 to $1,300.
Melbourne, W. F., reduced; dismissed.
Martin, Henry T., reduced from $750 to $720.
Noble, P. S., reduced from $1,400 to $1,300.
Offley, Holmes E., dismissed.
Okey, C. W., reduced from $1,400 to $1,300.
Patterson, John S., dropped.

Patton, H. N., reduced from $1,400 to $1,300.
Perkins, H. E., reduced from $1,300 to $1,200.
Proctor, William H., reduced from $1,300 to $1,200.
Paine, John L., reduced from $1,400 to $1,300.
Palmer, A. B. P., dismissed.
Parkinson, E. C., reduced from $1,400 to $1,300.
Pearson, Samuel P., reduced from $1,800 to $1,600.
Peck, Fred C., reduced from $1,600 to $1,300.
Powell, Ransom T., reduced from $1,400 to $1,300.
Riley, John, dismissed.
Riley, Thomas F., reduced from $1,000 to $900.
Ribble, George T., reduced from chief of division, $2,000 to $1,200.

This was done for no reason that anybody has ever discovered, except that he was a Democrat.

Russell, Leonidas, reduced from $1,800 to $1,400.
Schuckers, William F., reduced from $1,400 to $1,300.
Shafer, Elias, reduced from $1,400 to $1,300.
Shanks, C. D., reduced from $1,400 to $1,300.
Sidman, George D., reduced from $1,400 to $1,200.
Smith, George M., reduced from $1,400 to $1,300.
Stibbs, J. H., reduced from $1,400 to $1,200.
Shoemaker, J. A., dismissed.
Slavens, Charles, reduced from $1,300 to $1,200.
Stockslager, T. A., reduced from $1,600 to $1,400 to $1,200.
Smith, Napoleon J., dismissed.

Even the name "Napoleon" could not save him under the Republican administration, he being a Democrat.

Smith, William, reduced from $2,000 to $1,400.
Sprague, F. H., reduced from $1,400 to $1,300.
Swaim, George M., dropped.
Schaffer, M. R., reduced from $1,600 to $1,400.
Stevens, C. A., reduced from $1,600 to $1,200.
Sues, O. L.,* reduced from $1,400 to $1,200.
Tansill, Charles F.,* reduced from $1,200 to $1,000.
Teicher, John G.,* dismissed.
Tegethoff, Anthony, reduced from $1,200 to $900.
Thompson, Charles W., reduced from $1,800 to $1,600.
Tierney, Matthew, reduced from $1,000 to $900.
Tyers, Frederick, reduced from $1,600 to $1,400.
Vail, Henry W., dropped.
White, William L., reduced from $1,600 to $1,200.
Wolston, J. R., reduced from $1,400 to $1,300.
Wright, Moses B. C., reduced from $2,000 to $1,800.

And that is not all, Mr. President.

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. MARTINE of New Jersey in the chair). Does the Senator from Mississippi yield to the Senator from Arizona?

Mr. WILLIAMS. I do.

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. As the Senator was reading the list of these many demotions and dismissals, I was wondering whether or not he knew the particular party to which those demoted or dismissed belonged?

Mr. WILLIAMS. I do not, except in a few cases that I have mentioned.

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. And I was wondering whether, amid all these demotions and dismissals, any ordinary or very loud complaints were made on the floor of the Senate by reason of them?

Mr. WILLIAMS. Not that I ever heard of.

Mr. President, I do not know the politics of these men, except in a few cases where I happened accidentally to know them. I do know, however, because I was serving in the other branch of Congress at the time, that a Democratic soldier stood no more chance under McKinley's administration than any other Democrat, as far as demotions were concerned. They dared not, as a rule, remove them outright, because there was a law expressing a preference; but in every department of this Government every chief of a division, whether an ex-Union soldier or not, if he were a Democrat, was removed and a Republican, whether an ex-Union soldier or not, took his place.

We are all Americans. The war is over, thank God, and it settled some things. Among other things that it settled was that these States were to continue as an indestructible union of indestructible States; and yet, under a national administration, there is a law upon the statute books giving the preference to ex-Union soldiers, and there is a rule of the departments cutting off all hope of public employment for ex-Confederate soldiers, both of them American soldiers, both of them fighting for a part of these United States.

It seems to me it is too late, and yet at the same time premature, and that it is wrong to indulge in a foul calumny against this administration to try to produce in the popular mind the impression that Woodrow Wilson is prejudiced against ex-Union soldiers. I could produce a much better case to prove him prejudiced against ex-Confederate soldiers—the rule of his departments.

Why, I recommended during this administration, for the office of assistant United States district attorney, a man who had been a Member of Congress, a man who had been a major in the Confederate army, a man who had borne along between the battle lines at Franklin—under God's providence, without losing anything except one finger—a command from Gen. Claiborne to Gen. Adams; and I was coolly told that he was "too old." The age limit affected not him alone, but all ex-Confederates. He had been an assistant United States district attorney under Cleveland, and he had borne himself splendidly in his position; but I was told that he was "too old." I said: "If he is too old, every man that wore the gray is too old. This man entered the Confederate service at 15 years of age." I begged for him; but my begging amounted to nothing. There was the rule.

I am not complaining. Perhaps he was too old. I do not think so. My friend the Senator from Michigan [Mr. SMITH] will remember him—Maj. Pat Henry, from Mississippi, who served with him and me in the House—and I think younger than either of us in spirit—but he was turned down. Yet you come up here now, at the last day, trying to calumniate Woodrow Wilson with the charge of prejudice against Federal soldiers. Why? Ah, because you know he was born in Virginia of southern parents, and you think, perhaps, the charge will take. You think perhaps people will think that that has influenced him to entertain prejudice against those who wore the blue.

He not only does not entertain that prejudice, but even I do not entertain it. If I knew the very man who shot and killed my father, I could shake hands with him and tell him that his duty was to shoot, and shoot true, and shoot right, and shoot a colonel, if he could, rather than a private. This attack on this Democratic administration is contemptible.

Mr. WORKS. Mr. President, I happen to be an old soldier myself, and as such I resent any effort on the part of a Republican or a Democrat to exploit old soldiers for political purposes. It is a pitiable thing to me that the names of these old veterans should be bandied about this Chamber for the purpose of securing some political advantage, either to Republicans or to Democrats.

The preference that has been given heretofore to old soldiers was not confined to Republican veterans or to Democratic veterans. The question whether they should be employed or retained in their positions as old soldiers should have nothing whatever to do with their politics, whether it be Republican or Democratic.

I have no means of knowing what reason there might have been for the discharge or demotion of the old veterans who have been referred to by the Senator from Mississippi. There may have been the best of reasons for taking that course. I do not know what may be the merits of the question of the discharge or demotion of the old soldiers in the post office here in Washington. It may have been entirely justified and in the proper exercise of the duties of the postmaster, so far as I know.

I have been surprised, however, at the position taken by the junior Senator from Indiana [Mr. KERN]. He says an old friend of his, maimed and crippled on the field of battle, appealed to him for a position here under the Senate. He was good enough to the incumbent to deny that request and continue in his place an old soldier who was a Republican; but he or his party retained the Republican old soldier upon a reduced salary. Now, if the Senator from Indiana can be held responsible for that course, he has committed two wrongs to two old soldiers. He has denied one of them employment here at the salary that had been theretofore allowed and has taken away a part of the salary from a Republican old soldier and given the higher salary to somebody else.

With all due respect to the Senator from Indiana, I say there is no justification for any such position as that. If the old soldier, whether he be a Democrat or a Republican, is competent and able to perform the duties of any position, he should be paid the salary that belongs to that position. To demote him or to reduce his salary, if he is able to perform the duties of his position, is an injustice; I do not care what his politics may be.

If the Senator from Indiana believes that under the political system that governs affairs here, I am sorry to say, he would have been justified in displacing the Republican veteran and putting in his place a Democratic veteran, that would have been infinitely more just than to deny one of them a position and reduce the salary of the other.

I regret exceedingly that politics should enter into the question of appointments of any of the employees of the Senate. The system itself is vicious and should be abolished. The idea of the Senate of the United States spending a large portion of this day, or any other, in discussing this question of place, upon political grounds, is an abomination.

I introduced only a short time ago, in an effort to correct this condition of things, a bill which provides for the appointment at the beginning of the term of a newly elected President of a commission to receive and pass upon all applications and recommendations for office, providing that that commission shall select the man believed to be the most competent and efficient for the place and recommend him to the President for appointment, and providing—and this, I think, is the best provision in the bill—that no Member of Congress or Cabinet member shall have the right to recommend or aid in securing the appointment of anybody to office. This is a legislative body. It should not be here doing politics at all. It should have nothing whatever to do with the selection of other public officials. It is no part of the duty of a Senator of the United States to do any such thing. The duty is imposed upon us of passing upon appointments made by the President, and it is inconsistent with that duty, on our part, that we should become the champions of anybody seeking appointment at the hands of the President.

I have felt that the Democratic Party has been unjust to the old soldiers now in its employ. The real spirit and purpose of the law preferring the old soldier has been violated. If the Democratic Party believes that it had a right under the system that prevailed here to appoint Democrats in places held by Republicans that would have been better than to have sent these old soldiers away into dark places and inferior positions. There is no justification for that course. The political system that prevails here does not justify it, but it has been done in a great many instances. The case that has been referred to by the Senator from Massachusetts of a doorkeeper sitting at that door receiving $1,800 and one sitting at this door receiving $840 is a palpable injustice. I do not care anything about what the politics of the two of them may be, because as a matter of fact we all know the duties of a doorkeeper at this door are greater and more onerous than of the one at the back door of the Chamber. I do not mean to say that the Democratic Party purposely and maliciously reduced the salary.

Mr. OVERMAN. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from California yield to the Senator from North Carolina?

Mr. WORKS. In just one moment. It reduced the salary of the doorkeeper here and retained the full salary to the doorkeeper there, and that has come about in some way which I say is unjust. Now I yield to the Senator from North Carolina.

Mr. OVERMAN. Perhaps some things ought not to be stated here on the floor as to the reasons which moved us in this matter. I think the doorkeeper at that door should thank his stars that he is there at all, because there are Republican Senators who think we did a kindly thing in keeping him at a lower salary.

Mr. WORKS. There is no justification——

Mr. OVERMAN. There are two sides to all these questions.

Mr. WORKS. I do not care what may have induced it, the injustice remains. I have no doubt in the world that many of these old soldiers are very glad to remain here at reduced salaries.

Mr. REED. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from California yield to the Senator from Missouri?

Mr. WORKS. I do.

Mr. REED. I think the Senator from California is too fair a man to select a particular instance and to leave the impression, intentionally or otherwise, that there has been a discrimination by Democrats that did not exist when the Republicans had control of this body. I wish to ask the Senator if it is not true that the Democrats since they came in control of the Senate have been just as generous to their political opponents who are now in the minority as the Republicans were to the Democrats when the Republicans were in the majority?

Mr. WORKS. Mr. President, I am not discussing this question on political grounds. I do not know whether the Senator from Missouri is right or wrong. It does not make the slightest difference to me whether the old soldier whose salary has been reduced is a Democrat or a Republican. That has nothing to do with it, in my estimation; but if the Democratic Party has reduced the salary upon that ground, then there is no justification for it, and if Republicans have reduced the salary or dismissed employees of the Senate because they were Democrats that was equally unjustifiable.

Mr. OVERMAN. May I ask the Senator a question?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from California yield to the Senator from North Carolina?

Mr. WORKS. I do.

Mr. OVERMAN. I wish to give the Senator one case where an ex-soldier was reduced who was thoroughly incompetent.

Mr. WORKS. I want to say I am not questioning that at all.

Mr. OVERMAN. The Senator says there was a man getting $1,800 and we reduced him to $840. He came to me and expressed his gratification that we kept him. The Senator does not complain of that.

Mr. WORKS. I have not complained.

Mr. OVERMAN. The Senator is very generous, and I am glad that he is an old soldier and has made the remark he has. They can be put against the remarks of some of the gentlemen who did not fight and would not have fought if they had been old enough to fight during the war. I am glad the Senator is in this Chamber. He is generous and kind. He was one of the old soldiers, and as an old soldier he has a kind feeling for the Confederate soldiers. That is the feeling of the old soldiers who fought on the same side the Senator did. It is only those who did not fight who are attacking them and seeking to make a political question out of it, and I say from the character of their remarks they would not have fought if they had been old enough. That is the kind of men who talk and rage in matters of this kind 50 years after the war. I have never seen an old ex-soldier of the Union yet who is not gracious and kind in his remarks about the Confederate soldier. When a man stands up in the Senate for political purposes on account of the Confederate soldiers I think it is contemptuous. I say I thank the old soldier on the Republican side for making the generous remarks he has made about these matters.

I happened to be on the committee, and I just want to cite an instance as to the old soldier who received $1,800 a year and who was reduced to $840. He admitted his incompetency, and he came to me and thanked me. The old soldier at the door there was reduced because he insulted the daughter of a Senator on this floor. We did not discharge that one from Massachusetts. All we did was to reduce him. If all the facts were known, there would not be this complaint made here on the floor. We have investigated the matter thoroughly. All these old soldiers are receiving pensions. Some of them could not do the work. We did the best we could to retain every one of them on the roll.

Mr. WORKS. I think I said in the beginning that where an old soldier was competent and able to perform the duties of the position his salary should not be reduced simply for the purpose of giving a place to somebody else who is receiving a higher salary.

Now, taking the case mentioned by the Senator from North Carolina, of course if an old soldier is incompetent and can not perform the duties of the position, he has no right to ask to be retained in the position; and if in the case mentioned he was given another position where he could perform the duties of that place, and was paid the salary that belonged to it, he might well be grateful; at least, he would have no reason to complain.

The question of the Confederate soldier has been mentioned here. Mr. President, I have shown by some remarks that I have made on the floor of the Senate on previous occasions that I have no animosity toward the Confederate veteran; none whatever. That question is not up here for discussion, except as it has been mentioned by the Senator from Mississippi. I know nothing about the number of Confederates who are employed. There is no reason why they should be excluded from employment simply because they are Confederate soldiers or because they come from the South. I have no sympathy with any feeling of that sort.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. President, I hope the Senator will understand that he was not excluded from employment because he was a Confederate soldier. He has been excluded from employment because of an arbitrary age limit that has been fixed which happens to cover all Confederate soldiers; that is all.

I wish to add, before I take my seat, that no one is more appreciative than I am of the broad, tolerant attitude which the Senator from California has always shown, bearing malice toward none and good will toward all in this country. If you think we do not appreciate it, you are mistaken. We appreciate it, and we realize it perhaps more than you do.

Mr. WORKS. That is very kind of the Senator from Mississippi. I hope I am able to keep my mind from prejudice or animosity toward any class of people. I try to do that, at least.

Mr. President, I should not have said anything on this subject, except that I do entertain some feeling about any discussion of this kind involving the old soldier when it takes on a political aspect. I do not like to think of the old soldier in connection with politics at all in any employment he may have, and I regret myself that there should have been any occasion for a discussion of this kind on the floor of the Senate.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, on yesterday the Senator from Michigan [Mr. TOWNSEND] presented a letter which he said was in the nature of a petition from the Cadillac Motor Co., and which afterwards he read into the RECORD, giving it his personal sanction. I would not advert to this matter at all if it were not for the fact that the RECORD is constantly being lumbered up with material like the Cadillac letter. This letter was put into the RECORD ostensibly as the expression of a business concern that had no interest in legislation except that which is common to all honest business.

Mr. President, in view of that fact, I want to ask the attention of the Senate for a few minutes to who and what the protestant in this particular instance is. If an honest business concern, honestly capitalized, honestly observing the law and having fair purposes, protests against a course of legislation, it may be well for Congress to hearken; but if the protest comes from the pen or the lips of a violator of the law, of a criminal who hates the law as it exists and yet fears that the law may be made even stronger, then we perhaps ought to regard the warning as an indication that Congress is proceeding in the right direction.

Now, what is the Cadillac Motor Car Co. that has the temerity to come here to the Senate with a statement such as is contained in this letter? What is it that it should undertake to lecture the President, to lecture Congress, to lecture the men who here under their sworn duty are doing the best they can as God gives them the light?

Mr. President, I have here Poor's Manual of Industrials for the year 1913. I looked for the "Cadillac Motor Car Co." in the index. The index referred me for information about the Cadillac Co. to the topic "The General Motors Co." It appears that the Cadillac Motor Car Co. no longer has an existence as an independent company. It has been absorbed by the General Motors Co. Turning to the General Motors Co., this is what Poor's Manual states:

It was incorporated September 16, 1908, in New Jersey, "as a holding company."

In other words, it is the latest and last word in the formation of a criminal trust. I read further:

Has acquired practically all of the capital stocks of the following companies engaged in the manufacture and sale of motor cars and parts.

Here follows a list of 26 companies, including the Cadillac. The list will appear later.

I observe also that the combination has already established branches in Europe. Evidently it is ambitious to become an international trust.

Now, this criminal trust, organized in defiance of the Sherman antitrust law, and which is out of place every day it is out of jail, has the temerity to lecture Congress, lecture the President, and lecture every man who seeks in any way to enact legislation that may interfere with its criminal career. When the organized gamblers, crooks, and blacklegs of the town denounce the prosecuting attorney for the enforcement of the law their denunciation is, in fact, a compliment; so also when a trust existing in violation of law denounces the administration and Congress for attempting to strengthen the trust statutes its denunciation is likewise a compliment. "No rogue e'er felt the halter draw with good opinion of the law."

I am willing for Congress to adjourn at an early date, but I am not willing that it should adjourn at the demand of corrupt business. I am willing to listen to the advice of all honest business, but I am not prepared to vote to adjourn Congress at the dictation of a hired man of the trusts. I am willing to adjourn and go home at an early date, but Congress will hardly consent to being kicked home by concerns that ought to be practicing "the lockstep."

The Cadillac Motor Co. is simply an integral part of the trust combination known as the General Motors Co.

This is the institution the Senator from Michigan brings here and tells us—

There is nothing in our country to warrant the present distress but a nation-wide distrust of Washington.

I think the thing "that warrants the present distress" is that criminals have seized great business institutions and, in violation of the law of the land, have proceeded to pile combination upon combination until they have become so powerful they can meet every attempt to arrest their aggressions with a total or partial paralysis of the general business of the country.

There may be something the matter with some of the business of the country, but the affliction does not appear to have reached this particular institution.

I read:

The net profits for 1912 of all the constituent companies, after deducting expenses of manufacture, including maintenance and depreciation, selling, and administration, as well as taxes, insurance, and interest on temporary loans, was $4,838,448.

So complete was the ownership of the subsidiary companies by the General Motors Co. that its proportion of the above profits was $4,746,756. The profits going to outside stockholders only amounted to $91,688. The fact that the General Motors Co. is a trust and combination in the form of a holding company is thoroughly demonstrated by the statement found at page 636, Poor's Manual of Industrials for 1913, which is as follows:

General Motors Co.—Incorporated September 16, 1908, in New Jersey as a holding company. Has acquired practically all of the capital stocks of the following companies in the manufacture and sale of motor cars and parts:

Buick Motor Co., Flint, Mich.; Cadillac Motor Car Co., Detroit, Mich.; Cartercar Co., Pontiac, Mich.; Champion Ignition Co., Flint, Mich.; Elmore Manufacturing Co., Clyde, Ohio; General Motors Co. of Michigan, Detroit, Mich.; General Motors (Europe) (Ltd.), London, England; General Motors Truck Co., Pontiac, Mich.; General Motors Export Co., New York, N. Transfer agent, etc.: Transfer agent, Corporation Trust Co., Jersey City, N. J.; registrar of stock, Equitable Trust Co., New York, N. Y.; stock dealt in on the New York curb market.

Dividends: Semiannual dividends of 3½ per cent each on the preferred stock were paid from April 1, 1909, to May 1, 1913, inclusive. A stock dividend of 150 per cent on the common stock was paid in common stock on November 15, 1909. Owing to change in dates of dividend payments from April 1 and October 1 to May 1 and November 1, a dividend of 4½ per cent (at rate of 7 per cent per annum) for the seven months to May 1, 1912, was paid May 1, 1912, to holders of record April 15, 1912.

Voting trust: A majority of the company's outstanding preferred and common stock has been deposited under a voting-trust agreement with James N. Wallace, Frederick Strauss, James J. Storrow, William C. Durant, and Anthony N. Brady, voting trustees. The voting trust is dated October 1, 1910, and runs to October 1, 1915, and until all of the 6 per cent notes described below at any time issued shall have been paid in full. The voting trustees may make earlier delivery at any time in their discretion. Transfer agent for voting-trust certificates, Central Trust Co., New York, N. Y.; registrar, Columbia-Knickerbocker Trust Co., New York, N. Y.; voting-trust certificates for both classes of stock listed on New York Stock Exchange.

NOTES OUTSTANDING MAY 1, 1913.

Thirteen million three hundred thousand dollars General Motors Co. of Michigan 6 per cent, first-mortgage, five-year gold notes, dated October 1, 1910; secured by a first mortgage upon all lands, plants and equipment, patents, etc., which the company then owned or shall hereafter acquire; trustee, Central Trust Co., New York, N. Y. Prior to the execution of this mortgage all real estate, plants, other fixed assets, and patents of the Buick, Cadillac, Olds, Oakland, Elmore, Northway, Peninsular, Rapid Motor, Reliance, Welch of Detroit, Welch Motor, Champion Ignition, Jackson-Church-Wilcox, Michigan Motor Castings, and Oak Park Power Cos. had been conveyed to the General Motors Co. of Michigan, so that through the pledge of these $13,300,000 first-mortgage notes with the trustee the 6 per cent first-lien notes are secured by a first lien upon all of those properties as well as by a first lien upon the capital stocks named.

Eleven million nine hundred and twenty-one thousand dollars 6 per cent first lien sinking fund gold notes, dated October 1, 1910, due October 1, 1915, interest April 1 and October 1 at the company's agency in New York, N. Y. Coupon bonds, $1,000; registerable as to principal. Subject to call as a whole or in part through sinking fund on any interest date at 102½ per cent and accrued interest. An annual cash sinking fund is provided, payable on or before October 1 in each year—$1,500,000 in 1911; $1,500,000 in 1912; $2,000,000 in 1913; and $2,000,000 in 1914—to be used to retire these notes through purchase at not exceeding 102½ per cent and interest or by drawing at that price. These sinking fund payments may be increased at the option of the company. Trustee, Central Trust Co., New York, N. Y. Secured by a first lien upon securities pledged with trustee, including the securities which constitute the entire interest of the General Motors Co. in subsidiary companies engaged in or directly connected with the motor car manufacturing industry. For statement of securities pledged see table preceding.

Authorized $20,000,000, of which $11,921,000 were outstanding May 1, 1913, after sinking fund payments of $3,079,000 had been applied, the remaining $5,000,000 can be issued from time to time only when approved by the board of directors and by finance committee.

While any of these notes are outstanding it is provided that none of said subsidiary companies, a majority of whose capital stocks is pledged thereunder, shall mortgage its properties or market or dispose of any bonds, notes, or other evidences of indebtedness maturing three months or more from date unless all such mortgage or other indebtedness is simultaneously acquired by the General Motors Co. and pledged with the trustee as further security for these notes; that if any such company shall incur any indebtedness other than for current operating expenses, or shall fail to pay indebtedness incurred for current operating expenses, then General Motors Co. will pay or acquire the same; also that none of such subsidiary companies shall issue any stock having preference or priority over the stock now pledged; also that if any company stock of which is pledged increases the present amount of its stock, the General Motors Co. must acquire and pledge, as further security for these notes, a proportionate amount of such increased stock as shall be required to preserve the percentage of the whole now held; also that while any of these notes are outstanding the company will not distribute in cash dividends on its common stock more than one-half of the net profits subsequent to October 1, 1910, applicable to such dividends, and that the net quick assets of the companies, as carefully defined, must always equal at least 133⅓ per cent of the amount of these notes outstanding plus an amount equal to the total cash dividends, if any, paid on the common stock. Listed on New York Stock Exchange.

Directors: Anthony N. Brady, J. H. McClement, Albert Strauss, Jacob Wertheim, New York, N. Y.; Edwin D. Metcalf, Auburn, N. Y.; Emory W. Clark, Andrew H. Green, jr., C. W. Nash, M. J. Murphy, Thomas Neal, Joseph Boyer, Detroit, Mich.; W. C. Durant, Flint, Mich.; James J. Storrow, Boston, Mass.; N. L. Tilney, Orange, N. J. Officers: Thomas Neal, chairman of board; C. W. Nash, president; Emory W. Clark, vice president; Standish Backus, secretary; James T. Shaw, treasurer; Thomas S. Merrill, assistant secretary and assistant treasurer; W. H. Alford, comptroller, Detroit, Mich. Office, Detroit, Mich.

An examination of the foregoing figures shows that this holding company owns substantially every dollar of the stock of all the companies. Referring especially to the Cadillac Motor Co., we find that it has $1,500,000 of stock, every dollar of which is owned by the General Motors Co.

So that it will be seen that the gentleman who wrote this letter denouncing Congress and ordering it home is simply a hired man of the trust. He does not even enjoy that doubtful dignity which attaches to the boss or even a director of a trust. He is an underling, a serving man, who serves a trust for a salary. I have no doubt he would not venture upon the subject of legislation without consulting his bosses; indeed, I apprehend in this instance he has merely carried out the demands of the trust magnates for whom he works. I suspect that every hired man who draws his weekly stipend from this trust has been ordered to write an epistle, expressing his independent righteous indignation at the wickedness of Congress in daring even to dream of passing statutes aimed at combinations in restraint of honest trade.

I challenge attention to the fact that this is not only a trust but it is an up-to-date concern, for you will observe in the statement in Poor's Manual, above quoted, that a majority of the trust's outstanding preferred and common stock is tied up in a voting-trust agreement, so that we have here a trust so airtight that even its stockholders are deprived of all control, the trust being in turn controlled by a voting trust.

Mr. President, this cold statement contained in Poor's Manual demonstrates beyond a peradventure to my mind that the Cadillac Motor Car Co. and all of the other subsidiary companies named in this table, a list of which I read, are simply parts of a trust organized in open defiance of the Sherman Antitrust Act. I am calling public attention to that fact. I am publicly directing the attention of the Attorney General of the United States to the fact, and am publicly asking him to investigate this concern and take the necessary steps to bring about its dissolution and punishment.

Here is an institution that comes in crying about poor business, and yet year before last its net profits were $4,447,146.58. Last year——

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Missouri yield to the Senator from Nebraska?

Mr. REED. Just as soon as I finish the sentence. Last year its net profits were $4,438,448. This criminal trust that is making over $4,000,000 a year comes here and undertakes to lecture Congress and the President and demands that Congress shall adjourn. Instinctively one recalls the ludicrous scene in the comic opera where outlaws demand, with great indignation, that the posse comitatus shall not be assembled, and resolve with much earnestness that the sheriff should go home and attend to his own business and let honest buccaneers proceed with theirs.

I now yield to the Senator from Nebraska.

Mr. NORRIS. Before I ask the Senator my question, I want to commend him for what he has just said in stating publicly that he calls the attention of the Attorney General to this trust. However, I want to suggest to the Senator that the other day when I undertook publicly to call attention to what I believe to be a violation of the Sherman antitrust law, and called the attention of the Attorney General to it by way of a resolution regarding a combination of railroads, the Senator himself was very strenuous in his objection and found fault with it, and he intimated that it was a reflection on the Attorney General to do it this way and that I ought to have done it by a private letter.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, the Senator entirely misapprehends the position I took. I do not intend to object, and I think nothing in my remarks as printed will show that I objected to directing the attention of the Attorney General to any matter. What I objected to was the method employed.

Mr. NORRIS. Now, I should like——

Mr. REED. Let me finish, and I will explain the difference to the Senator. The Senator brought in what purported to be a recitation of facts, and asked the Senate to adopt it as a true statement. Without being able himself to vouch for its correctness, he asked the Senate to solemnly make it of record that the facts were as set forth, and requested that the Senate demand from the Attorney General——

Mr. NORRIS. Why, Mr. President——

Mr. REED. Wait a moment—his opinion as to whether these alleged facts, which, if they were true, plainly showed a violation of law, were a violation of law. I said then, if the Senator was willing to assume responsibility for the facts, he should do so, and not ask the Senate to commit itself.

Mr. NORRIS. I was willing to assume that responsibility, and I called attention at the time——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. One moment. Does the Senator from Missouri yield to the Senator from Nebraska?

Mr. REED. I always yield.

Mr. NORRIS. I called attention to the fact then that the evidence upon which I based my statement was Poor's Manual, the very document the Senator from Missouri has offered here today in defense of his position; and I want the Senator from Missouri to understand, as I said in the beginning, that I am not criticizing the Senator for the position he takes; but I replied upon inquiry, either of the Senator from Missouri or some other Senator, in regard to what those facts were, that I had gathered at least a portion of them from Poor's Manual, and that another portion of them had been taken from an opinion rendered by the Interstate Commerce Commission. Although I was willing, when the Senator said there might be a doubt about these whereases, to amend the resolution even as he suggested, he said this could be nothing but notice to the Attorney General, and since he had had one notice, there would not be any use in giving him another, and it could be nothing but a reflection upon the Attorney General. The Senator, I think, used those very words. Now, because I was courteous enough to the Attorney General to first ask his opinion, it seems to me that I was more courteous than the Senator now is to take from Poor's Manual a statement of the facts and make the assertion, without any qualification, that this affair is a criminal trust.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, the Senator from Nebraska may entertain that opinion if he desires, but I say that the distinction between the Senator and myself is this: The Senator undertook to commit the Senate of the United States to a certain statement of facts, and then demanded from the Attorney General, by the United States Senate, an opinion upon those facts. I did not question the right of the Senator to rise in his seat and denounce in any way anything he saw fit as a criminal conspiracy. In that event he would be taking the responsibility himself and would be within his rights. I am doing that now; I am taking the full responsibility of calling the attention of the Attorney General to the situation as it is laid out in this book.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan rose.

Mr. REED. Just one moment. I do not question, and I never have questioned, the Senator's right to do that. The Senator, however, sought to do something more; he sought to commit the Senate to a statement of fact and to commit the Senate to a demand for a legal opinion, which is a very different thing from what I am now doing.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Missouri further yield to the Senator from Nebraska?

Mr. REED. Yes.

Mr. NORRIS. Is not the Senator from Missouri seeking now to commit the Attorney General?

Mr. REED. I am not seeking to commit him. I am committing myself to a statement; I am making it publicly; and the Attorney General must take notice of it or not, as he sees fit.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Missouri yield to the Senator from Michigan?

Mr. REED. I do.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. I hope when the Senator from Missouri calls the attention of the Attorney General and of the President to this conspiracy, this combination in restraint of trade—the General Motors Co.—that he will also call their attention to the fact that that company was organized under the laws of New Jersey, when Woodrow Wilson was governor, or it continued to maintain its organization after he became governor, and not a step has been taken to repeal the law under which they are organized. Perhaps that will help in some way to clarify the situation.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, that is about as logical as it would be if a man indicted for stealing horses were to plead that the indictment ought to be quashed because on the date of the larceny Woodrow Wilson was governor of New Jersey.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Well, Mr. President, we will dismiss the question that he was governor of New Jersey. This institution was legalized under the laws of New Jersey, and not under the laws of Michigan.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, the laws of New Jersey were passed in the good old Republican days——

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. And retained.

Mr. REED. When a Democrat scarcely dare show his head above the surface; passed in the good old days when the Republican Party of New Jersey held to the doctrine that the more trusts we had and the bigger they were the better it was for New Jersey and all the rest of the world. In those good old days before the Progressive had lifted his voice to disturb the equanimity and sanctity of the old Republican household, before the Democrats had become powerful enough to in any way disturb the vested interests; in those good old days when your Hannas and Rockefellers and Morgans and Perkinses and Guggenheims and other high priests of the trusts were bossing the Republican Party, when you were passing laws that were made by "the interests" in the interest of "the interests," you put upon the statute books of New Jersey a great many wicked laws, and among others this law. The particular trust I am discussing was incorporated in 1908. Was Woodrow Wilson the governor of New Jersey at that time? Surely not.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. He has been since then, and had a legislature of his own political party. He could have repealed any law in the State of New Jersey.

Mr. REED. But he could not have repealed the charters that had been granted by a previous legislature.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. The Senator from Missouri is not speaking with his usual accuracy when he charges that these laws were passed by a Republican legislature. That is not the case. The Senator from Missouri will be unable to verify his statement. The laws could have been changed; you had plenty of Democratic authority to change them; and organizations are being made from day to day in New Jersey, and were all during the times that Democrats were dominant in the affairs of that State.

Mr. REED. The most you can say for the Senator's argument is that I ought not to have denounced this concern as a criminal conspiracy and a trust because Woodrow Wilson, as governor of New Jersey, did not choke it to death.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. No, Mr. President; but the Senator from Missouri and his party have been in control of Congress for some time; they have had the Attorney General's department; and they have not seen fit to level any of their guns against this company as yet. This company has been in existence, its status has been known, and it needs no defense at my hands. It is one of the most honorable and upright in its management of any of the institutions of our State. Its products and the products of its labor and its genius are the pride of our Commonwealth; and it little becomes the Senator from Missouri to charge this concern with being a conspiracy, and a criminal conspiracy, when for over a year the Attorney General has rested securely in the impression that it was a lawful and legitimate business in the country.

Mr. REED. Ah, Mr. President, the trouble has been this: There are too many men in high places like the Senator who has just spoken, who rise and proclaim the high and honorable mission of criminal trusts.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Oh, Mr. President, everybody proclaims the efficiency of the Cadillac motor car, and even the Senator from Missouri has made his campaigns in that State in that car.

Mr. REED. The Senator is mistaken——

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. The Senator has done it many times.

Mr. REED. The Senator from Michigan is mistaken about my making my campaigns in that car; but I will admit that the Cadillac motor car is probably a very good car.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Yes; but the Senator——

Mr. REED. But I am not aware of the fact that the question of whether the Cadillac motor car runs smoothly has anything to do with whether the Cadillac Motor Car Co. runs honestly and in accordance with law.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Or whether Mr. Henry M. Leland, who sent the communication presented to the Senate yesterday by my colleague [Mr. TOWNSEND], has a perfect right, as any other citizen has, to memorialize Congress.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, I am going to bring the Senator from Michigan back to just the point that he has been avoiding by this pleasantry about my riding in a Cadillac motor car.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. I will withdraw that, if it is offensive to the Senator.

Mr. REED. It would be no discredit to ride in a Cadillac motor car. In truth, if this concern keeps on growing and absorbing, in a little while we will all be riding in some of its cars, if we ride at all

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. You will be sure of getting to your destination if you do that. [Laughter.]

Mr. REED. Possibly; and if the proprietors of that concern, of that trust, are allowed to act as the chauffeurs of the Republican Party, they will land the Republican Party inside their works, and they will also be sure to land all of their friends back here in the Senate.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Mr. President, if there are any of those who make Cadillac motor cars out of employment now, I think we may safely look to them to defend our party principles in the next campaign. They are high-grade, high-class men.

Mr. REED. Ah——

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. The Senator from Missouri knows that their car is efficient.

Mr. REED. Why, certainly.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. And their management is efficient; and if they are organized in defiance of law, let the Department of Justice call attention to it.

Mr. REED. The Senator says the car is efficient, and therefore these men are good men. He reminds me of a gentleman keeping a faro bank who insisted that his bank——

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. I protest, Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. One at a time, Senators.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. I protest against this comparison.

Mr. REED. Was mechanically accurate, and that therefore he was violating no law.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. I protest. That may be proper in debate in Missouri, but it ought not to be indulged in in the Senate. I protest against any comparison of that kind.

Mr. REED. I would not offend my friend for anything in the world, but the comparison exactly illustrates the lack of logic in what he says.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Let us let the logic go.

Mr. REED. I was discussing, Mr. President, the question of whether this organization was a trust, running in violation of the law, and the Senator seeks to divert the question to one as to whether the Cadillac car runs well or does not run well; and I say it reminds me exactly of a man who would insist that his roulette game ought not to be interfered with because the balls roll smoothly and the bearings are well greased and the wheel does its business effectively. [Laughter.]

Mr. President, the Senator says that this concern has not been prosecuted; that it has existed for many years and has not been prosecuted. I grant that. It has existed now for some 14 or 15 or 16 months under the present Attorney General without being prosecuted; but prior to that time, from 1908 until Woodrow Wilson was inaugurated, it existed under Republican Attorneys General and was not prosecuted. The fact that it has or has not been prosecuted does not settle the question that it is a combination in restraint of trade, a combination organized in the teeth of the statute.

I want to read a telegram that has been sent to me:

FLINT, MICH., June 5, 1914.

Hon. JAMES A. REED,
United States Senate, Washington, D. C., U. S. A.:

I notice in the morning press dispatches that there was read in the Senate yesterday a letter from Mr. Henry M. Leland, of the Cadillac Motor Co., Detroit, Mich., in which the writer indicates that there is business depression existing, and painting a mournful tale as to conditions generally and charging such an alleged situation to Congress. Mr. Leland is a man of high character, and his business and personal honor is unquestioned. It is, however, interesting to note that this is the same Mr. Leland whose name appeared in connection with protected manufacturers upon a full-page advertisement which was run quite generally in Michigan newspapers in October, 1912, about 10 days before election. These signed advertisements were scare proclamations, intended to inflame, intimidate, and frighten the voters, and especially the laboring men, by the prediction that unless Mr. Taft were elected President ruin would result. That such roorback methods have no influence is clearly shown by the fact that Mr. Taft carried only two small States, Utah and Vermont. An important feature, however, bearing upon Mr. Leland's endeavor to get nation-wide publicity to his assertions as to business depression is the fact that the corporation with which he is connected, the General Motors Co., a holding company, of which the Cadillac and Buick are the two leading subsidiary companies, shows an advance in the market price on its stock of nearly 300 per cent during the past year and an advance of 100 per cent within the past six months. To make this clear, let it be understood that General Motors preferred advanced from 55 to 95, and this is based upon actual earnings and profits. The Buick Co. have manufactured and actually sold and received the cash therefor an output for 1914 models of 32,000 pleasure cars and 1,500 commercial cars, being the largest year in its history, and the outlook for 1915 is so promising that plans have been made and some contracts for material let upon a basis of 40,000 cars. Detroit, Mr. Leland's home city, is one of the most prosperous cities in the world—more building, increased bank deposits, everything flourishing, notwithstanding the thousands of dollars paid out during the 1912 campaign for the full-page advertisements bearing Mr. Leland's name predicting dire disaster. Does Mr. Leland claim that the business depression in Canada and some other nations is due to the United States Congress? That President Wilson's program may be carried out and constructive legislation enacted along the lines of his recommendation is the earnest hope of a great majority of the American people.

EDWIN O. WOOD.

Edwin O. Wood is a Democrat; he is the Democratic national committeeman from that State. And the Senator from Michigan will, I think, say that Edwin O. Wood is a man of the highest character.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Mr. President, lest my silence might be construed as disagreement with the statement of the Senator from Missouri, I want to say, without any qualification whatever, that Mr. Wood is a man of the highest character, a man of fine attainments, one of my warm personal friends, and I commend the statement which he has made to the Senator from Missouri. It indicates at least that there is one branch of industry in that State that has not yet suffered the blight of Democracy.

Mr. REED. Yes, Mr. President; there is one branch of industry that has not suffered the blight. This great concern, making last year nearly $5,000,000 net, this concern, the stock of which has advanced 300 per cent within the last 18 months, this concern, which is a criminal combination organized in defiance of law, which is extending its business and multiplying its profits, comes here to the Senate of the United States and says to it, "Lift your hand if you dare; enact any legislation that will stop us in our marauding expeditions at your peril. We proclaim that you are destroying the country."

Mr. President, we are going "to have it out" with concerns of this ilk pretty soon—if I may be pardoned a common slang expression. We are going to determine in the near future whether or not the criminal trusts have become so potential that their mere threats can compel Congress to adjourn and their wrath can arrest the powers of the Federal Government.

It has been said often here that some of these concerns were organized in the State of New Jersey. How does that fact answer the charge that they are engaged in criminal practices? It is a sad truth that the wise laws of many States of the Union have been practically nullified by the fact that under the interstate-commerce provision of the Constitution a corporation organized in one State can do business in another, and, consequently, that while many of the States have passed statutes limiting the capital of corporations and making other wise provisions, all these safeguards enacted by various States have been rendered nugatory by the conduct of certain other States in granting corporations franchises without limit as to capital and without any other proper limitation.

My own State for many years had upon its statutes a provision that a corporation could not be organized with a greater amount of capital than $15,000,000, unless it were a corporation engaged in operating a railroad. That statute was rendered null and void, so far as its effectiveness was concerned, by the existence of other States where there was no such limitation, and by the fact that being there organized corporations could enter my State where the limitation existed and do business, although they could not have received a Missouri charter.

The fact that the General Motors Co. was organized under the laws of New Jersey does not change the situation. If it was wrong to organize it in New Jersey, the fact that Woodrow Wilson in his short term as governor was not able to wipe out all of the wrongs and iniquities existing does not give the trust a clean bill of health. We must none the less meet the question and settle it upon its merits.

What I am at this time particularly calling attention to is the startling fact that a criminal trust, its pockets bulging with profits, gained in violation of law, coolly comes to the Congress of the United States and, in effect, orders Congress to adjourn, attaching to the demand the implied threat that big business will injure the country if Congress does not obey its commands.

The demand we have of this automobile trust is couched in language calculated to impress one with the fact that impudence frequently characterizes criminality.

Mr. President, while I am on my feet, and since the Senator has said "here is one concern that has not yet been wrecked," I call attention to one other matter. We have been repeatedly told here from the other side of the Chamber that nearly every business house in the United States is being closed up; that ruin and desolation are stalking across the earth; that the bats are now roosting in all of the workshops where once the music of labor delighted the ear; and we are told at the same time that prices have not been reduced a penny. It was stated here only the other day that there never has been any reduction in prices. Of course, it is a little difficult for a man to understand why a factory that can get the same prices now that it got three years ago should shut down; why it would not keep on running if its prices were just as high.

It is a little hard to understand how a man who is selling an article at a given price and making money, and his entire plant is buzzing and humming and whirling with industry, should shut that plant down as long as the prices stay just where they were. So, it is a little hard to understand, if prices have stayed up, why all the great factories of the country should be closing down. The truth is prices have been lowered and the factories have not shut down.

I want to put into the RECORD part of a letter from the National Cloak & Suit Co., of New York. I do not see on the floor the Senator from Utah [Mr. SMOOT] or the Senator from Rhode Island [Mr. LIPPITT]. They could tell us all about the various samples of cloth which are attached to this letter; but here they are [exhibiting]. I will ask to print the letter without reading it, except an excerpt or two, which I will take the liberty of reading:

Answering the above, we would say that the tariff has been the cause of reducing prices on woolens by the yard, and this will in turn enable the manufacturer of garments to give a better piece of material in a garment at fixed retail price than he did a year ago, or to sell the same garment he made a year ago at a lower price.

The letter then goes on to take up the question of woolens, which is the business in which this concern is engaged.

Here are these samples. I can not tell you what kind of goods they are, but they look like pretty good woolen goods. Here is a sample that was sold last year at $1.32½ a yard, which is now being sold at $1.02½. Another sample which was sold last year at $1.37 a yard is now being sold at 87½ cents. Another sample which was sold last year at $1.30 is now being sold at 97½ cents. Another sample which was sold last year at $1.45 is now being sold at $1.02½, and another sample which was sold last year at $1.37 is now being sold at 98¾ cents. All of these samples are attached to the letter of this large concern. While I can not give the technical names, the various samples are all of various worsteds.

I call attention now to the Journal of Commerce and Commercial Bulletin, under date of January 13. That is a good way back. I am introducing this to show that at that early period there was a reduction in prices, that it was general, and that all this talk to the effect that there has been no reduction of prices has been in the face of the published price lists since January, 1914.

The anxiously awaited prices on staple men's wear serges for fall 1914 delivery were made yesterday by the American Woolen Co.—

Certainly a very large concern—

The prices named showed sharp concessions from the figures made a year ago, but the downward revisions announced by the leading factor were by no means so great as to disturb the market unduly. The figures decided upon for the next heavyweight season were about what buyers generally anticipated. The reductions ranged from 10 cents to 37½ cents a yard compared with the opening quotations for the fall 1913 season.

The greatest cut was made on the Wood serge style No. 9118–010. This cloth, which was $2.10 a year ago, was dropped to $1.72½. On cloths that were priced last July for spring 1914 only slight changes were made.

I shall not read all of the article, but I shall ask to insert it.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, that may be done.

The balance of the article referred to is as follows:

Serge No. 3194, one of the leading fabrics made in the Fulton Mill, was reduced from $1.37½, the price named last July for spring 1914, to $1.35. That the price of this cloth would be $1.35 was foreshadowed in these columns a couple of weeks ago.

Serge No. 3844, which was reduced from $1.82½ to $1.62½ last July, was lowered 7½ cents, making the total reduction on this number 27½ cents a yard during the past year. Two of the unfinished worsteds made in the Washington Mill were reduced 30 cents and 35 cents a yard. Ayer serge No 1814–44 was reduced from $1.55 for fall 1913 to $1.25.

The reductions made by H. W. T. Mail & Co., which ranged from 27½ cents to 45 cents a yard, compared with the fall 1913 prices, were the talk of the market. Patterson & Greenough reduced Waterloo serges and unfinished worsteds about 12½ per cent. Metcalf Bros. & Co. made no prices on Wanskuck serges, and it was announced that quotations would not be ready for a week or 10 days. S. Slater & Sons (Inc.) will make serge prices later in the week. At the office of the George H. Gilbert Manufacturing Co. it was stated that prices would not be named yesterday. The Coronet Worsted Co. expected to be ready about the end of the current week. The United States Worsted Co. serges will be opened to-day.

According to reports current in the market, the advance business booked on staple worsteds is substantial, and the indications point to a very satisfactory application during the season, in spite of the foreign lines that are being offered. It is apparent that domestic factors are determined to keep the staple worsted business in this country, but it is stated that this was possible only because of the low prices named, which, it is contended, are the closest ever made.

The advance orders placed late last week, coupled with the contracts accepted yesterday by the largest worsted corporation, were reported to be up to all reasonable expectations.

Fancy worsteds were also opened by the American Woolen Co. The lines shown by department 2 comprised fancy piece dyes with silk decorations, silk mixtures, skein dyes, vigoureux mixtures, and compound mixtures.

Those in charge of the selling end of the company declined to give out any information as to prices for the next heavy-weight season on goods of this description, but it was learned from other sources that the quotations were relatively as low as those made on staples.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Missouri yield to the Senator from Utah?

Mr. REED. I do.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. Are these wholesale prices that the Senator is quoting?

Mr. REED. They are prices that are made by the American Woolen Co. in this particular instance; yes.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. They are wholesale prices?

Mr. REED. Oh, yes.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. Can the Senator tell us whether or not there has been any decrease in the price of clothing? That is, can a man go to a clothing store here and buy clothing cheaper than he could a year ago?

Mr. REED. Undoubtedly. I have just introduced a letter from a manufacturer on that subject. I think the Senator was not here at the time.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. I am speaking of the retail price of a single suit of clothes.

Mr. REED. Yes.

Mr. LANE. Mr. President, if the Senator goes to a tailor for a suit I think he will find that the tailors are selling the same quality of suits for less than they did last year.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. I shall have to call that to the attention of the tailor I patronize, then, because I have not been able to get a lower price.

Mr. LANE. I think it would be a wise thing for the Senator to do.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. President, if the Senator will pardon me, the Senator from Utah is too high-toned and aristocratic.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. Oh, no.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Probably his tailor will not make a reduction; but if he belonged to the ordinary Democrats of the country and bought his clothes from the shelf in a ready-made clothing store, he could go down in Washington to-day and discover that there had been a reduction, especially in blue serges and summer light woolen underwear.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. I will say to the Senator that I patronize a very good tailor, but——

Mr. WILLIAMS. While I am on my feet I want to say something further on this point. My boy came to me lately and said: "Papa, I want $4. I want to buy a straw hat. I want a hat just like I had last summer, and that is what it cost." I gave him the $4, and he came back to me later and gave me back 75 cents, and said: "The man is selling them cheaper this year, and he told me it was on account of the tariff." [Laughter.] Now, I do not know whether the man meant that or not, but he was selling the hat 75 cents cheaper just the same.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. It was due to a shortage of customers.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. I will say to the Senator from Mississippi that that has not been my experience. While I patronize a very good tailor, if the Senator from Missouri will yield to me just a moment——

Mr. REED. Yes.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. I am rather modest in my tastes. I have not been in the habit of buying high-priced clothing or high-priced anything else, but I have been unable to get better prices for the things that I bought than I did a year ago.

Mr. WILLIAMS. The Senator never will get better prices from an exclusive tailor.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. I paid the same price for a straw hat that I did a year ago. I paid a little more for shoes. I find, on the whole, that the things I buy at retail are about the same.

Mr. WILLIAMS. If the Senator will just join the holy army of men that God created with such perfection of physical form that they can be fitted at a ready-made clothing store, the Senator will find out that the goods are cheaper. [Laughter.]

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Missouri yield to the Senator from Utah?

Mr. REED. Oh, yes.

Mr. SMOOT. If the goods are sold by the manufacturer to the clothing man 10 cents a yard cheaper than they were last year, inasmuch as it takes 3¼ yards to make a suit of clothes, that would be 32½ cents on the suit of clothes; and I do not think the Senator himself will claim that the retailer is going to sell a $15 suit of clothes for $14.67½. Those are the absolute facts, Mr. President, and that is where you have to come in order to arrive at whether or not the ultimate consumer buys a suit of clothes cheaper.

I wish to say another thing to the Senator right in that connection. If the cloth of which he speaks costs $1.10, even if it took 3½ yards to make a suit of clothes, all the cloth in the suit of clothes would cost would be $3.85. Now, it is not in the price of the cloth. The cloth that the Senator's suit is made of, for which they charge him $55 here in Washington, will not cost more than $4.85 to $5. It is not in the price of cloth. There is hardly any cloth that ever costs more than 97½ cents a yard. Years ago it did not cost any more than that, and the Senator has quoted the prices of it to-day. There are only 3½ yards in a suit; and I want to say to the Senator that a difference in price of 10 cents a yard to the retailer makes no difference in the retailer's price.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. President, I should like to ask the Senator from Utah a question.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Missouri yield to the Senator from Mississippi?

Mr. REED. Oh, yes.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Has the Senator from Utah definitively surrendered his old war cry that the country was to be immediately ruined by ruinously low prices?

Mr. SMOOT. Why, I do not know what the Senator refers to, I am sure. I have not had any such war cry, nor uttered it upon this floor.

Mr. WILLIAMS. But I remember, Mr. President, when we had the tariff bill under discussion, that the Senator from Utah said that we were to be flooded by goods of foreign production at such ruinously low prices that American industry would have to come to a stock-still status. Now, I want to know, merely for my own information, whether or not the Senator from Utah has surrendered that contention, because he seems to me to be making an entirely different contention now.

Mr. SMOOT. Oh, no, Mr. President; the Senator from Mississippi does not understand, or will not understand, what the Senator from Utah has said in the past, or his position.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Oh, I beg the Senator's pardon; it is not a matter of will at all. If I do not comprehend it is out of inability, not out of unwillingness at all.

Mr. SMOOT. Let the figures speak as to whether there is not a great increase of importations.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, I am not going to yield for any such discussion as this.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Missouri declines to yield.

Mr. REED. It has not anything more to do with the question we are discussing at this moment than the story of the fall of Sodom and Gomorrah has to do with the Constitution of the United States. I yielded to the Senator and gave him full time to talk about the matter I am talking about. The question of how many goods are being imported or exported has not anything to do with the question of prices, not the least.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, I did not ask the Senator to yield, nor do I ask him now to yield. The Senator from Mississippi asked me a question, and I proceeded to answer it, but out of the wonderful and unbounded courtesy of the Senator I shall not do so.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, let me not be put in that sort of light.

Mr. SMOOT. I was not asking the Senator to yield to me.

Mr. REED. I gave the Senator full opportunity to ask me any question he wanted to ask. He got into a controversy with the Senator from Mississippi.

Mr. SMOOT. No; I did not get into any controversy at all.

Mr. REED. As long as they were talking about something that bore a faint, infinitesimal resemblance to the question I was talking about, I was willing to follow them, but I am not willing to go at this moment into the question of what the exports and imports of the country are. I am willing to take that up and discuss it as a separate proposition.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator declines to yield.

Mr. LIPPITT. Mr. President——

Mr. REED. I want for a moment now to reply to the Senator from Utah on a suggestion he made. When I am through with that I shall gladly yield to my friend from Rhode Island.

I have heard the threadbare argument that if you reduce the factory price of the goods the reduction never reaches the ultimate consumer until I think it will at least relieve me to say what I think about it. The argument is bottomed upon the idea that the cost of the raw material entering into a suit of clothes or into a dress has nothing to do with the cost of the garment. I utterly deny that. I deny that it is based upon fact or that it can be sustained by common sense. I deny that if the cloth going into a suit of clothes costs $2 per yard, and it is reduced to $1 per yard, some of that benefit does not in the long run reach the ultimate consumer.

Of course the Senator loves to take the cloth and say there are so many yards of cloth, and if you reduce it 25 cents a yard that ruins the manufacturer, does not enrich the middleman, and leaves the ultimate consumer just where he was before, and anyway that it is so small a sum that it amounts to nothing; but the Senator can not maintain the position that the cost of the raw material entering into a suit of clothes does not have something to do with the price of the suit of clothes.

In addition to the cloth, of which the Senator speaks, buttons, thread, lining, and a dozen or twenty other things enter into a suit of clothes. If you reduce that cost by 25 per cent it amounts, on a first-class suit of clothes, to several dollars. On a very cheap suit of clothes it amounts to a few dollars. It is utterly ridiculous to say that some benefit does not flow on down to the ultimate consumer. If that be not true, if the Senator's logic were carried to its ultimate conclusion, it would amount to this—that if you doubled the price of all the raw materials entering into a garment the price of the garment would still stay the same; if you made it four times as great, the price of the garment would still stay the same to the ultimate consumer; or if you divided it by four, the price would remain the same. I deny the soundness of that proposition. That argument is devoid of sense.

I desire now to call attention, at the point where I was interrupted, to the fact that not only the American Woolen Co. but other companies have marked down their prices.

Mr. LIPPITT rose.

Mr. REED. I promised to yield to the Senator from Rhode Island, and I gladly do so.

Mr. LIPPITT. Mr. President, before the Senator from Missouri leaves the case of the American Woolen Co., which he has been describing, I should like to know whether he has there any figures which show the result of the reductions he has been talking about upon the American Woolen Co. itself. I think those figures are quite instructive. They were published in the paper a short time ago. I have not a copy of the article, but I have a very distinct recollection of the statement in its broad lines.

Of course the Senator understands that the American Woolen Co. is a very large corporation, employing a very large amount of capital and a very large number of operatives. The result of this statement was that for the last year, as the result of these tariff changes, where the American Woolen Co. had been averaging a profit of about $3,000,000 a year, it showed for that year a loss of $800,000.

Mr. REED. For what year?

Mr. LIPPITT. I think it was the year ending last January.

Mr. REED. But, Mr. President, the Senator must know that these prices, made only last January, could not have caused a loss the year before.

Mr. LIPPITT. If the Senator will pardon me just one moment, in addition to showing this enormous loss, they were only enabled to employ from 50 to 60 per cent of the number of operatives they had been in the habit of employing.

We have heard a great deal from the Senator's party about what was going to be done to gentlemen who said they were injured by the tariff. Here is a report in cold figures of a corporation which for years under a Republican tariff had been averaging a little profit on the capital it had invested, and as the result of putting into operation this Democratic tariff it has been obliged to throw a very large number of its employees entirely out of employment and shows a very large loss on the capital that is invested in its business.

There is no mystery about the cause of the present business conditions in this country. The case of the American Woolen Co. is fairly representative. I think that if, as a result of that, there is some fraction of a cent saved on a suit of clothes, and it is done at a cost to the business of results that will make it impossible to continue the business if the results continue, there is something that the Senator ought to consider on that side of the question.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, I am glad the Senator has interrupted me to make this statement, because it throws a flood of light upon all of the criticisms that are now being put forward by those who are willing to wreck the finances of the United States if they can gain a little political advantage out of it; who would bring on a panic to-morrow, and do it gladly, if by that panic they could return themselves to power.

The Senator has told us that last year the American Woolen Co. was obliged to cut down its dividends; that it not only failed to make a profit last year, but that it suffered a loss last year; and yet all of that occurred the year before the tariff bill was passed by Congress, and it is charged up here now to the tariff.

Mr. LIPPITT. What was the date when the tariff bill was passed by Congress?

Mr. REED. The woolen schedule went into effect on the 1st of last January.

Mr. LIPPITT. Does the Senator suppose for a minute that business is conducted on the basis of not taking account of the results that are going to occur and the laws that are going to be put in force? The facts of the case are that for years under a Republican tariff that business was conducted at a reasonable profit; and the facts of the case are that the instant the Senator's ideas of tariff legislation are put into effect the operatives are thrown out of employment, and the legitimate profit on the capital disappears.

Mr. REED. In other words, they charged up a loss a year in advance. The law did not go into effect until last January, but they anticipated the loss and charged it up, and charged it to the woolen schedule which had not yet gone into effect. That is the logic of the Senator.

Mr. LIPPITT. The Senator talks about anticipating a loss, but this loss actually occurred.

Mr. REED. And they also discharged the employees a year before they even knew what the woolen tariff would be. Now, then, I think that points a moral and adorns a tale. I have not the slightest doubt that some of these protected industries would gladly close their mills for a year if they could force the American people to bow down once more and worship them and the theory out of which they enriched themselves.

The Senator makes the astonishing statement that a year before the tariff law was enacted this company suffered a loss, and that the loss is chargeable to the fact that a year afterwards a tariff bill was enacted. And yet, Mr. President, that is exactly the sort of evidence being manufactured and studiously urged against the tariff. If at the time the tariff bill was enacted there was anywhere an institution on its last legs; if it was doomed to certain death by its own diseased condition; if gangrene, beginning at the toes, had eaten clear up to the heart; if its arteries were drained dry by the rascality of its officers; if the coffin was, in fact, ordered when the tariff bill was passed, nevertheless the death is blamed on the tariff. But this is the first time I have known a Senator to assert that we ought to blame on the tariff a loss that occurred a year before the tariff bill was enacted.

The American Woolen Co. was not alone in publishing a reduction in prices. In the same paper—the Journal of Commerce of date January 13, 1914—I find the advertisements of other great houses. I present a few:

METCALF BROS. & CO. PRICES—FINE GRADES DOWN FROM 17½ CENTS TO 25 CENTS A YARD FOR FALL 1914.

Metcalf Bros. & Co. opened their finer grades of wool goods at prices that showed reductions of from 15 cents to 25 cents a yard compared with the quotations for fall 1913.

On the cheaper grades of men's-wear woolens the reductions averaged 7½ cents a yard.

It was stated that serge prices would not be made for the fall 1914 season for a week or 10 days.

Here is another:

PRICES ON WATERLOO SERGES—PATTERSON & GREENOUGH REDUCE HEAVYWEIGHTS ABOUT 12 PER CENT.

Patterson & Greenough, selling agents for the Waterloo Woolen Manufacturing Co., opened the Waterloo serges and unfinished worsteds at the following prices:

Ontario grade serge.

Style:
5114, 14 ozs	$1.20
5116, 16 ozs	1.30
5118, 18 ozs	1.42½

Seneca.

5214, 14 ozs	1.30
5216, 16 ozs	1.45
5218, 18 ozs	1.60

Unfinished worsted.

51014, 14 ozs	1.25
51016, 16 ozs	1.35
52014, 14 ozs	1.35
52016, 16 ozs	1.50

These prices show a reduction of about 12 per cent compared with last year.

Here is the statement of our old friend:

ARLINGTON SERGES SELL WELL—MANY NEW NUMBERS OFFERED AT ATTRACTIVE PRICES.

William Whitman & Co. have made prices on Arlington Mill serges that are from 25 cents to 35 cents a yard lower than a year ago. These goods, it was stated yesterday, have been open for a week. In addition to the regular standard numbers many new staple fabrics are being offered by this corporation.

One of the best sellers is 2226, which cost $1.32½. An 11-ounce cloth, style No. 2228, is being offered at 80 cents. This cloth is causing a good deal of comment. Another new fabric is No. 2233, at $1.25.

The serge No. 2004, which was opened last August at 75 cents and subsequently advanced to 82½ cents, is being offered for the next fall season at 72½ cents. Serge No. 2034, which a year ago was opened at $1.87½ and lowered last August to $1.62½, is $1.55 for fall 1914 delivery.

The advance business placed on Arlington serges is reported to be substantial.

Mr. President, in the same paper which published the statements showing a reduction in woolen goods I find some evidence that those who spent all last summer prophesying the ruin of the sheep men and wailing over the decimation of their flocks and herds were somewhat in error.

Why, when the tariff bill was up for discussion a distinguished Senator, whose magnificent physique suggests the broad plains of the West and the manly virility of its sturdy population, stood up in the Senate daily looking like a monument of unshed tears; he could vocalize only in notes that were so pathetic that they would melt the stony heart of even a free-trade Democrat as he told us that the price of wool would all go to smash; that the disconsolate little lambs, refusing longer to gambol on the green, would pine away and die; that the wise old wethers, heartbroken at the thought of lower prices, would droop their sad heads, seek the underbrush, shrivel up, and blow away; that the cactus once more would embrace the surface of the earth in its thorny arms and the prairie dog build his lair in the streets of Cheyenne; that ruin and desolation would settle down upon our beloved country and the howl of the coyote would again be heard in the land. [Laughter.] But wool did not go down much; cows still have calves, and hens lay eggs, and chickens hatch, and pigs multiply, and the goat still distills his odoriferous sweets upon the plains of the great West.

For, after all these wailings, I read in a trade paper of January 13, 1914, this:

BOSTON WOOLS STRONG, HIGHER PRICES LOOKED FOR—TRANSACTIONS PRINCIPALLY IN FINE AND FINE MEDIUM TERRITORY—FOREIGN MARKETS FIRMER.

BOSTON, January 12.

There is no mistaking the very patent fact that raw wool the world over is master of the wool textile situation. The disinterested attitude which buyers adopted only a short time ago when examining wool, has disappeared and buyers are free to confess that wool prices are against them on Summer Street. The market is in a healthy condition and the prospects indicate higher prices rather than lower.

Probably the best feature of the whole trade, however, is the fact that manufacturers appear more cheerful over the outlook on goods. Some factors are understood to have done fairly well on their heavyweight openings and this is of no little significance this season. Certain showings of woolen overcoatings, especially chinchillas, are reported to have sold well. Moreover, it is asserted by some mill men that certain staple worsteds, which have been kept up to a fixed standard hitherto are obtaining decided recognition from the clothing trade. One well-known manufacturer of medium-priced staple worsteds is reported to have recently sent abroad certain samples to see at what price they could be duplicated, and it is further reported that the results showed a price only 15 cents a yard in favor of the foreign goods, not taking into account the difference in freight nor the 35 per cent duty.

THE WEEK'S SALES IN DETAIL.

Transactions in the local market have been principally of the fine and fine medium grade territory wools of the clothing order, on the basis of 46 to 47 cents for the fine medium and about 50 cents for clean for the best fine wools, possibly 51 cents for choice. Best Montanas, which are now scarce, are quoted at 17 cents in the grease and good fine and fine medium Utahs, shrinking around 65 to 66 per cent, are quoted firm at 16 cents. A sale of over a half million pounds of graded Montana wools is reported, including fine, half-blood and three-eighths blood staple, as well as half-blood clothing wools. For fine staple, 18 to 18½ cents in the grease is reported and for half-blood 19 to 19½ cents is said to have been taken, while 19½ cents is reported on three-eighths blood. About a quarter million pounds of low wools, including common and braid, quarter and low quarter, have also been cleaned up at around 19 cents.

Several lots of original wools are also reported, including some Montana, Idaho, Wyoming, New Mexican, and Colorado at prices ranging from 43 to 44 cents for the poorer wools up to 49 to 50 cents for the best lots. Altogether close to 3,000,000 pounds of territory wools are reported as sold this week.

Manufacturers are carefully going over the stocks of foreign wool in the market and are sampling these wools very extensively as well as the domestic fleece. The usual call for fine Australian clothing wools has been in evidence again at former rates, namely, 56 to 63 cents for 64s–70s wools according to condition.

Included in the week's transactions were several hundred bales of New Zealand and Australian crossbreds.

Mr. President, if there has been one institution in the United States that has told us that the tariff would close down the factories, produce starvation, send the pale-faced laborer out to tramp upon the highways, do no good, and give us no reduction in prices, it was the Pittsburgh Plate Glass Co. It was always here when a tariff bill was up. Like the poor, it was eternally with us. Here is a letter from the Pittsburgh Plate Glass people. I read a part of it. It is dated back in March, when I intended to use some of this material.

MARCH 4, 1914.

We are in receipt of your communication of the 16th ultimo, which has been carefully noted.

It is not a simple matter to answer your question directly, because of the many conditions bearing upon the matter of price, and for the further reason that the effect of the present tariff has not been fully determined. To comply as accurately and concisely as circumstances will permit, the prices of plate glass may be considered in three general classifications, with the following comparisons:

Selected quality, used almost entirely for high-grade mirrors:

1912 prices—	Per square foot.
2 feet 8 inches by 5 feet	$0.37
5 by 10 feet	.51
Present prices—
2 feet 8 inches by 5 feet	.32½
5 by 10 feet	.40½

Second quality, used principally for cheaper grade mirrors and automobiles:

1912 prices—	Per square foot.
2 feet 8 inches by 5 feet	$0.32
5 by 10 feet	.42
Present prices—
2 feet 8 inches by 5 feet	.29
5 by 10 feet	.37

Glazing quality, used principally for exterior of buildings, show cases, table tops, etc.:

1912 price—	Per square foot.
Average assortment, 1 by 120 feet	$0.30
Present price—
Average assortment, 1 by 120 feet	.28

The prices in first and second classification are shown in two brackets only, because grades of glass involved are used almost entirely in sizes under 10 square feet. Price in the third classification is based upon average assortment, accepted by wholesale trade buying glazing quality.

I wish the Senator from Utah [Mr. SMOOT] was here.

The above are wholesale prices, but retail prices for the same period would compare relatively.

Mr. VARDAMAN. Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. MARTINE of New Jersey in the chair). The Secretary will call the roll.

The Secretary called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Ashurst	Johnson	Page	Sutherland
Borah	Jones	Perkins	Swanson
Brady	Kenyon	Pomerene	Thomas
Bristow	Kern	Reed	Thompson
Burton	Lane	Saulsbury	Townsend
Chamberlain	Lea, Tenn.	Sheppard	Vardaman
Chilton	Lee, Md.	Sherman	Warren
Clark, Wyo.	Lewis	Shively	Weeks
Colt	Martin, Va.	Simmons	West
Cummins	Martine, N. J.	Smith, Ariz.	White
Gallinger	Nelson	Smith, Md.	Williams
Gronna	Norris	Smith, Mich.	Works
Hitchcock	O'Gorman	Smoot
Hughes	Oliver	Sterling
James	Overman	Stone

Mr. CHILTON. I wish to state that the Senator from New Mexico [Mr. FALL] is necessarily absent from the Senate.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Fifty-seven Senators have answered to the roll call. There is a quorum present. The Senator from Missouri will proceed.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. President——

Mr. REED. I yield to the Senator from Mississippi.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I wish to report, under the instructions of the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate, the resolutions which I send to the desk. If there should be any discussion in connection with any of them, I will withdraw them at once. I ask unanimous consent for their consideration. One of them is to pay the funeral expenses of the late Senator Bradley, and others are routine matters connected with the death of employees and the usual six months' allowance. Two of them propose to continue certain employees a month or two longer.

FUNERAL EXPENSES OF THE LATE SENATOR BRADLEY.

Mr. WILLIAMS, from the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate, to which was referred Senate resolution 381, submitted by Mr. JAMES on the 28th ultimo, reported it favorably without amendment, and it was considered by unanimous consent and agreed to, as follows:

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Senate be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to pay, from the miscellaneous items of the contingent fund of the Senate, the actual and necessary expenses incurred by the committee appointed by the President of the Senate in arranging for and attending the funeral of the late Senator William O. Bradley, from the State of Kentucky, vouchers for the same to be approved by the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate.

EMELIE SMITH.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I am directed by the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate, to which was referred Senate resolution 378, submitted by Mr. NELSON on the 27th ultimo, to report it favorably with amendments. I ask for its present consideration.

The Senate, by unanimous consent, proceeded to consider the resolution. The amendments were, in line 6, to strike out the word "he" and insert "she," and in the same line, before the word "death," to strike out "his" and insert "her," so as to make the resolution read:

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Senate be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to pay, out of the contingent fund of the Senate, to Emelie Smith, mother of Eli Smith, late a messenger to the Committee on the Five Civilized Tribes of Indians, a sum equal to six months' salary at the rate she was receiving by law at the time of her death, said sum to be considered as including funeral expenses and all other allowances.

The amendments were agreed to.

The resolution as amended was agreed to.

ASSISTANT CLERK TO COMMITTEE ON NAVAL AFFAIRS.

Mr. WILLIAMS, from the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate, to which was referred Senate resolution 377, submitted by Mr. TILLMAN on the 26th ultimo, reported it without amendment, and it was considered by unanimous consent and agreed to, as follows:

Resolved, That the Committee on Naval Affairs be, and it is hereby, authorized to continue the employment of an assistant clerk, at $1,440 per annum, to be paid from "miscellaneous items" of the contingent fund of the Senate, until July 1, 1914.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Mr. President, a parliamentary inquiry. The unfinished business being before the Senate, can the Senate pass these resolutions?

Mr. WILLIAMS. These are routine matters.

The VICE PRESIDENT. It can only be done by unanimous consent, and it is in direct violation of the rules.

MONUMENT TO PRESIDENT JOHN TYLER.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I am directed by the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate, to which was referred Senate concurrent resolution 22, authorizing the appointment of a committee of Congress to attend the unveiling of a monument to President John Tyler at Richmond, Va., to report it without amendment. I ask that that resolution may go to the calendar.

Mr. SWANSON. I should like to have the resolution passed at once. The exercises will be held very soon. I ask unanimous consent that the resolution be adopted.

The resolution was considered by unanimous consent and agreed to, as follows:

Whereas the Government of the United States has erected a monument in Hollywood Cemetery at Richmond, Va., over the grave of President John Tyler; and

Whereas exercises will be held very soon to unveil the said monument and it being considered very appropriate that the Senate and House of Representatives should be properly represented on this occasion: Therefore be it

Resolved by the Senate (the House of Representatives concurring), That a committee of 10 members be appointed, 5 by the President of the Senate and 5 by the Speaker of the House of Representatives, to represent the Congress of the United States to attend said ceremonies, and authority is hereby given to expend $250 from the contingent fund of the Senate and $250 from the contingent fund of the House of Representatives to defray the expenses of said committee, upon vouchers to be approved by the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate and the Committee on Accounts of the House of Representatives, respectively.

SENATOR FROM MARYLAND.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I am directed by the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate, to which was referred Senate resolution 379, to pay BLAIR LEE expenses incurred in proceedings involving his right to a seat in the Senate, submitted by Mr. KERN on the 28th ultimo, to report it without amendment.

Mr. KERN. Mr. President——

Mr. WILLIAMS. I ask that the resolution may go to the calendar unless the Senator from Indiana desires its present consideration.

Mr. KERN. I rose to ask unanimous consent for its immediate consideration.

Mr. GALLINGER. I will ask that the resolution be read once more.

The Secretary again read the resolution.

Mr. GALLINGER. I have nothing to say about it, Mr. President.

Mr. OVERMAN. That is a new precedent in the Senate.

Mr. GALLINGER. I wondered about the payment from the contingent fund.

Mr. OVERMAN. I think the resolution had better go over. We have had such resolutions before and declined to take action in this way.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I am perfectly willing to let the resolution go to the calendar.

Mr. WARREN. Such resolutions have always gone to the Committee on Appropriations and the appropriation has been made in the regular way.

Mr. OVERMAN. The resolution ought to go to the Committee on Appropriations.

Mr. GALLINGER. What attracted my attention was that it proposes to make the payment from the contingent fund of the Senate. It strikes me that there ought to be an appropriation made for the purpose.

Mr. WARREN. It should be regularly appropriated for.

Mr. WILLIAMS. That may be so. I ask that the resolution go to the calendar.

Mr. OVERMAN. Let it go to the Committee on Appropriations. I ask that it be referred to the Committee on Appropriations. That is the place where it belongs.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I agree to that.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The resolution will be referred to the Committee on Appropriations.

HON. FRANK P. GLASS.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I am directed by the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate, to which was referred Senate resolution 380, to pay Frank P. Glass expenses incurred in proceedings to establish his right to a seat in the Senate by appointment of the governor of Alabama, submitted by the Senator from Indiana [Mr. KERN] on the 28th ultimo, to report it without amendment. I ask that the resolution take the same course.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The resolution will be referred to the Committee on Appropriations.

THE COMMITTEE ON INTEROCEANIC CANALS.

Mr. WILLIAMS, from the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate, to which was referred Senate resolution 385, submitted by the Senator from New York [Mr. O'GORMAN] on June 3, reported it without amendment, and it was considered by unanimous consent and agreed to as follows:

Resolved, That the provisions of resolution of April 6, 1914, authorizing the Committee on Interoceanic Canals to employ temporarily a stenographer be extended for 30 days from the adoption of this resolution.

PANAMA CANAL TOLLS.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. 14385) to amend section 5 of an act to provide for the opening, maintenance, protection, and operation of the Panama Canal and the sanitation of the Canal Zone, approved August 24, 1912.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, when I yielded to the interruption I was reading a letter from the Pittsburgh Plate Glass Co., showing the schedule of prices, with reductions, and I had called attention to this sentence:

The above are wholesale prices, but retail prices for the same period would compare relatively.

At the close of the letter this statement is made:

Indications now point to materially lower prices in the near future, particularly for the third classification.

In connection with the reduction in the price of woolens I have here a letter from S. Slater & Sons, of Webster, Mass., which reads as follows:

WEBSTER, MASS., February 25, 1914.

Mr. JAMES H. REED,
Chairman United States Senate Committee on Manufactures,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: Receipt is acknowledged of your inquiry of February 17, and in reply I am sending you herewith a memorandum showing the prices made on 10 of our staple styles for the fall of 1912 and also for the fall of 1914. The largest reductions are on styles which contain a percentage of foreign wools; the others are all domestic.

Yours, truly,

S. SLATER & SON (INC.),
By F. BARTLETT, Treasurer.

Here is the memorandum referred to in the letter:

Staple woolens.

Style.	Fall, 1912.	Fall, 1914.
382	$2.50	$2.40
618	2.15	2.05
1004	1.90	1.80
L B	1.40	1.30
L C X	1.75	1.55
1300	2.35	2.15
1600	2.47½	2.25
1516	1.60	1.45
Saxony	2.60	2.40
Sil. twill	2.75	2.55

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Missouri yield to the Senator from New Hampshire?

Mr. REED. I do.

Mr. GALLINGER. In a large manufacturing establishment in my own State the superintendent informed me that the product was being sold for a little less than a year ago; but, he added, that he had made an investigation and found that the ultimate consumer did not get any benefit from it.

Mr. REED. Oh, yes. I discussed that. Of course, if they made these goods for nothing and gave them away, the ultimate consumer would not get any benefit; if they made them for half the price now charged, the ultimate consumer would not get any benefit; if there was a reduction of 25 per cent, the ultimate consumer would not get any benefit; we all understand that; yet, singularly enough, we all know as an invariable rule of trade that when wholesale prices decline permanently in the end the reduction must reach clear down the line unless there is a combination that can absolutely control the market and fix prices.

Mr. GALLINGER. Well, of course, if the Senator is looking to the future for a reduction to the consumers, that may come some time, but they certainly have been waiting patiently now for a good many months, and it has not reached them as yet.

Mr. REED. Oh, Mr. President, that is all well enough to assert, but I have read a letter from the great Pittsburgh Plate Glass Co., the largest concern in the world, I suppose, in that line, saying that these prices have reached the ultimate consumer. I read a letter a few moments ago from a very large manufacturer, asserting that the reduction in the prices of woolens had reached and gone to the benefit of the consumer. I also put alongside those letters the very common sense of the situation, which is that, in the absence of monopoly or combinations, reduction at the wholesale establishment must finally reach the ultimate consumer.

I call attention now to a letter from Jeremiah Williams & Co., of Boston, Mass., dated February 19, 1914. This letter is written from the standpoint of those who believe in a very high tariff, but it contains this statement:

Our customers tell us that manufacturers' prices on samples of woolen and worsted goods shown in New York last month for delivery next summer, to be made up into clothing and sold next fall by the retailer, are lower than they have been for years, possibly lower than at any time since the previous low tariff under the Wilson-Gorman bill; in other words, in order to meet threatened foreign competition on their product, we believe manufacturers have in many instances put prices on their fabrics below the actual cost of production. There is no question in our mind but that those well posted in this line of manufacturing could demonstrate to you that woolen and worsted goods have been offered and sold for next fall's heavy-weight season at lower prices than for many years.

It is too soon—

Says this gentleman—

however, to tell you whether this reduction in the price of cloth will be passed on to the consuming public in materially lower prices on garments made up ready to wear.

A little later on in the letter is the statement, frankly made, that this concern is one believing in protection and making the argument that the prices in the end will not be of very great benefit. I think I will read that part of the letter, for I want to be fair to the writer of the letter. I think he is a very sincere man.

We are not trying to make a protectionist argument to you, although we ourselves are of that school. We accept the new tariff in the spirit that we are going to make the best of it, but we do not believe that you or your colleagues passed this bill with any intentions other than to benefit the consuming masses, and we feel that when they go to buy their clothes next fall they will pay $10 or $20 or $30 for the same clothes that they bought a year ago at those prices, and that they will not be able to buy at $9.20 or $19.20 or $29.20 and save the 80 cents per garment for themselves, the consumers.

That is his opinion, although he previously said it was too early to tell. Then he adds:

To sum up, answering your questions:
First. There has been a decided reduction in the price of cloth at the mills.
Second. We fear very much that this reduction will never reach the consumer. We hope for the best, however.

I read a portion of a letter written by Passavant & Co., of 440 Fourth Avenue, New York City:

The plain serges, one of the largely used fabrics, are being quoted at from 10 to 20 per cent below last year's prices. It is extremely difficult to give any positive opinion, because things have not settled down to a steady gait yet.

The rest of the letter is of the same tenor, but that is the only part bearing directly upon the reduction in prices. I have the letter here, of course, for any Senator to see it if he so desires.

Mr. President, in this connection I call attention merely to the headlines in a number of papers, running from the 19th to the 22d day of December, 1913:

Prices rise briskly.—Market makes quick response to Washington news.—Dealings on a large scale.—Felt that American Telephone dissolution agreement will lessen talk of Government ownership.—Statement by President Wilson of administration's hope as to business a favorable factor.

The beginning of the article is:

Emphatic response was made by the stock market to-day to the news from Washington of the American Telephone dissolution agreement and the passage by the Senate of the currency bill. Dealings were on a much larger scale and prices moved up vigorously.

The Democratic Party seems to be at present in this peculiar position: If the Democrats pass a bill which strengthens the financial situation of the country and the stock market responds and shows improvement, immediately Senators upon the other side rise and, with eyes rolling in a fine fury and with froth dropping from the corners of their mouths, declare that the Democratic Party has surrendered itself to the great financial interests; but if there is a trust or a combination on earth that sets up a wail we are immediately denounced as the enemies of honest business.

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. Will the Senator give the date of the last headline which he read?

Mr. REED. New York, December 30, 1913. I call attention to another headline:

Market again strong. Further response is made to news from Washington. Early losses are made up. Substantial gains are recorded in many cases at close of business. Weakness during fore part of day due to foreign influences. Berlin unloads Canadian Pacific.

Another article, under date of December 19, is headed:

Retailing holds up. Christmas sales compare well with those of 1912. Railroad orders broaden. Large buying of pig iron encourages producers. Vast amount of new wealth created by the soil. Some lines quite optimistic. Preparations for inventory.

Under date of December 19, another headline reads:

Broad rise in prices. Stock market gives evidence of inherent strength. Investment buying large. Traders regard passage of currency bill as a favorable factor.

And because the traders did so regard the currency bill, at least one Senator arose on the other side to-day and declared the new currency law was a bankers' law for the benefit of bankers, and left the impression that it necessarily plucked everybody else. If prices rise, the Democratic Party is to be damned; if prices drop, the Democratic Party is to blame; but in any event let it be understood that the ultimate consumer gets no benefit of lower prices; it is always an understood thing, according to the logic of our Republican brethren, that the ultimate consumer never gets anything but "the worst of it."

I read another. This is dated January 12, 1914:

Boston wools strong. Higher prices looked for. Market is in healthy condition. Prospects indicate higher prices rather than lower.

Now, Mr. President, just to ascertain whether the country is actually going to perdition, and whether the chasm of universal bankruptcy is opening before us, I call attention to the stock-market reports in the American of yesterday. I read:

Range of the market: Daily average price of 32 stocks, 20 railway and 12 industrials: Average yesterday, 91⅞; average Wednesday, 91⅛; average week ago, 92⅛; average a month ago, 91¼; average a year ago, 89⅞.

So that upon these 32 great stocks, selected by this paper as typical of the conditions of the market, the average of the last four days being given in comparison with the average of a year ago, there is shown a distinct advance in the value of these stocks. Nevertheless Senators who prefer political success to that confidence which is essential to all business rise on the floor of the Senate every day to declare that stringency is upon us and the precipice of disaster immediately before us.

Mr. President, here is a comparison of bond sales in the New York World of Friday, June 5:

Total sales, June 4, 1914, $2,058,000; same day of week last year, $1,901,000.
From January 1 to date, $327,182,000; same period a year ago, $253,082,000.

Mr. President, those figures do not indicate that business has been entirely arrested; they do not point the road to ruin. With prices better upon stocks and a greater sale of stocks than there was for the corresponding period last year, it does not seem that we are about to be plunged into the gulf of universal bankruptcy.

Of course every time a trust can induce a Senator to read one of its letters proclaiming that woe is ahead of us some people will be frightened, the business of the country to some extent retarded; those who are timorous will experience a financial chill and begin to hoard their dollars. This propaganda of the trusts is carried on in the hope that the people can be deceived into believing that Democratic policies are ruining the country, and thus to induce them to return to power the Republican Party. The trusts know on which side their bread is buttered. Accordingly, they are willing to write letters as long as they can get Republican Senators to give them a place in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD. There has been a persistent effort to convince the country that it is ruined.

I took part in a special congressional election in the State of Iowa last winter. I found circulated with every farmer in that district an excerpt from the speech of a Republican Senator, telling them that hundreds of millions of bushels of Argentine corn had already been imported. According to that statement more corn had already been imported into the United States from Argentina than Argentina's entire production. The farmers were told that in the very near future Argentina would drive the American farmer from the American market; whereas the truth is that Argentine corn can not sell in competition with the corn of the United States for feeding purposes. Argentine corn is fit only for certain manufacturing purposes. Besides, the entire amount shipped to the United States did not equal the production of one good corn county. Argentine corn was a bogy joyfully introduced and proudly paraded by Republican statesmen, who place party supremacy above national prosperity.

Mr. POMERENE. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Missouri yield to the Senator from Ohio?

Mr. REED. I do.

Mr. POMERENE. Mr. President, I remember very distinctly during the tariff discussion the representatives of the pottery industries of Ohio and elsewhere were here protesting against any reduction of the duties on pottery, and insisting that, if there were any substantial reduction, it was going to seriously hamper the business. I have before me extracts from different papers in the vicinity of the pottery industries of Ohio, and I want to take the liberty of reading into the RECORD just three or four of them.

One is from the Sebring Times. Sebring is a town of eight or ten thousand people, about 60 miles west of Pittsburgh. In its issue of Tuesday, March 24, 1914, it says:

The past two weeks hold the record for the biggest output of pottery in the history of Sebring. Fifty-four glost kilns were made during that time, and the most gratifying feature is that the ware is not going into stock, but is being used to fill orders and is being shipped as soon as made.

China, Glass, and Lamps, the trade journal of the pottery trade, published in Pittsburgh, in its issue of Tuesday, April 14, said:

Never before in the history of the American potting industry have there been so many kilns in use or so many potteries in active operation. All the general ware plants are being rushed to the limit to fill orders on hand and take care of new business being booked. Large forces of operatives are working as well as the well-paid operatives of the American potteries usually work, and shipments are greater than ever before in the history of the trade.

The East Liverpool Review, which is a Republican paper printed in East Liverpool, Ohio, the center of the pottery industries, in its issue of May 1, said:

Business in the domestic potteries continues even better than was expected the first of the year, and there is not a general ware plant in the country without orders on its books and in sight to keep it in steady operation until the summer shutdown. But, as usual, there is a fly in the ointment. It is the lack of competent workmen.

In the issue of May 14 the East Liverpool News-Review, a Republican paper, says:

A seven-kiln pottery plant, modern in every respect, will be erected at Clarksburg, W. Va., during the next few months by the McNichol China Co., of this city, to be operated entirely separate from the local plant. The structure will represent an investment of nearly $125,000. A railroad siding for the new pottery is being laid.

The East Liverpool News-Review of May 14 says, with reference to local real estate conditions there—and there are quite a number of pottery plants there, as every Senator knows—as follows:

We have it from the lips of a local real estate man that East Liverpool needs 500 new houses to meet the present demand. There is absolutely not a house vacant that is fit for occupancy, and the only source of relief for the newcomers is to buy homes outright. The large influx of newcomers must be provided with shelter, and the only way out of the dilemma is for those who own vacant lots to improve them at once.

Mr. President, I felt that in view of the statements that have been made by the Senator from Missouri these quotations from these papers would be quite apropos.

Mr. REED. I am obliged to the Senator from Ohio for his contribution. I ought to say that while I was on the floor speaking the Senator from Mississippi [Mr. WILLIAMS] handed me a number of papers, the headlines of which I read. The evidence comes from every side. The Senator from New Jersey [Mr. MARTINE], who lives in that State characterized this morning by the Senator from Michigan as so wicked, has just handed me the New York Tribune of June 5, containing this interesting little item:

The New York Central has placed an order for 4,300 cars with the American Car Foundry Co., and for 3,000 cars with the Standard Steel Car Co.

An order for 7,300 cars in one day by one railroad from one factory is indicative of good railroad business. I presume the reduction in the tariff made it possible for the manufacturer to make a lower price. I wonder if my Republican brethren will claim that the ultimate consumer—to wit, the railroad—did not receive any benefit from the reduced price.

It is interesting, in connection with some of the wails we have heard, to call attention to a little evidence from the homes of some of the Job's comforters who have been performing here in the Senate.

I hold in my hand a copy of the New York Herald of February 18, in which I find the following:

SALT LAKE CITY, UTAH (Tuesday).

"Calamity howling," which was heard immediately after the last presidential election, has died out. Following the passage of the currency bill there was a quick change for better feeling, especially among the bankers. Business men have returned to Salt Lake with praise for the stability of this community.

Senator SMOOT'S insistent statements that hard times are ahead are repudiated by stanch Republicans here, as the following statements will show:

Lester D. Freed, president of the Freed Furniture Co. and a Republican said: "I feel that we are going to have a big wave of prosperity. The feeling not only exists here but is strong everywhere. On the strength of the feeling my company is arranging to do heavier advertising than has ever been done before in its history."

Col. Maurice M. Kaighn, receiver of the United States land office, having been appointed by Mr. Roosevelt and reappointed by Mr. Taft, in a speech before the Mining Exchange last Saturday night, declared that the policy pursued by the United States Interior Department toward the mining men of the West for several years has been all wrong, and he congratulated the present administration on the reversal of this policy

I shall not take more time to read that particular statement, but I ask leave to insert it in the RECORD.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, that may be done.

The matter referred to is as follows:

The policy of the Government in requiring prospectors to prove that their property was a paying mine before granting them a patent was just the same as requiring a homesteader to prove that his land was capable of producing crops before permitting him to settle on the land. "Such a policy," he said, "was the result of ignorance and antagonism toward the mining industry."

Mayor Samuel C. Park, a Republican, who operates a retail and wholesale jewelry house and who is well posted on business conditions, said to-night: "Salt Lake enjoyed prosperity during 1913. The coming year promises to exceed last year. Business men are confident that when the business world accommodates itself to the general readjustment, we will have a period of prosperity which will make us all forget predictions of disaster."

Mr. REED. I read now, because it comes distinctly, I think, from the other side of this controversy and not because it is Democratic at all, this statement:

Guy E. Tripp, chairman of the board of directors of the Westinghouse Electric & Manufacturing Co., whose offices are in No. 165 Broadway, was enthusiastic regarding the outlook for business and the articles calling attention to the improvement. As directing head of the Westinghouse company, which not only has extensive plants at Pittsburgh, Cleveland, and Newark, but also has large subsidiaries in Canada, Great Britain, and France, Mr. Tripp is constantly in touch with the situation in many important lines of business.

"I must certainly approve the Herald's efforts to bring to public attention the facts," said Mr. Tripp, "and I strongly disapprove manufactured pessimism, although I recognize there is some pessimism that is not manufactured.

"The Westinghouse company had better orders in January than in December, and so far in February the orders are larger in proportion than those received in January. The new business is well distributed in all departments of the corporation. The indications are that the improvement in business should not be regarded as temporary. In fact, this improvement gives every reason for the belief that the upward movement will be continued. The betterment may not be rapid, but it will be steady and permanent."

That was said after this wicked Democratic Congress had been ruining the country for 14 months.

Joseph W. Harriman—

I quote him again, because I think words coming from gentlemen engaged in these large adventures will appeal to my friends on the other side—

Joseph W. Harriman, president of the Harriman National Bank, a director of the Merchants' National Bank, and head of the New York Stock Exchange firm of Harriman & Co., said:

"The attitude of the Herald is splendid. It has restored confidence to those who were becoming apprehensive under the continued wails of the calamity howlers If persons will only read the facts as presented by the Herald instead of heeding the lamentations of the quacks, political and legal, who when brought to book are unable to place a finger on any really sore spot, they would be much better off mentally and financially. It is a pity that the mumps, which I notice has broken out in the United States Senate, did not attack some of these gentry long ago, that whatever 'holler' they might have been compelled to make would have been of a different character and not so likely to injure innocent and hard-working persons.

"So far as the banking business is concerned, there is improvement all along the line. Our correspondents speak most optimistically. The outlook for the crops is excellent. Nature has done her part to put everything in splendid shape, and it is up to us to do the rest."

Hugh Franey, of the American Federation of Labor, says:

In some branches of work it is practically impossible at present to obtain efficient men. On the other hand, there are hundreds of men idle in New York who are affiliated with the building trades, because of a halt in operations in this line.

Mr. Franey said that the big steel mills at South Chicago, Gary, Bethlehem, Pittsburgh, Wheeling, Martins Ferry, Canton, East St. Louis, Bessemer, and other points are practically working full time, and that orders have been booked which will mean a continuance of these conditions until late in the spring, at least.

A statement from Connecticut is interesting:

It may safely be said that "prosperity is here" in this center of one of the most extensive cotton manufacturing districts of New England. A careful canvass of the mill towns and villages within a radius of 25 miles around Putnam not only shows not a single skilled hand out of employment if able and willing to work, but a great scarcity of help.

With seven cotton mills and a dozen woolen and worsted mills around here running day and night, or part of the night, all are employed. And the 7,000 hands employed in this district have, with very few exceptions, had their wages increased in the last month. At Wauregan, some of the Killingly villages, Jewett City, Taftville, and Willimantic at least 1,000 more hands could find employment to-day.

These articles in the Herald, which come from all parts of the United States, were printed last February. They had the effect at the time of quieting the howling; but a little time has elapsed, and again the wail goes up, if not from Jericho, at least from the other side of this Chamber.

I might read here until nightfall statements from the Herald. I want to put in one which I have only partially glanced at:

Those Jeremiahs in Washington who have been busy prophesying the opening of soup houses and the closing of factories because they were not running the Government have been pretty busy with their lamentations.

It occurred to the Herald that they might have been so busy that some of them had not had time to find out what the folk at home thought of them. So for their information in part, but principally for the benefit of the general public, this newspaper inquired the views of Republicans among the constituents of the chief mourners over the "national peril."

With a unanimity that may pain the soup house prophets these same constituents proceed to prove with facts and figures that their conduct is prejudicial to the prosperity that is with the Nation.

JAMES R. MANN'S FEARS ARE NOT SHARED BY REPUBLICAN CONSTITUENTS IN CHICAGO.

Then is quoted a statement from Mr. MANN, together with this reply from the people of his home city:

Republican business men of Chicago take exception to the "hard-times" speeches made by Representative JAMES R. MANN, saying that his ideas and statements were not borne out by conditions in Chicago.

"Representative MANN has got the wrong idea, for business has been excellent," said Charles A. Stevens, president of Charles A. Stevens Bros., dealers in women's wear. "This store and most of the other stores along State Street have had good sales in the last two months, and the prospects of the spring trade are better than they have been for several years.

"I can not reconcile Mr MANN'S statement to the trade conditions. But there may be certain circles of business which have suffered a depression, but it does not seem to me that the condition can be general throughout all lines of industry and in all parts of the country. If such conditions are general, Chicago should be grateful that such is not the case in this city. Representative MANN'S statements do not fit in with the reports of the stores of Chicago, but I can not speak in regard to other lines of industry."

Then follows a statement by Mr. Spiegel, treasurer of Spiegel, May, Stern & Co., and one by Mr. Hulbert, treasurer of the Merchants' Loan & Trust Co., both of them repudiating the claim that is being set forth here.

These articles come from all parts of the United States, and the statements which were true then are true to-day.

Mr. President, instead of sitting here in the Senate of the United States and proclaiming disaster, we ought to stand here endeavoring to produce a feeling of just confidence, and that confidence can be bottomed upon circumstances which are world-wide and which have to-day their happiest culmination in the United States.

Everybody who is candid admits that there was a great financial stringency in all of Europe which began something like two and a half or three years ago. The Balkan War increased that stringency, not so much because of the money actually consumed in the war as because it was feared that all of Europe might be plunged into that war. In consequence the European rate of exchange and d scount mounted to almost unprecedented figures. The banks of Germany charged at one time 9 per cent. The Bank of England raised its discount rate almost to the top notch. The Bank or Banks of France had done the same thing. The result, of course, was that as European money would bring a higher rate of interest in Europe than in the United States, the payment of European loans was demanded. At the same time and for the same reason it became almost impossible to sell American securities in European financial markets. That meant, of course, that many great enterprises that could only be floated or would only be floated when money conditions were easy hesitated and awaited the day when there would be a better tone and a lower interest rate.

The rates in Europe are inevitably reflected in this country; but the rates in Europe have dropped, and the rates in this country are correspondingly dropping. Accordingly enterprises which would not begin their operation under conditions as they existed 12 months ago are to-day beginning to prepare to exploit their various adventures.

I know of one proposition, involving the expenditure of $30,000,000, that absolutely stopped because it was found that the interest rates would amount to probably 6 per cent, whereas it had been expected the money could be obtained at 4 or 5 per cent, as it could have been had it not been for the European disturbances. Now that a better condition exists, enterprise is reaching to grasp opportunity, the while Senators sit here crying, "Woe, woe, woe; bankruptcy is upon us!"

Mr. SHAFROTH. Mr. President, if the Senator will yield for an observation, I will say that out of a list of stocks that was furnished by the New York Stock Exchange about 10 days ago of 63 companies the stocks of which were quoted, all but 10 showed a substantial increase in price over the corresponding low price of 1913, and that is caused unquestionably by the lower rates of interest.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, coincident with a better condition in Europe—indeed, I might almost say in anticipation of it—we passed our banking bill, a bill which was denounced the other day by a Republican Senator as a bankers' bill and as having been enacted in the interest of bankers. Thus we are by one branch of the Republican Party verbally crucified upon a very clumsy cross because we are doing something to prevent financial panics. At the same time the stand-pat remnant is with an exceedingly dull ax sharpening a stick upon which they hope to impale us as the enemies of property and business. Whatever we do, we are sure to displease one or the other branch of the other side.

But what is the fact with reference to this banking system? Let us be fair about it. The solitary effect it has had up to this date is a steadying one, growing out of the fact that financiers looking ahead understand that the day is coming when financial panics will probably be a thing of history. But, of course, the system has not yet been inaugurated. The banks have not yet been opened. The good that is to come from them, the large measure of good, all except its anticipatory effect, has not yet been realized. But we are working along toward the establishment of the banks, and it is a singular and a very propitious fact that it is admitted now by financiers all over the world that when the system is in full operation we shall have immensely added to the general stability of the financial system of the United States. No man can well doubt this who looks candidly at the circumstance that practically every national bank in the United States came into the system, a thing which would not have occurred had the system not been sound.

It was said here by the Senator from Kansas [Mr. BRISTOW] the other day that this was all for the benefit of bankers. I admit frankly that its primary benefits go to the bankers. But what are the character of the benefits going to the bankers? They are not benefits which increase their ability to charge interest or to make exactions or to impose hard conditions upon their customers. The benefits are simply those which make for the solidity of the banking system. It takes out of the banking system or away from the banking system the great danger of panics, and therefore enables the banks of the country to proceed with their business without fear of destruction, for which they are in no way responsible, coming out of the night.

How, then, does that affect the customer of the bank? Certainly not to his evil. The bank that knows that a panic may come at any minute must husband its resources to meet the panic or the possibility of a panic. Hence, it must circumscribe the loans to its customers and to a certain extent it must charge the customer a heavier rate of interest to compensate it for the risk. But just in proportion as you remove that risk, just in proportion as you make bank business secure, you make it possible for the banker to extend greater accommodations to his customers. If we could make every bank in the United States so secure that it could never fail and never have a loss, inevitably the customer of the bank would get the larger portion of the benefit, because of there being an active competition between the banks, and as you improve the conditions of the banks you improve the opportunity of the customer.

Mr. President, at the same time that the calamity howl is being raised and they tell us that everything is closed up and nobody has any money, the effort is being made to tell the farmers that they are being ruined. Tons of literature is being sent out, telling the farmers how the wicked Democrats have exposed them to competition with foreign countries and destroyed their opportunity to make a living; and yet I read in the paper of to-day that Kansas City prices are as follows:

Steers, $8.80 to $9.25 per hundredweight.
Hogs, $8.15 to $8.25 per hundredweight.
Lambs, $9.15 per hundredweight.
Wethers, $5.85 per hundredweight.
Corn, No. 2, 71 cents to 72 cents per bushel.
Wheat, No. 2, red, 94½ cents per bushel.

Mr. President, with good prices to the farmer, with lower prices for money, with better conditions in Europe, we ought to feel encouraged.

But there is an additional circumstance which, of course, is not due to the Democratic Party, although if there were a Republican administration it would be immediately appropriated by that modest organization. I refer to the fact that crop prospects are excellent.

For the last 50 years the Republican politician has declared himself to be the fountain spring of all prosperity. When the farmer in earliest spring wades knee deep in mud in preparation for planting; when from break of dawn to fall of night he trudges behind the plow; when with tireless sinews and generous hand he scatters seed upon the fruitful soil; when a kindly God, reproducing the miracle of creation, washes the land with silvery rain, warms it in the fiery mantle of the sun, fans it with the four winds of heaven, carpets it with green, and decks it with the harvest's shimmering gold; when, with sweat oozing from every pore, the farmer, tugging, straining, and enduring the very agony of toil garners in the precious sheaves—when all this, through the providence of God and the labor of man, has been achieved, the Republican politician blandly tells the farmer that he should repudiate the beneficence of God, forget his own industry and husbandry, and humbly thank the Republican Party for prosperity.

The Democratic Party advances no such absurd or insolent pretense; but we may be permitted to say it is a happy thing that from the Atlantic to the Pacific, wherever the eye is cast it embraces vast landscapes divided into splendid checkerboards of varying green, rich valleys covered thick with grasses, hillsides resplendent in the lighter emerald of growing wheat and oats, long, straight rows of corn, where every hill stands rank with vigor. Everywhere the farmers are cultivating the soil. On all hands are the evidences of a prosperous year.

Mr. President, if the weather only stays good and the howlings from the Senate at Washington do not too much disturb atmospheric conditions, we may hope that in due course of time there will be a great crop harvested. If the farmers of the country market that crop and their fat cattle and swine at the prices now being paid there will be in this country so much money that all the jeremiads of disgruntled politicians will be forgotten, and sad hearts will be found only in the bosoms of Republican politicians, who prefer political supremacy to national happiness.

Mr. TOWNSEND. Mr. President, this discussion has grown out of the letter introduced by me into the Senate yesterday written by Mr. Leland, of the Cadillac Motor Car Co. It has been charged by the Senator from Missouri that the company with which the writer is connected is in a criminal trust. I know nothing about that, but I do not believe it is true. I do not believe it exists and operates in violation of law. If it does I shall not defend it. I am confident that it needs no defense. I feel sure that if this company was subject to the penalties of the Sherman antitrust law that fact would have been discovered long before this.

I can not at this moment recall the history of the organization of the General Motors Co. My memory is, however, that it grew out of a patent known as the Selden patent, which is a device absolutely necessary to the mechanism of all gasoline motor cars. Some gentlemen, or a company, claimed to own this patent and served notice upon the manufacturers of cars that they could not proceed with their manufacture unless a royalty was paid to the owner of the patent. A number of automobile companies, as I remember, proceeded to make terms with this patent holder, and were permitted to manufacture under a royalty. These, I believe, constitute the General Motors Co. I am not sure, however, that this is true. Other automobile companies in the United States resisted this patent, although a decision had been rendered in an eastern Federal court confirming title to the patent in the alleged owners of it. The case was taken to the Supreme Court of the United States, where it was reversed. If my memory is correct, no manufacturing company has joined the General Motors Co. since then, and but very few concerns joined originally. I am not clear that my understanding is correct, and so far as my position is concerned it makes no difference as to how the organization was effected.

The General Motors Co. is not a very large factor in the manufacture of automobiles; it is certainly not sufficiently important to offer any restraint upon trade. I think that that company a few years ago, by common report, was in financial difficulties; I am sure that some of the companies connected with that organization are now not strong. I do not, however, care to discuss that matter further. If the General Motors Co., of which the Cadillac Motor Car Co. is a constituent part, is operating in violation of law the Attorney General should be able to determine the fact and prosecution should be instituted against it. I will join the Senator from Missouri [Mr. REED] in invoking action by the Department of Justice if such is the case.

I think, however, it ill becomes Senators to take advantage of their constitutional privilege on such information as has been presented here to attack by the use of violent and harsh language, by the charge of criminality, an organization which has at least the reputation of being an institution of good character and high standing and against which nobody, to my knowledge, except the Senator from Missouri, has ever lodged any complaint. The legal status of the Cadillac Motor Car Co., however, is not the real issue here; it is the false issue raised to divert attention from the true one. It does not answer the arguments presented by Mr. Leland to bring in some outside matter and charge the organization with which he is connected as being engaged in an unlawful business. The question raised by that gentleman in his letter to me and now a part of the record is whether the country is suffering from the acts of this administration or not. He has improved his opportunity to petition Congress through his Representative and has stated his views on the conditions of the country. The Senator from Missouri has charged this man with being connected with a trust, and has made the argument that the trusts of the country are opposing legislation which has been enacted. I do not believe that the record will disclose that that is true. If there are any concerns which are going to survive, even temporarily, the ill-advised experimental legislation of this Congress, it will be the large, strong concerns, not the small ones. I think that it is true that probably every Senator in the Senate has received letters similar to the one that I read yesterday. It must be true, because those with whom I have talked have told me that they have received letters asking that this session of Congress dissolve as soon as possible.

The senior Senator from Masssachusetts [Mr. LODGE], who was called from the Chamber a moment ago, handed me a letter from a concern for which he vouches as being not only not in a trust but as being a concern of the highest character and standing. The treasurer and general manager of that company wrote him this letter——

Mr. REED. Will the Senator kindly give us the name of the writer?

Mr. TOWNSEND. If the Senator will be patient, I will read the communication. This is a letter on the stationery of the American Steam Gauge & Valve Manufacturing Co. It is as follows:

AMERICAN STEAM GAUGE & VALVE MANUFACTURING CO.,
Boston, Mass., May 29, 1914.

The Hon. HENRY CABOT LODGE,
United States Senate, Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: We wish to bring the fact before your mind just as clearly as possible that business in this country is being terribly hurt through too much legislation.

The great, big units at whom the larger part of this legislation is pointed are backed up with such tremendous resources and surplus that they can stand a long siege of legislation without being in any serious danger. The smaller concerns who are only doing a moderate-size business are not situated in this way, and many of them will have to stand the brunt of the present legislative program.

In other words, the people at whom the legislation is aimed are not going to suffer through it, but, rather, be the gainers, as every time a small company is put out of business—unable to hold up its head under such disastrous conditions as are now existing—it makes things just so much safer and better for the big fellow.

By this we mean that the present legislation, rather than accomplishing what it aims to, will have, to a considerable extent, the contrary effect.

Take, for instance, this company, if you care for an example. Last year we did the biggest business in our history, amounting to $549,000, which shows that under reasonably normal conditions we forge ahead. The sales for the first three months of this year were exactly 20 per cent below last year's average. Our pay roll is $1,400 per week less than last year's average, showing that we had to let a lot of men go, and they are consequently out of positions and suffering through lack of work. This is to say nothing of what may have happened to their families through this same cause.

Orders taken during the present month, with only to-day to go, are over 33⅓ per cent less than they were last year, and over 15 per cent less than they were last month, showing that things are getting much worse instead of better.

In addition to this, we are keeping employed on full time at present a great many more men than we actually require, simply because they are good, faithful, capable men; and we feel it a necessity to keep such men as these employed through the need of them in better times, and also the fact that they need the work. This company has always gone the limit in keeping just as big a force going as possible. By so doing now we are accumulating stock which, although it can probably be sold at some future time, is not really good business policy, through the fact that it ties up too much money in merchandise for a small-size concern.

At the same time we are obliged to maintain in its entirety our expensive sales force, as it is impossible during a dull business period to do away with salesmen, as this is the time when they are urged harder than ever to obtain business. In this way the expenses for keeping the salesmen out on the road hustling for orders, when there are very few to be had—but through the necessity of getting every possible order we are obliged to make the effort just the same—practically absorbs all of the profit. In fact, under the present circumstances, very probably more than the profit, so that there is nothing left for the stockholders.

For all the reasons heretofore stated we urge most sincerely on you the necessity of an early adjournment of Congress and for an end to further legislation, especially that connected with business and the railroads. We ask you to do everything in your power to bring about the earliest possible adjournment, in order that this country may have at least a brief period in which to convalesce.

Business in this country is sick, terribly sick, and any more medicine of the sort that we have been having will prove more than disastrous. Instead of recovering and getting into a convalescent state, business in many cases will die outright, and through just one thing—too much medicine and too little rest.

It doesn't seem possible for me to put on paper how deeply I feel on this subject, but I can assure you that there are thousands and thousands of honest, straightforward, hard-working business men in this country who are bound to suffer, in most cases due to wrongs of others and an effort to right these wrongs.

We realize as deeply as anyone else the necessity of good laws and their enforcement, but there is always a time when wisdom calls for a cessation of activity in the legislative program, and if that time has ever come, it is here now.

We don't say that further legislation is not necessary, and we do not pretend to pass on this part of the proposition. The only point that we wish to make clear is that any further legislation now is not only dangerous but criminal. For the sake of the hard-working business men and the hard-working laboring men, please bring about an early adjournment of Congress if you can.

Yours, very truly,
RALPH B. PHILLIPS,
Treasurer and General Manager.

Mr. President, I introduced yesterday a letter and resolutions adopted by a strong and reputable business association of the city of Grand Rapids, Mich. It was along the general line of the Leland letter. I have heretofore filed communications from various business organizations to the same effect. Those gentlemen—business men, not politicians—not caring very much about what party controls this Government so long as it is controlled properly, state that business is depressed; that the country is not prospering as it ought to prosper; that enterprise is halting and prosperity waning.

I am glad that the Senator from Missouri has made his argument. He has presented the Democratic defense. I suppose it was made for the purpose of being circulated, and that it will go out to the business men of the country. It would be interesting to note the effect upon these men when they read the Senator's arguments showing that times are good and that business is booming. I can imagine what they will think of those arguments, for they know that times are not good and that business is not booming with them. Senators may declare prosperity from this floor, but such declarations will not dispel adversity in the country.

The Senator dislikes to hear Members of Congress complain of the business depression of the country. Ah, if the Senator and his party had possessed that feeling in the years gone by, we would not be in the condition we are in to-day. It was through a misrepresentation of business conditions, through persistent and willful misrepresentations, that the Republican Party was retired from power in 1910 and 1912. Calamity has been Democracy's campaign material for years. Most of the arguments and statements which the Senator has presented have been to show that business is improving. Improving over what? Not over the conditions that maintained prior to two years ago, but over the conditions that existed six months ago or perhaps three months ago—improvement in Democratic conditions.

Mr. REED. Oh, Mr. President, the Senator ought not to make that statement, when every figure I gave went back to 1912.

Mr. TOWNSEND. I repeat the statement that there is nothing that has been presented—at least if there has been, I did not so understand it—that shows that conditions are better than they were under the Republican administration of this country prior to the agitation and the election of 1912.

Mr. REED. I will have to ask the Senator, then, to read the articles which I have had incorporated into the RECORD, because they go back to that very time.

Mr. TOWNSEND. Mr. President, my attention has been called to several letters similar to the one from Mr. Leland, but I do not care to take up the time of the Senate in repeating what is known to every Senator, namely, that there is business unrest; that there is business disturbance and retrogression all over our country.

I have just returned, after a week spent in Michigan. While in a certain large shoe store in my home city, the proprietor presented to me what is known in the shoe business as a trade journal. In that journal appeared what had never been seen before, viz, several advertisements by English shoe makers and dealers. The English manufacturer was advertising his wares as of superior worth and less cost than those of his American competitor. They would not advertise if they did not expect to sell. If they sold, they would supplant the American product, and thereby injure the American producer and the American laborer. The domestic shoe business can not be prosperous if the foreigner gets its markets. Of course, the Democratic Party wants foreign goods sold in our markets; that is what they passed the Underwood tariff bill for. That measure was enacted for the purpose of promoting the importation of goods made abroad.

A late report from the Democratic Secretary of Commerce shows, if I recall the figures correctly, that we sold abroad about $37,000,000 less in value of goods during the month of April of this year than we did a year ago last April, and that we purchased of foreign countries $27,000,000 more than we did in April, 1913. You may say that that is a good thing for the consumers of the country, but the business man, the laboring man, the man of common sense in the United States knows that when our country sells less abroad and buys more from other nations the result is detrimental to the laboring and manufacturing interests of the United States. The policy of opening our markets free to the agricultural interests of the world without opening the markets of other countries to the products of our farms may be popular in this Senate, but it is not popular with the American farmer.

I will agree with the Senator from Missouri that the prices of things will eventually go down. The prices of things measured in dollars and cents will undoubtedly be less just as, according to the Senator's statement, they were less during the period of the former Wilson tariff law; but the cost of goods measured by the ability to buy will be materially increased. The gauge of prosperity in this country is a man's ability to buy.

Of what advantage to a man is a cheap price if he has not that price? Workmen who are out of employment do not have the ability to purchase. The man with failing business must economize even to the extent of privation many times. That is what has happened in this country. Savings accumulated in the past are being dissipated, new enterprises are not to any considerable extent being launched, and the march of progress is being halted. All the arguments that Senators may make will fall on deaf ears when they reach the men who are suffering from the conditions which prevail now. The people want a cessation of hostile legislation, not theoretical arguments which do not square with experience.

All of this discussion grew out of the letter from the gentleman from Detroit who called upon Congress to finish its work and go home. I repeat he was but uttering the sentiment of hundreds of thousands of business men in this country; and it does no credit to the Senator from Missouri to charge this man with being engaged in a criminal business. I do not believe he is; I do not believe that the company with which he is connected has ever been operating in restraint of trade; I do not believe there is an organization of higher standing than that particular company; but I repeat, if it is true that it is in violation of law, it should be the business of the Department of Justice to investigate it; and if it is found to be so operating, to prosecute it and all similar concerns.

But we come back to the fact that the statement which the gentleman makes, and which is corroborated by thousands of similar statements all over the country, is that industry is suffering from too much ill-digested, speculative legislation. That is the trouble with the country; and you can not cry it down by eloquent denunciation in the Senate. The people are affected by legislation. They will decide whether it is beneficial or otherwise. They have already spoken at the election recently held in New Jersey, and they are waiting now for an opportunity to express themselves on the wisdom or unwisdom of the legislative policy that has so far been carried out.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on the amendment proposed by the Senator from Nebraska to the amendment proposed by the committee.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, just a word. Again we are told that the country is being flooded with foreign-made goods, and in the same breath that prices have gone up.

Mr. TOWNSEND. If the Senator will allow me, he does not charge me with saying that? I have stated distinctly that prices would go down eventually if the tariff works as its advocates claim it will, because I can not conceive how foreign goods made at a cheaper cost will not finally supplant the American product.

Mr. REED. Then the Senator does not agree with the philosophy of the Senator from Utah, who holds that reduced prices never reach the ultimate consumer.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President——

Mr. REED. Just a moment, and I will yield.

Mr. SMOOT. I do not want the Senator to yield.

Mr. REED. If the price of boots and shoes has not gone down, then the foreign competition has not injured anybody. If it has gone down the consumer has received the benefit. It may be of some interest to say that two years before the present tariff law became effective, I know that a large shipment of foreign goods was brought in under peculiar circumstances, but it never had any effect.

Did the Senator desire to ask me something?

Mr. SMOOT. No.

Mr. REED. Very well. I have one further observation to make, and then I am through.

The Senator from Michigan told us that only a few years ago this Automobile Trust was in financial difficulties. He did not exactly specify the time. I showed in my remarks from Poor's Manual that last year its net profits were over $4,000,000. I also called attention to the fact that the year before its net profits were over $4,000,000. I know of no failure since that time. If there was any failure before that, or any financial trouble before that, it is a little peculiar that in 1912 this institution declared a stock dividend of 150 per cent on the common stock. It could not have failed before that, or it would not have had any assets on which to issue a 150 per cent stock dividend. That year it made over $4,000,000 net, and last year it made over $4,000,000 net. I am a little curious to know when it was in financial difficulties.

Mr. TOWNSEND. The Senator from Michigan nowhere stated that the Cadillac Motor Co. had ever been in financial straits. I was talking about the General Motors Co.

Mr. REED. That is exactly what I am talking about, if the Senator please. The Cadillac Motor Co.'s profits do not appear in this book, because the Cadillac Motor Co. exists to-day as a paper organization, every share of its stock and every one of its bonds being in the control of the General Motors Co.

Mr. TOWNSEND. I desire further to remind the Senator that I attempted to make no defense of any condition that is wrong there, and I know of none; and in referring to the conditions which had obtained I was simply calling to memory things that had appeared in the newspapers several years ago.

I have not given the matter any attention, and the statements I made as to those difficulties may be entirely unreliable.

Mr. OWEN. Mr. President, is it not a fact that the General Motors Co. also holds the stock and bonds of 15 or 20 of these so-called independent concerns or companies?

Mr. REED. I put a complete list of them in the RECORD, as far as I had them. There may be others.

PRODUCTION OF OIL IN OKLAHOMA.

Mr. OWEN. Mr. President, some days ago I introduced a bill, Senate bill 5550, with regard to public ownership of pipe lines, desiring that the matter might be considered. The State of Oklahoma now has an output of about 75,000,000 barrels of oil. Recently there have been the most drastic cuts in the price of the oil in Oklahoma, in the Healdton field it being cut down to 50 cents a barrel.

I desire to place in the RECORD a declaration in regard to this matter by the independent oil refiners, favoring this bill, through their counsel. I do not wish to take the time of the Senate to read it, but I should like to have it appear in the RECORD, if there be no objection.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there any objection?

Mr. SMOOT. I will ask the Senator whether it is very long?

Mr. OWEN. Yes; it is quite long.

Mr. SMOOT. Would the Senator be just as well satisfied with making it a public document?

Mr. OWEN. No; I would not.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there any objection? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

The matter referred to is as follows:

DECLARATION ON BEHALF OF INDEPENDENT OIL MEN ADVOCATING THE GOVERNMENT OWNERSHIP AND OPERATION OF PIPE LINES FOR THE TRANSPORTATION OF PETROLEUM IN INTERSTATE COMMERCE.

(By C. D. Chamberlin, general counsel the National Petroleum Association, Cleveland, Ohio.)

[Senate bill 5550.]

DECLARATION.

This declaration on behalf of the independent portion of the petroleum industry in support of the Government ownership and operation of pipe lines for the transportation of oil in interstate commerce involves two essentials—the desirability and the validity of such action on the part of Congress.

Petroleum is among the most wonderful of nature's products, and perhaps exceeds any other in the number of differing forms and uses when finally manufactured. More than 2,000 principal and by-products are said to be found in the list of commercial articles produced in whole or in part from petroleum. In one form or another it enters every home and industry—a necessity to the poor, a luxury to the rich.

While the substance has been known for centuries, the petroleum industry is but a half century old, and during that comparatively short period by its monopolization has made one man the richest in history. During four-fifths of the time since the birth of the industry the most implacable commercial contest has waged between monopoly and its competitors ever recorded in industrial annals. The struggle has been more than commercial; it has been physical, political, social, and legal, and finally has engaged even the power of the sovereignty of the Nation and the end is not yet.

The natural divisions of the petroleum industry under normal conditions are four: (1) Production, (2) transportation, (3) manufacture, and (4) merchandising.

PRODUCTION.

3. Discovery in commercial quantities.

While it is true that petroleum as a substance has been known for hundreds of years, its discovery in commercial quantities was made about the year 1840 in connection with the production of salt in the salt wells or salt springs in northwestern Pennsylvania by Samuel Kier, who bottled and sold it for medicinal purposes under the name of "Kier's Petroleum or Rock Oil," and was used chiefly as a liniment.

In 1854 George H. Bissel, a graduate of Dartmouth College and by profession a journalist and teacher, saw a sample of this bottled "rock oil" in the laboratory of his old college and was impressed with the commercial possibilities of the product, and at once organized the Pennsylvania Rock Oil Co., the first oil company in the United States. Mr. Bissel sent a sample of the oil to Prof. Silliman, who made an analysis which predicated its commercial value. The company employed Edwin L. Drake to locate and drill a well near Titusville, Pa., which he completed in 1859. The well was only 70 feet deep, and was drilled through the rock by means of a spring pole. It took three months' time to complete it, and cost $3,000. The well came in at 25 barrels a day, and the oil sold at $18 a barrel.

The second well was drilled by William Barnsdall, a Titusville tanner. This was completed on February 1, 1860, and was also a 25-barrel well. In five months he had sold over $16,000 worth of the oil.

Production progressed rapidly from that time on, so that by the end of 1860 the total production of petroleum in the State of Pennsylvania amounted to 500,000 barrels. The average price for which the oil sold was $20 a barrel. (See pp. 12–38, Production of Petroleum in 1912, by Dr. David T. Day, Director of the Petroleum Division of the United States Geological Survey.)

2. The fields of production in the United States.

The field of production known as the Pennsylvania or Appalachian field, in which petroleum was first produced in commercial quantities by Col. Drake in 1859, extended rapidly over the entire western portion of Pennsylvania into New York and in a southwesterly direction, following the mountain trend, through West Virginia, southern Ohio, Kentucky, and Tennessee, and, with the close of the year 1912, had produced nearly 2,000,000,000 barrels of crude oil.

In the year 1876 the production of California was 12,000 barrels of petroleum; in the year 1887 Colorado produced 76,000 barrels; in the year 1889 Indiana produced 33,000 barrels; in the same year Illinois produced 1,460 barrels and Kansas 500 barrels; in 1896 Texas produced 1,450 barrels; in 1894 Wyoming produced 2,000 barrels; in 1900 Oklahoma produced 6,000 barrels; and in 1902 Louisiana produced 548,000 barrels. The above dates mark the discovery of substantial fields of oil in these several States.

The total amount of oil produced in California ending with the year 1912 was 542,000,000 barrels; in Colorado, over 10,000,000 barrels; in Indiana, over 100,000,000 barrels; in Illinois, nearly 200,000,000 barrels; in Kansas 49,000,000 barrels; in Texas, 168,000,000 barrels; in Oklahoma, 300,000,000 barrels; in Wyoming, nearly 2,000,000 barrels; and in Louisiana, over 63,000,000 barrels; the total production of the United States ending the year 1912 being 2,820,426,549 barrels, having a total value of $2,338,032,130.

In area the Pennsylvania or Appalachian field is greatest in extent and its production has been greatest, but for some years past has been gradually decreasing, its highest point having been reached in the year 1891, when it produced over 54,000,000 barrels of petroleum. The area of the Indiana field is limited and has probably been defined, since its production has been gradually decreasing during the last five years. The Illinois field is also a field of limited production and has likewise been decreasing during the last five years. The midcontinent field, including Kansas, Oklahoma, northern Texas, and Louisiana, rivals the Appalachian field in the extent of its territory and is not wholly defined, its production having rapidly increased during the last five years. The Texas field proper is essentially that portion of Texas bordering upon the Gulf, and has likewise been decreasing, so that in all probability its extent is defined. The California field, at present producing the largest amount of any field of production in the United States, extends over the entire southern half of the State and has shown the most rapid increase in production during the last five years of any field within the United States.

3. The amount of production.

The rapidity with which this wonderful industry has developed is perhaps most graphically shown by stating the total production by decades. In 1860 there were produced in the United States 500,000 barrels of petroleum; in 1870, 5,260,000; in 1880, 26,286,000; in 1890, 45,823,000; in 1900, 63,660,000; in 1910, 209,557,000. In 1913 the estimated amount by Dr. David T. Day on the data that he has already compiled shows the total production to be 242,000,000 barrels, which has added over $250,000,000 to the Nation's wealth.

4. The world's production.

The United States, the first country to produce oil in commercial quantities, has during the entire period maintained its place as first in the rank of producing countries. In the year 1912, as shown in Dr. Day's report above referred to, at page 137, the other countries, in order of their rank, were Russia, Mexico, Roumania, Dutch East Indies, Galicia, India, Japan, Peru, Germany, Canada, and Italy, the total production for the year being 351,178,236 barrels, of which amount the United States produced 222,113,218 barrels, or 63.25 per cent. No other single country produced more than 5 per cent except Russia, which produced less than 20 per cent. From these figures it is plain how important this industry is to the United States and to the world.

5. Value.

The total value in dollars of the production of petroleum in the United States for the year ending 1912 is reported by Dr. Day in his report for that year as $2,338,000,000. Adding the value of the production for the year 1913 would bring the total up to the enormous figure of $2,600,000,000; and it must be remembered that this is merely the value of the oil at the mouth of the well. The amount of property invested in production, refining, transportation, and marketing of this product in the United States has never been estimated, but must run into the hundreds of millions of dollars, and the increased value of the various products obtained by the process of manufacture renders the total value produced by the industry almost incalculable. Its value in money, however, tells but a small part of the worth of the petroleum industry to the human family. No other product is so rich in its various uses, and no other product has become so essential to the material, social, and political progress of the country.

TRANSPORTATION.

1. The vehicles of transportation.

When oil was first produced the only method of transportation known from the well to the refinery was by means of the ordinary wooden barrel, which was loaded upon a wagon and drawn to the nearest refinery or the nearest railroad station, and in the latter case loaded upon a car and transported to a refining point or to seaboard for export.

Much of the oil produced in the early development of the Pennsylvania field was barreled and loaded upon barges and floated down the streams to refineries located at Pittsburgh, Pa. The loss by reason of defective cooperage suggested the building of a tank upon the barge and carrying the oil in bulk. This in turn suggested the building of a tank upon a car, the first tank cars being merely cars mounted with wooden tanks, which were rapidly succeeded by the cylindrical iron tank cars. The tank barge, floated upon the streams, developed into the tank vessel that is now in use upon the ocean, the Great Lakes, and the navigable rivers for the transportation of oil in bulk.

With the advent of the tank containers in transportation the pipe line suggested itself as a convenient and less expensive method of transporting the oil from the well to the refinery or to the railroad station. Gen. S. D. Karns, of Parkersburg, W. Va., in 1860, was the first to use the pipe line for the transportation of oil. This pipe line was laid from Burning Springs to Parkersburg, W. Va., the oil flowing by gravity a distance of 36 miles. A few years later J. S. Hutchison, the inventor of the rotary pump, conceived the idea of forcing the oil through pipes by means of his pump. The first pipe line through which oil was forced in this manner was laid from the Sherman well, near Titusville, Pa., to the terminus of the railroad at the Miller farm, a distance of about 3 miles, the pipes being made of cast iron.

In 1862 a bill was introduced in the Pennsylvania Legislature to authorize the construction of a pipe line from Oil Creek to Kittanning, but this bill was defeated by those interested in teaming oil.

Samuel Van Syckle, of Titusville, Pa., was the first to put down a working pipe line. It was only 5 miles long, extending from Pithole to Miller's farm, and carried but eight barrels of oil per day. By the end of the year 1871 more than 20 pipe lines had been constructed in northwestern Pennsylvania. In the year 1872 the free pipe line bill was passed by both houses of the Pennsylvania Legislature, being the first pipe line legislation. In the same year the American Transfer Co. began to build and acquire by purchase pipe lines in the vicinity of Oil Creek and in the lower oil fields. This was the first Standard Oil Co. pipe line.

In the year 1874 the Pennsylvania Legislature passed a bill regulating pipe-line companies, requiring them to make monthly statements of runs, stocks, and receipts. In the same year a large number of independent pipe lines were consolidated under the name of the United Pipe Lines, and this association or merger was the first step taken in the direction of settling the question of transportation of oil by pipe lines for all time. It erected hundreds of 35,000-barrel oil tanks to store the oversupply of oil, made pipe-line connections to all of the tanks at the wells, and built pumping stations where they were needed to handle the oil.

In 1880 the business of the American Transfer Co. was transferred to the United Pipe Lines, and in 1884 the United Pipe Lines were transferred to the National Transit Co., all of which were Standard Oil properties, and the National Transit Co. became the Standard Oil Co.'s agency for acquiring, operating, and promoting transportation of petroleum by pipe line throughout all of the fields of the United States, except in the State of California.

2. Control of transportation.

At page 33 of the "Report on the transportation of petroleum," May 2, 1906, by the Commissioner of Corporations, it is said:

"The petroleum industry affords a striking example of the importance of the transportation problem. The cost of transportation is an exceedingly large factor in the cost of oil to the consumer. Consequently, any difference in transportation costs, as between different producers and refiners of oil, has a powerful influence upon their respective positions in competition.

"The importance of transportation, with respect to petroleum, grows chiefly out of the fact that petroleum and most of its products are low-priced commodities. They are heavy in proportion to their value. Moreover, the value of the raw material, crude petroleum, is a large proportion of the total cost of the finished product, while the cost of refining is comparatively small, and a reasonable profit to the refiner is also a comparatively small factor per unit of product. Even an apparently slight difference in transportation rates may, therefore, enable one refiner to sell at a profit while his competitor is losing money."

And, at page 29 of the same report, it is stated:

"Chief among the advantages which, aside from present railroad discriminations the Standard possesses, are the immense pipe-line systems of the company, which enable it at low cost to collect crude oil at highly favorable locations for refining. The great majority of the competitors of the Standard are located in, or very near to, oil-producing territories, and are thus dependent upon railroads for the transportation of oil almost the entire distance from the wells to the final consumer. The Standard Oil Co., on the other hand, often transports its crude oil hundreds of miles in pipe lines in order to refine it at points much nearer to great consuming markets."

The Interstate Commerce Commission, in its report on "Railroad discriminations and monopolies in coal and oil," in obedience to public resolution No. 8, approved March 7, 1906, entitled "Joint resolution instruction the Interstate Commerce Commission to make examinations into the subject of railroad discriminations and monopolies in coal and oil, and report on the same from time to time," which report was made to the Senate and House of Representatives under date of January 28, 1907, at page 5, said:

"The main purpose of this report is to point out in a general way the methods by which the Standard Oil Co. has built up and perpetuated this monopoly, and the relation of the agencies of transportation to that monopoly. At the basis of the monopoly of the Standard Oil Co. in the production and distribution of petroleum products rests the pipe line. * * *

"The advantages which the possession of these pipe lines give to the Standard are apparent upon the surface. The refineries of the independent producer who, as a rule, has no pipe line of any considerable extent, and who generally depends upon that of the Standard for his supply of crude material, are located for the most part near the source of the crude supply. * * *

"The possession of these pipe lines enables the Standard to absolutely control the price of crude petroleum and to determine, therefore, the price which its competitor in a given locality shall pay. * * * In any industry whoever controls the avenues of transportation of either the raw material or the finished product can speedily drive all competitors out of existence. The production and distribution of petroleum is no exception to this rule. While there may be a feeble competition in limited areas, even that must rest largely upon the sufferance of the Standard Oil Co. so long as it has practically the exclusive use of its present system of pipe lines. * * *

"We have in this record a vivid account of several attempts of this character—the construction and operation of pipe lines by independent concerns—and whoever has listened to this testimony will readily appreciate why success was difficult of attainment in these cases and why capital might well hesitate before embarking in such an enterprise. In the past every obstacle has been thrown in the way of such undertakings, and especially have they been opposed by the railroads of the country, whose right of way has generally stood as a Chinese wall against all attempts to extend pipe lines. This can be understood from a railway standpoint, for the pipe line takes the traffic which the railway otherwise obtains. What is difficult of comprehension is that the railway has in the cases brought to our attention extended to the Standard every facility for the construction of pipe lines, while doing all in its power to prevent their construction by the competitors of the Standard."

3. Cost of transportation.

In the report of the Commissioner of Corporations on the "Transportation of petroleum," May 2, 1906, at page 60, it is stated:

"The advantage of the location of the seaboard refineries and of the Whiting refinery grows out of the fact that the cost of pipe-line transportation to them from the oil fields is much less than the cost of rail transportation which the competitors have for the most part to pay in order to reach the same points. The Bureau of Corporations has not secured exact information as to the cost to the Standard Oil Co. of transporting oil through its great trunk pipe lines. The reports of the Prairie Oil & Gas Co., which is controlled by the Standard, show, however, that the operating expense of transporting crude oil through the trunk pipe line from Humboldt, Kans., to Sugar Creek, Mo., a distance of about 117 miles, is less than 1 cent per barrel of 42 gallons, and it is highly probable that the operating expense does not increase proportionately with an increase of distance. Even supposing expense to increase proportionately with distance, the operating cost of transporting oil from the Appalachian oil fields to New York Harbor, an average distance of about 300 miles, would still be less than 3 cents per barrel, if the figures of the Prairie Oil & Gas Co. may be taken as typical. * * *

"An allowance of 5 per cent for depreciation and 5 per cent for interest upon the actual investment of the Prairie Oil & Gas Co. in its pipe line from Humboldt to Sugar Creek is equal to about 3⅜ cents per barrel of crude oil (42 gallons) transported during the first five months of 1905. But the pipe line does not seem to have been used during this period to more than half its full capacity, and its capacity has since been increased more than one-half at a much less than proportional increase of investment. Even if the line is operated at considerably less than its full capacity, therefore 2 cents per barrel is a sufficient allowance for interest and depreciation, provided, of course, that the oil fields continue to produce largely for a long period. * * *

"A liberal allowance for the entire cost of transporting crude oil by trunk pipe line from the Appalachian field to the Atlantic seaboard would not exceed 10 cents per barrel of 42 gallons, or about one-fourth or a cent per gallon. It is quite likely that the cost is less than 8 cents per barrel, or about one-fifth of a cent per gallon. * * *

"This estimated cost of transportation by pipe line is only about one-fourth the cost of rail transportation from the refineries of the independent concerns in these oil fields to the seaboard and to Chicago, respectively. The freight rate from western Pennsylvania refineries to New York Harbor is almost exactly 1 cent per gallon, and to Chicago about 1¼ cents."

4. Monopoly of control and use of pipe lines.

The report of the Commissioner of Corporations, heretofore referred to, at page 37 says:

"The Standard Oil Co. has all but a monopoly of the pipe lines in the United States. Its control of them is one of the chief sources of its power. While in the older oil fields pipe lines are by the State laws common carriers, there has been little attempt by the States to regulate their charges. The Federal Government has not as yet exercised any control over pipe lines engaged in interstate commerce. The result is that the charges made by the Standard for transporting oil through its pipe lines for outside concerns are altogether excessive, and in practice are largely prohibitive. Since the charges far exceed the cost of the service, the Standard has a great advantage over such of its competitors as are forced to use its pipe lines to secure their crude oil."

MANUFACTURE.

1. Ownership and location of refineries.

The refineries owned and operated by the Standard Oil companies may be roughly divided according to location as follows: Seaboard, Eastern Interior, Lima-Indiana, Mississippi Valley, Texas, California, and Rocky Mountain territory refineries. The Standard Oil Co. of New Jersey owns the Bayonne works, at Bayonne, N. J.; the Eagle works, at Constable Hook, N. J.; the Bayway works, at Bayway, N. Y.; the Baltimore works, at Baltimore, Md.; the Baton Rouge works, at Baton Rouge, La.; and the Parkersburg works, at Parkersburg, W. Va. The Standard Oil Co. of New York owns the Pratt works, at Brooklyn, N. Y.; Long Island works, at Long Island City; Sone & Fleming works, at New York, N. Y.; and the Buffalo works, at Buffalo, N. Y. The Atlantic Refining Co. owns the Philadelphia works, at Point Breeze, near Philadelphia, Pa.; the Eclipse works, at Franklin, Pa.; and the Pittsburgh works, at Pittsburgh, Pa. The Vacuum Oil Co. owns the Olean works, at Olean, N. Y. The Solar Refining Co. owns the works at Lima, Ohio. The Standard Oil Co. of Ohio owns the works at Cleveland, Ohio. The Standard Oil Co. of Indiana owns the works at Whiting, Ind., the works at Sugar Creek, Mo., and the works at Wood River, Ill. The Standard Oil Co. of Kansas owns the works at Neodesha, Kans. The Standard Oil Co. of California the works at Point Richmond and also the works at El Segundo, Cal. The Magnolia Refining Co. the works at Beaumont and also the works at Corsicana, Tex. The United Oil Co. the works at Florence, Colo. These are the plants owned and operated by the various Standard Oil Co. interests, all of which were controlled by the holding company, the Standard Oil Co. of New Jersey, prior to May, 1911, when the holding company was required by court decree to return its stock to the stockholders of the various subsidiary companies.

Of the refineries independent of the Standard interests, there are at present 38 located in the State of Pennsylvania—2 at Markus Hook, near Philadelphia; the remainder at Bradford, Warren, Titusville, Oil City, and Pittsburgh, Pa., or in the immediate vicinity of those points. In Kansas there are 16 independent refineries located in the Kansas producing district; in Ohio 6—1 at Marietta, 2 at Cleveland, 1 at Findlay, and 3 at Toledo; in Oklahoma there are 27 located in the field of production; 4 in Illinois; 7 in Texas; 3 in New York; 1 in New Jersey; 4 in Louisiana; 2 in Wyoming; 1 in Missouri; 1 in Arkansas; and 44 in California.

2. Products and processes.

The products of petroleum are so numerous and varied that any specific description of them would be beyond the necessities of this declaration; and the same is true concerning the processes of manufacture. The Commissioner of Corporations, in his Report on the Petroleum Industry, part 1, published May 20, 1907, at page 254, states:

"Petroleum is a mixture of numerous hydrocarbons. The process of refining consists of the separation, through distillation, of the crude oil into certain fractions and the purification and standardization of these so that they meet commercial needs. The chief characteristics of the several divisions which indicate their serviceability for commercial uses are gravity, inflammability, color, and viscosity. * * * As the vapor comes from the still there is no immediate break in its character, but instead a gradual change, so that any fraction has the average quality of the vapors coming over between the limits set for it. If these limits be not too widely separated, the fraction is comparatively homogeneous. By changing the limits, both the quantity and quality of the fraction is affected. * * * Much skill may be exercised, not only in making the original separations, but also in manipulating the products so as to obtain the highest quality and the largest yield of the more valuable products. The number of possible products is so large and each is subject to so wide a range in quality that the refining business is more intricate than is perhaps ordinarily supposed."

At page 258 of the same report the commissioner gives the separations resulting from refining Pennsylvania crude by two processes, the first known as the "tar process," now practically abandoned, and the second known as the "cylinder stock process." By the first process the products obtained are:

1. Cymogene and rhigolene—usually not condensed.
2. Crude naphtha, redistilled, giving—
   a. Gasoline (chiefly 86° to 90° Baume).
   b. Gasoline or naphtha (chiefly 68° to 76° Baume).
   c. Benzine.
   d. Gas naphtha.

3. Illuminating oil distillates, treated, giving—
   Water white.
   Prime white.
   Standard white or export.
4. Tar or residuum, redistilled, giving—
   a. Gas oil.
   b. Fuel oil.
   c. Paraffin distillate, pressed, giving—
      (1) Paraffin wax.
      (2) Paraffin lubricating oils
   d. Greases, pitch, roofers' wax, coke.

By the cylinder process:

1, 2, and 3 are obtained and handled as in the tar process.
4. Wax distillate, redistilled, giving—
   a. Gas oil, heavy illuminating oil.
   b. Wax distillate, pressed, giving—
      (1) Pressed oils, reduced, giving—
         (a) 300 illuminating oil.
         (b) Neutral oils, filtered, etc., giving spindle oils, wool oils, engine oils, etc.
      (2) Paraffin wax.
5. Cylinder stock (residue), i. e., unfiltered cylinder oil.
   a. Filtered cylinder oils.

The percentages of each product obtained by the above processes have varied materially in the different qualities of crude, the different methods of operating the refineries, and to accommodate the changes in market requirements. At page 261 of the same report this latter phase is graphically shown by a comparison of the percentages of the various products for the years 1880, 1889, 1899, and 1904, or practically a period of 25 years. In 1880 the percentage of illuminating oil derived from crude was 75.2 per cent; in 1904, 48.2 per cent; fuel oil and residuum, 1.6 per cent and 18.5 per cent, respectively; lubricating oils, 2.1 per cent and 11.6 per cent; naphtha and gasoline, 10.3 per cent and 10.3 per cent; paraffin wax, 0.1 per cent and 1.4 per cent. At the present time the average percentages of each of the above products might be stated as follows: Illuminating oil, 45 per cent; fuel oil and residuum, 5 per cent; lubricating oils, 23 per cent; naphtha and gasoline, 20 per cent; and paraffin wax, 2 per cent. But even these averages are subject to very wide differences according to the different processes used in refining. For instance, in the mid-continent field and in the fields producing asphaltum oil many refiners merely distill off the gasoline and illuminating oil, selling the entire residual as fuel oil, thereby incurring an economic waste. The better equipped and more scientifically operated refineries in any field produce the largest possible quantities of those products having ready sale at highest margin of profit. At the present time gasoline and motor spirits are being produced in quantities averaging 30 per cent of the entire crude product.

3. Capacities for refining.

Referring to Dr. Day's "Report on the production of petroleum" for the year 1912, at page 15, it will be noted that there was delivered for refining during that year 177,916,475 barrels of crude oil, for fuel purposes during the same period 58,560,039 barrels, making a total delivery of 236,476,514 barrels, or a decline during the year in total stocks of over 14,000,000 barrels. The total stocks of crude on hand on December 31, 1912, was 122,869,702 barrels, nearly half of which was held in the mid-continent field.

While it is difficult to state the exact amount of crude consumed by each individual refinery on account of there being no statistics published showing such amounts, for obvious reasons, yet from the best obtainable information the annual refining capacities of the various refineries are stated in the following table as approximately but not entirely correct. From the total amount of the refining capacities of all refineries therein shown, being 198,310,000 barrels, it will be seen that this amount is approximately 112 per cent of the total amount of crude delivered for refining during the year 1912. Inasmuch as refineries can only be operated to the greatest advantage by being continually operated at their maximum capacities, and that their operation requires very little idle time and are usually run during all days of the year and all hours of the day, the excess would indicate the nearest to accuracy in the figures submitted in the table:

MERCHANDISING.

1. Jobbers, dealers, and distributing stations.

In the sale and distribution of the manufactured products of petroleum generally, the manufacturer sells to the jobber or distributor, he to the dealer, and the dealer to the consumer. This normal condition formerly prevailed in the marketing and distribution of petroleum and its products. At the present time it is estimated that the number of independent jobbers in petroleum and its products in the United States is about 1,500, whose business is largely that of buying from the refiners in carload lots and making distribution in smaller quantities to dealers in the territory surrounding the location of such jobber. There are dealers in these products in every city and town in the United States, usually the grocer or hardware dealer, or both.

For the purpose of securing as large a profit in the petroleum business as possible, the Standard Oil Co. at an early date adopted the practice of putting in distributing stations, ignoring the jobber and dealer in many instances. These distributing stations are now located in nearly every important town in the United States, and consist of tanks for receiving the oil in bulk shipments by tank cars and distributing it throughout the town in which such tank station is located, and also in the outlying district by tank wagon so far as gasoline and illuminating oil are concerned. It is fair to say that, in a rough way, there are more than 5,000 such stations belonging to the Standard Oil interests throughout the United States, and many of the larger independent refineries have felt it necessary to adopt the same method of distribution as a settled commercial condition. This method undoubtedly eliminates a great deal of waste and unnecessary cost to the final consumer, but can only be maintained by the provision of enormous capital.

Commenting upon the relation of marketing methods the Commissioner of Corporations in his "Report on the petroleum industry," part 1, May 20, 1907, at page 20, says:

"The relatively greater use of the bulk system of delivery by the Standard than by independent concerns has an important bearing on the degree of monopoly power enjoyed by the Standard Oil Co. * * * In the first place, the shipper of oil in barrels or other small packages pays freight on the weight of the container as well as on the contents, whereas a tank-car shipper pays only on the weight of the oil. As a barrel when empty weighs one-fifth as much as when full of oil, this means in the case of barrel shippers an increase of about 25 per cent in freight charges alone. Again, freight must be paid on the empty barrel when returned or if sold without returning there is often some loss. Furthermore, the cost of teaming oil in barrels or other packages after it has been delivered at railroad stations is often greater than the corresponding cost of local delivery in bulk. This is particularly true where the volume of business is large. Finally and most important, the bulk system is greatly preferred by retail dealers as cleaner and safer. All of this means that shippers of oil in barrels or other small packages are at a disadvantage in competition. * * * The Standard can maintain excessive prices in towns where competitors use only barrel delivery without much danger of losing control of the greater part of the trade.

"In the second place, the Standard's system of direct sale to retail dealers, in conjunction with the advantage of bulk delivery, favors the practice of price discrimination so destructive of competition. If the Standard Oil Co. sold its oil through jobbers, it would have to charge substantially the same net price for all parts of its product, as the logical result of a large wholesale business is always to equalize prices after allowing for cost of delivery. With the jobber eliminated, it is possible to maintain differences in prices between different towns and sections of the country all out of proportion to differences in cost. * * * This method of predatory competition keeps independent concerns small and weak and often destroys their business entirely. Only a competitor with enormous resources can afford so to extend his marketing business as to fight the Standard on equal terms."

2. Domestic and export markets.

The Commissioner of Corporations in his "Report on the petroleum industry," part 2, published August 5, 1907, at page 316, says:

"The export of illuminating oil in 1904, according to the estimate of the Standard Oil Co., was 58.9 per cent of the production of such oil, and according to the census figures and export statistics 56.1 per cent. The naphtha exported, on the other hand, according to the census and export statistics, was only about 8.6 per cent of the total production of naphtha. The lubricating-oil exports were about 27.6 per cent of that product. Of paraffin wax—a product small in quantity, but high in value—the exports are proportionately large, about 58 per cent of the production in 1904."

Dr. Day, in his report on the "Production of petroleum" in 1912, at page 106, gives the total amount of exports of mineral oils from the United States for that year, in comparison with the total production of oil in the United States for that year, the total production in gallons being 9,328,755,156, the total exports in gallons 1,883,479,897, or roughly 20 per cent of the total amount produced was exported. Of the total amount exported 1,026,138,000 gallons were illuminating oil or the lighter products, 216,393,000 gallons were lubricating oils, and 266,236,000 gallons residuum, the total value of which was $124,210,382. From the above figures it will appear that the consumption of petroleum in the United States is enormous as compared with that of any other country.

3. Prices and profits.

It is a well-known fact that the petroleum prices, both crude and refined, are fixed by the Standard Oil Co. or companies in affiliation known as Standard interests. The prices of crude oil in the various fields bear no relation to each other based upon refining values. While oil produced in the midcontinent field is transported to all refineries located east thereof belonging to the Standard interests through pipe lines owned by the Standard interests, the prices in such fields bear slight relation to the average prices fixed in the various domestic or foreign markets. Prices in the different localities for the finished products in the United States bear little relation to the cost of crude, the cost of refining, or the cost of transportation, but depend more upon the amount of competition against the Standard in any particular market.

In competitive areas prices are held low. In noncompetitive areas prices are held, relatively, exorbitantly high. In the foreign markets, if it suits the Standard to attempt to drive out competition, prices in that particular foreign market will be low as compared with the average export prices, while in such foreign markets without competition prices are held higher than the prices in the domestic markets.

The Commissioner of Corporations, in his report above referred to, at page 425, says:

"While the prices of illuminating oil in the principal foreign markets have for years been relatively lower than the prices in the United States, this disparity became especially conspicuous during the years 1903, 1904, and 1905. During those years the domestic prices stood at a much higher level than for many years before, while prices in the principal foreign markets, particularly in 1904 and 1905, were sharply reduced, with the result that the average price in leading foreign markets, like the United Kingdom, Germany, and the Orient, stood at times from 2 to 3 cents below the average price in the United States, transportation costs, difference in quality of oil, etc., being taken into account."

And on page 427 of the same report:

"The policy of the Standard Oil Co. in charging much higher prices in the domestic than in the foreign trade is an injustice and injury to the American consumer which is not compensated for by any material advantage to American producers of crude oil or to American labor." (See Report of the Industrial Commission, vol. 1, p. 570.)

The Interstate Commerce Commission, in its report to Congress in obedience to public resolution No. 8, approved March 7, 1906, made January 28, 1907, at page 13, says:

"The only knowledge this commission has of the competitive methods of the Standard Oil Co. is derived from the evidence taken in this investigation. We have already said that this testimony was under oath; that the witnesses were subject to cross-examination by the attorneys of the Standard Oil Co.; that that company was given permission to explain or rebut the facts shown. This evidence, if true, demonstrates that in the past the competitive methods of that company have been unfair and often disreputable; that its motto has been the destruction of competition at any cost, and that this policy has been pursued without much reference to decency or conscience. It is significant that the larger independent refiners sell the greater part of their product in foreign countries. One of these testified that 75 per cent of his product went abroad, and that he could compete with the Standard Oil Co. in Germany, where its methods in this country would not be tolerated, but that he could not compete with it here."

And at page 4 of the same report the commission said:

"Refined oil is sent from the Standard Co.'s refinery at Whiting, Ind., which is practically the same as Chicago, to both New Orleans and Denver, the distance being almost exactly the same, and the actual cost to the railway of transporting petroleum to these two points is not much different. The rates upon which it moves, however, is about 2 cents per gallon higher in case of Denver than in case of New Orleans, and the cost to the Standard Co. at these two cities differs to that extent. The price paid by the consumer in New Orleans was said to be 8½ cents a gallon; in Denver, 20 cents a gallon. Our impression from this whole record before us is that the chief effort of the Standard Oil Co. in the past has been to destroy competition, and that its principal profit has come from eliminating, in one way or another, its competitor."

TRANSPORTATION BY PIPE LINES.

As this declaration deals with the question of transportation by pipe lines, and advocates the ownership by the Government of such pipe lines engaged in the transportation of petroleum in interstate commerce, this question will be discussed under the following heads: I. The monopolistic nature of pipe lines; II. The desirability of Government ownership and operation of interstate pipe lines; III. The practicability of Government ownership and operation of interstate pipe lines; and IV. The validity of Government ownership and operation of interstate pipe lines.

I. THE MONOPOLISTIC NATURE OF PIPE LINES.

1. The cost of transportation of petroleum by pipe line is so low as to preclude other means of transportation in any large volume.

In the report of the Commissioner of Corporations on the "Transportation of petroleum," published May 2, 1906, at page 60, it is stated:

"The reports of the Prairie Oil & Gas Co., which is controlled by the Standard, show, however, that the operating expense of transportation of crude oil through the trunk line from Humboldt, Kans., to Sugar Creek, Mo., a distance of 117 miles, is less than 1 cent per barrel of 42 gallons. * * * An allowance of 5 per cent for depreciation and 5 per cent for interest upon the actual investment of the Prairie Oil & Gas Co. in its pipe line from Humboldt to Sugar Creek is equal to about 2⅞ cents per barrel of crude oil (42 gallons) transported during the first five months of 1905. But the pipe line does not seem to have been used during this period to more than about half its full capacity; and its capacity has since been increased more than one-half at a much less than proportional increase of investment. Even if the line is operated at considerably less than its full capacity, therefore, 2 cents per barrel is sufficient allowance for interest and depreciation."

The Commissioner of Corporations in his "Report on the petroleum industry," part 1, published May 20, 1907, at page 231, gives the estimated cost of transporting oil through the trunk pipe lines of the Standard and Tide Water Cos. The cost per barrel for operating expense is stated to be 3.32 cents; depreciation (5 per cent on investment of $15,543,000), 2.51 cents; interest on investment, at 10 per cent, 5.01 cents; total, 10.84 cents. With interest on investment at 5 per cent the cost, including interest and depreciation, would be 8.34 cents per barrel.

The cost is also given, at page 233 of the same report, for transporting oil by pipe line from Lima, Ohio, to Bear Creek, Pa., as follows: Operating cost, 1.98 cents per barrel; depreciation (5 per cent on investment of $5,500,000), 2.28 cents; 5 per cent on investment, 2.28 cents; making a total cost of 6.54 cents per barrel.

On page 234, same report, the cost is also estimated for transporting oil from Lima, Ohio, to seaboard, as follows: Operating expense, 5.30 cents per barrel; depreciation, 4.79 cents; interest, at 5 per cent, 4.79 cents; total cost, 14.88 cents. Also, on page 237, the cost from Lima, Ohio, to Whiting, Ind., including interest and depreciation, is given at 5.02 cents per barrel; and, at page 238, from the midcontinent field to Griffith, Ind., the cost is given as being about 9 cents per barrel, making the through charge, equivalent to the sum of the local charges, 28 cents per barrel from the midcontinent field to seaboard, including 5 per cent depreciation and 5 per cent interest on investment.

The rail rate on petroleum in carload lots from western Pennsylvania to New York Harbor is 16½ cents per 100 pounds, which is equivalent to 45 cents a barrel. To Philadelphia the rail rate is 14½ cents per 100 pounds, which is equivalent to 39 cents a barrel, which is the pipe-line charge. And without further comparisons it may be said, generally, that the pipe-line tariffs published by such pipe-line companies as are professedly common carriers are practically the same as the rail rates, although no tariffs are published by the Prairie Oil & Gas Co. for transportation from the midcontinent field to Griffith, Ind., or by the Ohio Oil Co. or Tide Water Pipe Co. from the Illinois field to seaboard.

The conclusion of the Commissioner of Corporations, at page 239, same report, referring to the rate to New York, says:

"It is obvious, therefore, that the rate of 45 cents was altogether extortionate, and it is no wonder that no use whatever was made of it by independent shippers."

At page 240 the following table is given, showing a comparison of selected rates by the Standard's pipe lines, with estimated cost of transportation:

[1] Part of distance is estimated.

The Interstate Commerce Commission, in their report under public resolution No. 8, approved March 7, 1906, under date of January 28, 1907, at page 5, said:

"The expense of pumping oil is very much less than the cost of transporting it by rail. It was said that the actual cost of pumping a barrel of oil 100 miles was about 2 cents; and while this must vary with different conditions, the estimate seems to be sufficiently high on the average. The cost to the Standard of transporting a barrel of oil from the Kansas field to the Atlantic seaboard would not be much, if any, above 30 cents."

2. The right of way must be secured by grant of sovereign power.

At page 11 of the brief for the United States, in the Supreme Court of the United States, in United States et al. v. The Ohio Oil Co. et al., Nos. 481, 482, 483, 506, 507, and 508, appeals from the United States Commerce Court, which cases are commonly known as the "Pipe Line cases," the following statement is made:

"It may be further stated that the pipe lines in question were located in part upon or across the rights of way of various railroad companies, upon or across public highways, and that 'said pipe lines are and always have been located, maintained, and operated over public highways or on the rights of way of railroad companies,' and 'that petitioner's predecessors in title did at certain points lay the pipe lines in question along or across public highways and streets in said State,' and 'that at various points petitioner's pipe lines are laid and are being operated upon, along, or across the rights of way of railroad companies engaged in interstate commerce.' (No. 482; R. 86–88.) In its answer the United States alleges that the predecessor in title of petitioner did for long distances lay said pipe in, along, and across certain of the navigable rivers of the United States, including the Hudson River, any private use whereof is contrary to the public policy of the United States. (No. 482; R. 35.) Petitioner does not deny that its pipe was so laid, though it does deny that what it did in that behalf is contrary to the public policy of the United States."

And at page 14 of the same brief:

"Its line to Griffith, Ind., is the only pipe line extending from the mid-continent field eastward. This is laid in part over the right of way of the Atchison, Topeka & Santa Fe Railway Co. from Sibley, Mo., to Joliet, Ill., a distance of about 500 miles (No. 506; R. 32–33), and portions of the company's lines are laid over the public domain in the Indian Territory and Oklahoma." (No. 506; R. 41 to 61, inclusive.)

The above instances of the use of railroad companies' rights of way, navigable rivers, public territory, and highways might be repeated with respect to the lines of all trunk pipe lines. In addition to which it appears in the record of the "Pipe Line cases," above referred to, that in the States of New York, Pennsylvania, West Virginia, Ohio, Indiana, Oklahoma, and Texas pipe-line companies are organized as common carriers, having the right of eminent domain and the power to condemn private property. It is true that the grant of the right of eminent domain comes from the State instead of national sovereignty, but if these rights are used to provide instrumentalities of interstate commerce, such interstate commerce and such instrumentalities, by reason thereof, fall under the control of the Federal Government to the same degree as though the Government itself had exercised its power of eminent domain for the establishment of a post road or a Government railroad.

3. The cost of construction of interstate pipe lines is beyond the range of ordinary business investment.

In part 1 of the "Report on the petroleum industry," by the Commissioner of Corporations, published May 20, 1907, at page 217, the cost per mile of the pipe line laid from Humboldt, Kans., to Kansas City, Kans., and from Chanute, Kans., to Humboldt, and from Caney, Kans., to Neodesha, Kans., is given. For the 8-inch lines from Humboldt to Kansas City, 117¼ miles long, the cost per mile was as follows: For pipe, $4,881.07; for fittings, $7.63; for right of way, $78.47; for construction, $1,030.38; making a total cost per mile of $5,497.55.

The 6-inch line, from Chanute to Humboldt, 8½ miles: For pipe, $2,799.94; fittings, $0.10; right of way, $8.03; construction, $573.78; total, $3,381.85.

The 6-inch line, from Caney to Neodesha, 33 miles: For pipe, $2,531.99; fittings, $0.31; right of way, $40.03; construction, $606.26; total, $3,178.59.

From the record of testimony, volume 7, on pages shown in the following table, in the case of the United States of American v. The Standard Oil Co. of New Jersey et al., in the District Court of the United States for the Eastern Judicial District of Missouri, the following is a summary of the investments and net profits of the various pipe line companies as of December 31, 1906:

In the same record of testimony, volume 8, page 619, the plant investment of the Prairie Oil & Gas Co. is stated as $19,008,445.27; but as this company has no pipe-line charges, its profits in transportation are not shown; and since the same is true concerning the Ohio Oil Co. and the Tidewater Pipe Co., a statement concerning these companies need not be made.

It is very evident, therefore, that the construction of interstate pipe lines is of such magnitude as to be beyond the resources of ordinary capital.

4. Duplication of plants an economic waste.

At page 649 of Volume II of the "Report on the petroleum industry," by the Commissioner of Corporations, published August 5, 1907, the following is stated:

"The advantage of the possession of a number of plants is intimately connected with the existence of the pipe-line system of transporting crude oil. In the absence of such a system there would, of course, be refineries in different parts of the country, because there are crude-oil fields in different parts of the country, but most of the refineries would be found in or very near to the oil fields, and there would be no advantage in locating refineries, as the Standard has done, at a number of points distant from the oil fields but convenient to centers of consumption and distribution. The transportation of refined petroleum products by rail costs no more than that of crude oil by rail. Consequently, if the Standard did not possess a great pipe-line system the advantage which it could derive from the ownership of a number of refineries would be quite limited. It is true, even under these conditions, if the Standard had refineries at each of the great oil fields it would have an advantage in the cost of transportation to certain markets, but such a situation would not be likely to arise. On the contrary, it would naturally be expected that in each of the important oil fields there would be competing refineries. To a large extent, therefore, the advantage of the Standard connected with the possession of numerous refineries resolves itself into its advantage through the control of the pipe-line system."

In Senate Document No. 399, Sixty-third Congress, second session, entitled "Government Ownership of Electrical Means of Communication," at page 10, it is stated:

"It is needless here to enter into the manifold advantages and benefits that would accrue to the people from a uniform telephone service. The telephone has now become an indispensable aid to business and a means of social intercourse to which all classes properly aspire. As it has done with the mails, it is the duty of the Government to make this facility available to all of its citizens without discrimination.

"There is only one other alternative, the enforcement in accordance with law of a condition of competition in the telephone and telegraph business. Without considering whether this could be done effectually in the case of an enterprise inherently so monopolistic, it is sufficient to note that while the execution of such a plan would be fraught with difficulty, its effect would not be to improve service and reduce rates, but the reverse. Competition applied to this public utility has clearly been shown to result in waste and inefficiency due to duplication. Not artificial restraint but natural development under Government control is the true policy for the public interest."

The similarity of the monopoly of communication by electrical means and the monopoly of transportation by pipe lines is striking. There is no room for a second system of pipe lines. A duplicated plant would not only add to the cost of the entire plant investment, but would likewise increase the cost of operating and expense. The production of crude oil is located. There are defined fields. The points to which crude oil is desired to be transported is also fixed. Transportation by pipe line is entirely unlike transportation by rail, where all kinds of commodities from all places of production are transported to all points of consumption. A single commodity is transported through the pipe line from the point of production to the point of manufacture. The plant can be used for no other purpose and in no other place. Any duplication of the present properties would be an economic waste; any increase in the quantity of transportation can be most economically done by adding to the existing plants.

5. Transportation by pipe lines susceptible to restriction in service by owner.

The characteristics of transportation of petroleum or other substance by pipe line tend always to a restricted use. From the point of production to the point of delivery there is but one line. Lateral branches for service to others do not mark pipe-line transportation. Pipe lines are generally built to a required capacity, and unless the transportation increases additions are not made. The quantity and capacity are generally balanced one with the other as nearly as possible. The owner, for various reasons, can require a certain character of petroleum to be presented in certain quantities to avoid mixture during the process of passing through the line.

As illustrative of the restrictive regulations, reference may be made to the joint tariff of the National Transit Co. in connection with the New York Transit Co., I. C. C. No. 1, effective August 28, 1906, as follows:

"REGULATIONS.

"This company will receive crude petroleum for interstate transportation only to established delivery stations on its own lines and lines of connecting pipe line companies on the following conditions:

"First. It will receive crude petroleum for interstate transportation when the shipper has provided the necessary facilities for receiving said petroleum as it arrives at destination.

"Second. It will forward such crude petroleum when there has been tendered to it by the shipper, individually, or by him and others, a quantity of the same kind and quality of crude petroleum amounting in the aggregate to not less than 75,000 barrels, all of which shall be consigned for delivery to the same delivery point.

"Third. All such crude petroleum will be accepted for transportation only on condition that it shall be subject to such changes in quality while in transit as may result from the mixture of said petroleum with other petroleum in the pipe lines or tanks of this or the connecting company or companies.

"Fourth. Orders for the shipment of any specified kind of such crude petroleum shall only become effective when orders from the shipper, in connection with orders from others shippers, for the same kind and quality of petroleum shall amount in the aggregate to 75,000 barrels or more, consigned to the same point of delivery; and, subject to this requirement, orders for shipment shall become operative in the order in which they shall have been received.

"Fifth. Crude petroleum will only be accepted for transportation when free from all liens and charges.

"Sixth. This company is not engaged in the transportation of refined oil, and will not therefore accept the same for transportation."

Referring to joint tariff of the Indiana Pipe Line Co., in connection with the Buckeye Pipe Line Co., Northern Pipe Line Co., National Transit Co., and New York Transit Co. (I. C. C. No. 1, effective Aug. 28, 1906), the same regulations are incorporated, with the exception that the quantity is increased from 75,000 to 300,000 barrels of crude petroleum as the minimum shipment.

The above regulations characterize all of the tariffs filed by the various pipe-line companies, acknowledging their obligations as common carriers to the public.

II. THE DESIRABILITY OF GOVERNMENT OWNERSHIP AND OPERATION OF INTERSTATE PIPE LINES.

1. Monopolies should be owned and operated by the Government.

It is a well-settled principle that the grant of a monopoly can be acquired only from sovereign power, and the sovereign power granting such monopoly may operate it for the benefit of all.

Whenever a monopoly is granted to private individuals or enterprises it should be properly guarded and regulated so that the interest of the public shall not be exploited or individual rights invaded.

In the report of the Industrial Commission, volume 1, page 797, in 1899, Mr. John D. Rockefeller stated:

"To perfect the pipe line system of transportation required in the neighborhood of fifty millions of capital. This could not be obtained or maintained without industrial combination. The entire oil business is dependent upon this pipe-line system. Without it, every well would shut down and every foreign market would be closed to us."

A power so vast in its consequences can not safely repose in unregulated private interests. The temptation to its abuse is unavoidable. The public is helpless against it except through the intervention of the Government. Complete safety to the public is only attainable by Government ownership and operation.

If the distribution of the mail were in the hands of a private monopoly instead of in the hands of the Government, what opportunities for exploitation would exist if the institution controlling it were endowed with vast capital and vast power similar to that which controls the pipe-line system? Or supposing that the great systems of railways were to combine and refuse to carry for the public generally, except under prohibitive restrictions, and were to force every producer and manufacturer to sell his commodities to the railways at the railway company's prices and force the consuming public to buy such commodities from the transportation company at prices fixed by the transportation company to the consumer; and yet this condition is exactly similar to that which exists at present, as a practical matter, through the private ownership of the pipe-line systems.

2. The Government would operate interstate pipe lines to public advantage instead of private gain.

Taking the Postal Department of this Government as best illustrating the public advantages resulting from Government operation of a monopoly, it is plain that the greatest benefits to the public have thereby been accomplished. It is in accord with the fundamental declaration of "public welfare," for which the Government was formed.

Referring to Senate Document No. 399, of the Sixty-third Congress, entitled "Governmental ownership of electrical means of communication," at page 8, it is stated:

"The telegraph and telephone systems have long been recognized as necessary adjuncts to a complete postal service. As with all other privately-controlled public utilities, these facilities have been extended in our country only in proportion as the service to be performed has insured substantial dividends for the stockholders. Under private ownership, therefore, the telegraph and telephone are for the classes. Under Government ownership, through the postal machinery, which is conducted in the interest of the whole people and already reaches every man's door, the benefits of these facilities could be extended to the masses.

"It is obvious that the longer the acquisition by the Government of these facilities is deferred the greater will be the cost. Moreover, it is economic waste to permit private enterprise to build up vast properties that must eventually be taken over by the Government in resuming its constitutional monopoly at a cost out of all proportion to the value of the parts of such properties that may be utilized to advantage in the postal system."

The pipe-line system in the hands of the Government would be made to reach out its lines to all fields of production and to each producer having a reasonable quantity to offer for transportation. It would afford the opportunity of such transportation and delivery to all buyers of such crude petroleum indifferently and without unreasonable restriction.

3. Government ownership and operation of interstate pipe lines would encourage development and conservation.

Prospecting for the discovery of oil would be encouraged by the knowledge that wherever found the producer would have the certainty of being able to transport his oil to an available market to the best advantage. Whenever oil was discovered in large quantities the ability of the Government to furnish facilities for its transportation would be undoubted, and the enormous waste to sudden and flush production which has characterized the history of this industry would thereafter be avoided. The refiner would have the certainty of being able to acquire his crude supplies delivered at his plant at a minimum and reasonable transportation charge.

4. Discrimination would be prevented through Government ownership and operation of interstate pipe lines.

While the regulatory power of the Government over interstate commerce has constantly in view the prevention of undue discrimination, it is obvious that under Government ownership instead of regulation of interstate pipe lines there would exist no discriminations such as unavoidably creep in with respect to private operation of all instrumentalities of interstate commerce.

5. Governmental ownership and operation of interstate pipe lines would result in the standardization of the different crudes in the different fields.

The history of the petroleum industry shows that the prices of the different crudes produced in the different fields of production have heretofore been fixed in an arbitrary way. As the Interstate Commerce Commission observed, such control of transportation enabled the owners of the instrumentalities of transportation to arbitrarily fix the price to be paid to the producer and also the price to be paid by the consumer for the finished commodity. While some relation to value would necessarily be observed, no equivalence would be maintained based upon the inherent refining values of the different kinds of crude oil produced. The operation of the pipe-line systems would enable all refiners to obtain their crude from whatever field of production was most advantageous for their purposes, and would necessarily fix the standard of value to each class of crude oil.

6. Governmental ownership of pipe lines would prevent the abandonment of production before exhausted.

The history of the production of petroleum has shown that the opening of large pools of flush production has been followed by a marked reduction in the price paid for the crude oil. The result has always been to make unprofitable the production of oil in the older and partially exhausted fields and the abandonment of such fields by reason of the low prices of crude, thereby losing enormous quantities of oil that would otherwise have been produced. The question of the conservation of the production of petroleum and the prevention of premature abandonment of fields before exhausted is an important one, and is entirely in line with the policy of conservation wisely adopted by this Government in all matters under its control. Frequently several strata of underlying sands are saturated with oil, which if production had been continued in a partially developed field would have been found to be more prolific than the first stratum. Undoubtedly many millions of dollars worth of oil lies in such deeper strata of sands in abandoned territory.

An interesting paper has recently been issued by the Bureau of Mines in its Bulletin No. 51, by L. G. Huntley, treating of the causes of declining yield, all of which might be controlled by proper regulations if the Government owned and operated the instrumentalities of oil transportation. The waxy sediment that obstructs the passage of the oil into the well is a prolific cause of waste. The decline of gas pressure in the oil districts decreases the production. Decrease of oil supply within the drainage area of a well on account of near-by development decreases production. Also flooding by salt water, flooding by fresh water; also by the use of improper casing, unwise rate and time of pumping, and failure to clean, due to poor management—all are sources of waste which might, by proper surveillance, be eliminated.

7. Government ownership of pipe lines would aid the Navy Department in securing supplies of fuel oil.

It is perhaps unnecessary to point out the advantages of the use of oil as a fuel in the Navy Department, since that has been demonstrated by the department itself. It is a well-known fact that the requirements of the Navy Department this year of fuel oil will be nearly three times the quantity used last year. In the Associated Press, on December 30, 1913, the following item appeared:

"The new twin-screw oil-burning torpedo boat destroyer Parker, largest of its class and called the 'destroyer of destroyers,' has been turned over to the Government by the builders here. The Parker will be equipped with four 4-inch rapid-firing guns and four twin 8-inch torpedo tubes. One hundred men, including four officers, will be assigned to the ship. With its tanks loaded to their capacity of 300 tons of oil, the Parker is capable of 7,000 miles at cruising speed, or 800 miles at its highest velocity."

The American Review in a recent issue published a very interesting article, from which we quote:

"In a great war, such as all the European nations are preparing for, there will be no such thing as the respecting of the rights of the non-belligerents who are not powerful enough to protect themselves. In the same way the oil fields of the lesser powers would undoubtedly be seized by the first nation, or coalition, that felt it could further its own ends by their possession. Of such are the great fields of Roumania and the Dutch Indies, Sumatra and Borneo. The oil fields of Mexico would also be included in this list but for the fact that the protecting wing of the Monroe doctrine renders them fairly safe from European aggression. If the United States, however, became hard pressed for oil, as might happen in a war, this 'law of might and expediency' would undoubtedly be invoked to justify our seizure of the Mexican fields."

At the present time the Government is investigating the desirability of building and operating a pipe line of its own for the primary purpose of protecting the Navy in securing its supplies of fuel oil. Its investment in such a proposition would necessarily be considerable. Fuel oil, however, is manufactured and not produced, and this would require the investment by the Government in a refinery. A Government refinery, if built, would necessarily be operated in competition against privately owned refineries, and would not and could not be extended to the monopoly of the refining business in the hands of the Government, because by its nature the refining business is not such a natural monopoly as the transportation of oil by means of pipe lines. It would thereby invade the realm of private enterprise, which is undesirable.

By means of the acquisition and operation of existing interstate pipe-line systems, however, the Navy would be fully protected, not only by having deliveries made to it at Gulf points already reached by existing pipe lines and refineries located at such points, but also at all seaboard points where refineries are already established from which the Navy could secure its supplies of fuel oil in competitive markets. It would also be able to select the best quality of fuel oil under standard specifications which could be manufactured at interior points and transported through the pipe lines for delivery in large quantities to seaboard points.

Since the ownership and operation by the Government of pipe lines would prevent the arbitrary fixing of prices in any field of production, the Navy Department would be protected from an arbitrary advance in the price in any one particular field while the price in other fields was arbitrarily reduced. At the present time the price of Pennsylvania crude is $2.50 per barrel. Crude which is of nearly equal value is sold in the midcontinent field at 90 cents a barrel. The power that can make this artificial difference in prices can exactly reverse those prices, if to its advantage to do so.

8. Revenue would be produced to the Government through its ownership and operation of pipe lines.

From the information that the Government has already acquired through its investigation of the oil industry, it is obvious that the pipe lines have been the chief source of profit to the monopoly existing in the petroleum industry since the abolition of the railroad rebate. From the table shown on page 32 of this declaration, stating the plant investments and yearly profits for the year 1906 of the various pipe-line companies filing reports with the Interstate Commerce Commission, as required by the act to regulate commerce, it may be seen that there would be a sufficient guaranty of revenue to the Government accruing from its operation of pipe lines, even at a reasonable rate; and, as a transportation tax is one most easily collected and of little hardship upon the consuming public—an indirect tax—its burden would rest very lightly upon those who paid such revenue.

The cost of transportation by means of pipe lines, as compared with the value of the service, is inconsiderable, and as there is nothing intricate in pipe-line operation inasmuch as it requires but a small number of employees, the Government would be able to keep the expense of operation at a minimum. Plant cost and maintenance, as compared with the value of the service, is lower with respect to pipe lines than any other means of transportation. Depreciation of plant, or obsolescence, is an almost negligible factor. From the nature of the commodity transported frictional wear is almost entirely eliminated. Iron pipes are invariably laid underneath the surface of the ground, and consequently are not affected by atmospheric changes nor by contact with other activities. There is no deterioration of the metal itself from the oil transported, which is in itself a preservant, and the pipe when laid is covered with an adequate preservative coating. Terminal and station facilities are not costly and are easily and quickly provided. The volume of transportation, the plant considered, is enormous. So that every opportunity exists to provide a permanent revenue to the Government, at small cost of operation and without burden upon the public, through governmental operation of pipe lines.

III. PRACTICABILITY OF GOVERNMENT OWNERSHIP AND OPERATION OF INTERSTATE PIPE LINES.

1. Such Government ownership and operation in harmony with other governmental enterprises.

The acquisition and operation of interstate pipe lines is entirely in harmony with what the Government has undertaken of an industrial nature, such as the Postal System, including the Parcel Post System, the Forestry Department, the Alaskan railroad, Panama Canal, irrigation dams, and many other activities undertaken by the several executive departments of the Government.

2. Valuation of interstate pipe lines within the scope of the Interstate Commerce Commission.

In connection with its work of valuation of railroads the valuation of the properties of the interstate pipe lines would be an easy matter for the Interstate Commerce Commission, with all of its equipment for arriving at valuations, so that said commission could accurately and quickly return an estimate of what the Government should pay for such properties.

3. Pipe lines could be readily operated by the Department of the Interior.

On account of the vast properties of the Government which are placed under the jurisdiction of the Department of the Interior, the operation of interstate pipe lines could be readily undertaken by that department without great expense and with best results, since the necessary administrative control of other governmental properties has already established the machinery for the general superintendence of a proposition of this kind.

4. The cost of acquisition of interstate pipe lines by the Government not prohibitive.

While the cost of the properties to be acquired by the Government for the operation of a system of interstate pipe lines is not accurately available, reference to the capitalization of the various pipe-line companies, or to the plant investments of such companies, as shown by their balance sheets, will be of assistance in determining this cost. Taking the figures as shown in such balance sheets and making due allowance for the investments of such pipe-line companies in producing properties, large storage farms where oil is accumulated and stored for future shipment, refinery investments, etc., it will be found that the amount necessary to compensate the owners of such pipe-line properties would be much less than the sums expended on many of the projects already undertaken by the Government.

The total cost can be roughly estimated by taking the total mileage of the trunk pipe lines and multiplying that by a careful estimate of the average cost per mile, based upon the investigation of costs shown in the extensive report of the Commissioner of Corporations.

However, the cost could not reasonably be urged against the practicability of Government ownership, since, whatever that might be, the Government would have it within its power to recoup such cost by the imposition of transportation charges, and that without burdening the industry. In fact, the present pipe-line transportation charges are such that any reasonable rates which the Government might fix would at once work a reduction in the cost of petroleum and its products to the ultimate consumer.

From every standpoint of view, therefore, it is entirely practicable for the Government to acquire and operate interstate pipe lines.

IV. THE VALIDITY OF GOVERNMENT OWNERSHIP AND OPERATION OF INTERSTATE PIPE LINES.

1. Fundamentally such ownership and operation would be in harmony with the purposes of government as expressed in the preamble of the Constitution—the "general welfare" of the people.

In the Commentaries on the Constitution of the United States, by Joseph Story (vol. 1, p. 338), it is stated:

"The importance of examining the preamble for the purpose of expounding the language of the statute has been long felt and universally conceded in all juridical discussions. It is an admitted maxim in the ordinary course of the administration of justice that the preamble is a key to open the mind of the makers as to the mischiefs which are to be remedied and the objects which are to be accomplished by the provisions of the statute."

Having in mind, then, the purposes of the Constitution, any of its specific provisions or the powers delegated to Congress thereunder would be interpreted in relation to such declarations found in the preamble.

And at page 362, in discussing the "general-welfare" clause, the same author says:

"We pass in the next place to the clause to 'promote the general welfare.' And it may be asked, as the State governments are formed for the same purpose by the people, why should this be set forth as a peculiar or prominent object of the Constitution of the United States? To such an inquiry, two general answers may be given: The States separately would not possess the means; if they did possess the means, they would not possess the power to carry the appropriate measures into operation."

First, with respect to the means, the great enterprises entered upon by the Federal Government have, in the extent of their expenditures, been beyond the revenues of many of the States. And even if such projects could be contributed to by the revenues of the States as a whole, by their unanimous consent, a just distribution of the whole burden would be extremely difficult and an almost insurmountable problem.

And, second, with respect to the powers of the State, the powers of a State can not extend beyond the territory of its sovereignty, and, consequently, are confined to all of those matters which are internal; can not attempt to regulate affairs extending beyond its own territory. Commerce among the States must be controlled by the Federal Government, because its powers alone are commensurate with such commerce.

At page 364 the same author says:

"If a system of regulations, on the other hand, is prepared by a general government, the inequalities of one part may, and ordinarily will, under the guise of wise councils, correct and ameliorate those of another. * * * The navigation and commerce, the agriculture and manufactures, of all the States have received an advancement in every direction by the Union which has far exceeded the most sanguine expectations of its warmest friends.

"But the fact alone of an unlimited intercourse, without duty or restriction, between all the States is of itself a blessing of almost inconceivable value. It makes it an object with each permanently to look to the interests of all, and to withdraw its operations from the narrow sphere of its own exclusive territory. Without entering here into the inquiry how far the General Government possesses the power to make or aid the making of roads, canals, and other general improvements which will properly arise in our future discussions, it is clear that if there were no General Government, the interest of each State to undertake or to promote in its own legislation on any project would be far less strong than it now is, since there would be no certainty as to the value or duration of such improvements, looking beyond the boundaries of a State. * * *

"Independent of the exercise of any authority by the General Government for this purpose, it was justly foreseen that roads would be everywhere shortened and kept in better order; accommodations for travelers would be mutiplied and meliorated; an interior navigation on our eastern side would be opened throughout the whole extent of our coast; and, by canals and improvements in river navigation, a boundless field opened to enterprise and immigration, to commerce and products, through the interior States, to the farthest limits of our western territories."

It is true that the above-quoted language refers to things as they were 80 years ago, before the advent of railroads, telegraphs, telephones, and pipe lines, but the fact that the great commentator saw that the powers of the Government could be exercised, unless forbidden by the Constitution, along these avenues, shows that the same principles when applied to this question will be seen to be in entire harmony therewith.

2. It is an exercise of the Government's constitutional grant of power to regulate commerce among the States. (Federal Constitution, Art. I, sec. 8, par. 3.)

In volume 2, page 2, Story on the Constitution, it is stated:

"The want of this power (as has been already seen) was one of the leading defects of the Confederation, and probably, as much as any one cause, conduced to the establishment of the Constitution. It is a power vital to the prosperity of the Union, and without it the Government would scarcely deserve the name of a national government and would soon sink into discredit and imbecility. It would stand as a mere shadow of sovereignty, to mock our hopes and involve us in a common ruin."

If from the facts heretofore stated relating to the use made by the private pipe-line companies to control commerce among the States the conclusion is inevitable that these instrumentalities are not now regulated by this power of the Government, it stands as a "mere shadow of sovereignty" with relation to these instrumentalities, unless by the exercise of that power it can and does effectually regulate the commerce which flows through them. That it is commerce over which the power of the Government extends and that the Government has the power to regulate such commerce was well established in the early case of Gibbons v. Ogden (9 Wheat., 1), in which Chief Justice Marshall, at page 196, said:

"It is the power to regulate; that is, to prescribe the rule by which commerce is to be governed. This power, like all others vested in Congress, is complete in itself, may be exercised to its fullest extent, and acknowledges no limitations other than are prescribed in the Constitution."

As to the means by which this commerce can be regulate, this is amply set forth in the celebrated case of McCulloch v. Maryland (4 Wheat., 167), the syllabus of which is:

"The Government of the Union is a Government of the people; it emanates from them; its powers are granted by them, and are to be exercised directly on them and for their benefit.

"The Government of the Union, though limited in its powers, is supreme within its sphere of action, and its laws, when made in pursuance of the Constitution, form the supreme law of the land.

"There is nothing in the Constitution of the United States similar to the Articles of Confederation, which exclude incidental or implied powers.

"If the end be legitimate and within the scope of the Constitution, all means which are appropriate, which are plainly adapted to that end, and which are not prohibited, may constitutionally be employed to carry it into effect."

As said by the Supreme Court in re Debs (158 U. S. Rep., 564):

"Constitutional provisions will not change, but their operation extends to new matters as the mode of business and habits of life of the people vary with each succeeding generation. The law of the common carrier is the same to-day as when transportation on land was by coach and wagon, and on water by canal boat and sailing vessel, yet in its actual operation it touches and regulates transportation by modes then unknown—the railroad trains and steamships. Just so it is with the grant of power to the National Government over interstate commerce. The Constitution has not changed; the power is the same, but it operates to-day upon modes of interstate commerce unknown to the fathers, and it will operate with equal force upon any new modes of such commerce which the future may develop."

And, again, in Pensacola Telegraph Co. v. Western Union Telegraph Co. (96 U. S. Rep., 1, 24 L. ed., 708):

"They extend from the horse and wagon to the stage coach, from the sailing vessel to the steamboat, from the coach and steamboat to the railroad, from the railroad to the telegraph, as these new modes are successively brought into use to meet the demands of increasing population and wealth. They were intended for the government of the business to which they relate at all times and under all circumstances."

In Interstate Commerce Commission v. Brimson (154 U. S. Rep., 456), it is said:

"Congress has plenary power, subject to the limitations imposed by the Constitution, to prescribe the rule by which commerce among the several States is to be governed. Congress may, in its discretion, employ any appropriate means not forbidden by the Constitution to carry into effect and accomplish the objects of power given to it by the Constitution."

Cases might be multiplied upon this question of power and what it includes and the means that the Government may make use of in putting such power into effect, as the "commerce clause" has been considered by the court of last resort more frequently in the last half of the Nation's existence than any other clause in the Constitution. But this is not necessary, either to substantiate the power or the means of exercising such power so long as the power and means are exercised with respect to the regulation of commerce among the States.

3. Interstate transportation of oil by pipe lines is a monopoly of such nature as to properly reside in the Federal Government.

In United States v. Knight (156 U. S. Rep., 1) Mr. Chief Justice Fuller, at page 12, made use of the following language:

"The power to regulate commerce is the power to prescribe the rule by which commerce shall be governed, and is a power independent of the power to suppress monopoly. But it may operate in repression of monopoly whenever that comes within the rules by which commerce is governed or whenever the transaction is itself a monopoly of commerce."

Again, in Pearsoll v. Great Northern Railway Co. (161 U. S., 646), the Supreme Court said:

"There is, and has been, for the past 300 years, both in England and in this country, a popular prejudice against monopolies in general which has found expression in innumerable acts of legislation. We can not say that such prejudice is not well founded. It is a matter upon which the legislature is entitled to pass judgment. At least there is sufficient doubt of the propriety of such monopolies to authorize the legislature, which may be presumed to represent the views of the public, to say that it will not tolerate them unless the power to establish them be conferred by clear and explicit language."

In Texas & Pacific Ry. Co. v. Interstate Commerce Commission (162 U. S., 197) it is stated:

"Before we consider the phraseology of the statute it may be well to advert to the causes which induced its enactment. They chiefly grew out of the use of railroads as the principal modern instrumentality of commerce. While shippers of merchandise are under no legal necessity to use railroads, they are so practically. The demand for speedy and prompt movement virtually forbids the employment of slow and old-fashioned methods of transportation, at least in the case of the more valuable articles of traffic. At the same time the immense outlay of money required to build and maintain railroads, and the necessity of resorting, in securing rights of way, to the power of eminent domain, in effect disable individual merchants and shippers from themselves providing such means of carriage. From the very nature of the case, therefore, railroads are monopolies, and the evils that usually accompany monopolies soon began to show themselves and were the cause of loud complaints."

Again, in Swift v. United States (196 U. S., 375), Mr. Justice said:

"No more powerful instrumentality of monopoly could be used than an advantage in the cost of transportation."

4. Privately owned pipe lines from their very nature trespass upon public rights.

In the investigation by the Interstate Commerce Commission, "In the matter of pipe lines," Docket No. 4199 (I. and S.), after taking a large amount of testimony, the commission formulated seven questions of law upon which it requested counsel for the proponents and respondents to argue before the commission. The fourth question propounded by the commission was:

"Does the utilization by a pipe line of the right of way of a common carrier railroad impress upon that pipe line the obligations of a common carrier?"

The question arose by reason of the fact that the testimony before the Interstate Commerce Commission showed that in a great many instances the rights of way acquired by railroad companies had been utilized by pipe-line companies by arrangement with the railroad companies and without the consent of the abutting property owners. For instance, along the line of the Santa Fe, for more than 300 miles, the private pipe line of the Prairie Oil & Gas Co. extended. Other instances are referred to of other pipe lines occupying the rights of way of railroad companies, and in every instance, where necessary, such pipe lines crossed the rights of way belonging to the railroad companies.

The fifth question propounded by the Interstate Commerce Commission was:

"Does the utilization by a pipe line of a highway acquired for or dedicated to the public use impress upon that pipe line the obligations of a common carrier?"

This question arose from the facts shown in the record that in many instances private pipe lines, so called, extended along public highways, and in all instances, where necessary, crossed such highways, consent usually having been obtained from county commissioners or road commissioners in districts through which such pipe lines passed.

It will thus be seen that in the rights of way enjoyed by pipe-line companies, obtained by private arrangement and not by the exercise of eminent domain, that such pipe lines are necessarily trespassers upon public rights.

Very nearly all pipe-line companies, especially those that are so-called private pipe lines, are purchasers as well as transporters of crude oil. In coupling together the control of purchase and transportation, it necessarily follows that the sellers are at the mercy of the buyers, because the product must be transported in order to be available for use, and hence, have a market value. Since the pipe lines furnish the only means of reaching a final market, this leaves the seller of crude oil entirely at the mercy of the buyer and transporter, and consequently deprives the seller of the right to freely enter the market to dispose of his products, differing in that respect from other sellers of other products. The means of transportation as well as the product transported being owned by the pipe-line companies, the product is then directed to such receivers of the transportation as the pipe-line companies shall elect, and again they interpose their power to prevent buyers generally from securing this commodity. From the fact that the stockholders of the large Standard refineries and the stockholders of these pipe-line companies are practically the same, it is obvious that this situation will continue as long as the present status of the pipe-line companies exist.

While it may be true that the evils above described might be overcome in a measure by proper procedure under the existing laws, the fact remains that they have not been, and probably will not be without further remedial legislation, although these questions have been before our Federal tribunal.

5. For proper Government purposes private property may be taken.

The fifth amendment of the Federal Constitution provides that private property shall not be taken for public use without due compensation. This provision does not prevent the United States Government from taking property by the right of eminent domain, subject to reimbursement to the owner of the property. In United States v. Jones (109 U. S., 513) it was said:

"The power to take private property for public uses, generally termed the right of eminent domain, belongs to every independent government. It is an incident of sovereignty, and, as said in Boom v. Patterson (98 U. S., 106), requires no constitutional recognition. The provision found in the fifth amendment of the Federal Constitution and in the constitutions of the several States, for just compensation for property taken, is merely a limitation upon the use of the power. It is no part of the power itself, but a condition upon which the power may be exercised. * * * The proceeding for the ascertainment of the value of the property and consequent compensation to be made is merely an inquisition to establish a particular fact as a preliminary to the actual taking, and it may be prosecuted before commissioners or special boards or the courts, with or without the intervention of a jury, as the legislative power may designate. All that is required is that it shall be conducted in some fair and just manner, with opportunity to the owners of the property to present evidence as to its value and to be heard thereon."

In Kohl v. United States (91 U. S., 367) it was held that no State can interfere with the United States' right of eminent domain.

6. Such ownership will protect producers and refiners from commercial duress.

In re Debs (158 U. S., 582), the court said:

"The strong arm of the National Government may be put forth to brush away all obstructions to the freedom of interstate commerce or the transportation of the mails. If the emergency arises, the Army of the Nation and all its militia are at the service of the Nation to compel obedience to its laws."

In the "Pipe Line cases," before the Supreme Court of the United States, Nos. 481, 482, 483, 506, 507, and 508, considered together, the Solicitor General, in his brief before that court, at page 56, said:

"In practical result—and that is the thing courts and legislatures are concerned with—the small well owner is in a position closely resembling that of the mine owner in Strickley v. Highland Boy Gold Mining Co. (200 U. S., 527), who had no right of way out of his mines, or the owner of the arid land in Clark v. Nash (198 U. S., 361), who had no means of bringing water in, and was allowed to use his neighbor's irrigation ditch. The shipment of oil except by pipe line is a practical impossibility. No other means of transportation can possibly compete with it. Without a pipe line the oil producer is, as it were, shut in by an impassable barrier.

"But even these analogies do not adequately express the difficulties of the small producer. The possibilities of duress are even greater in the case of oil wells than in the case of mines and arid lands. The mine owner can shut up his mine and hold it, but the wells once opened can not be closed to await a more convenient season. And if they could be, or if they were not opened in the first place, the owner of the oil land would only lose instead of gain by waiting, because oil lies in great subterranean reservoirs, and the pumping of the wells upon adjacent lands would drain the common source. (Ohio Oil Co. v. Indiana, 177 U. S., 190.) Therefore the small producer is compelled either to sell his oil or to sell the wells themselves to the owner of the pipe lines at whatever terms the latter may choose to offer. He is caught beneath the sheer weight of capital and has no alternative except to yield.

"The court below says that there is no connection between monopoly and a situation where 'the greater number of oil producers are virtually compelled to sell their output to the owners of private pipe lines'; but Mr. Justice Holmes said, in Swift v. United States (196 U. S., 375, 402):

"'No more powerful instrument of monopoly could be used than an advantage in the cost of transportation.'

"It is largely the use of this potent instrument that has built up these enormous capitalizations, that has paid these enormous dividends, that once, at least, has thrown the oil industry of the whole United States into the hands of a single group of capitalists. The evidence in the Standard Oil case proves this; the statistics in the Government reports prove it; the facts were in the mind of Congress when it passed this legislation. Congress has declared the possibility of its recurrence a menace to the public welfare. Congress has struck down monopoly full grown. It now seeks to destroy the source from which it sprang.

"But the court below says that Congress is quite mistaken: that pipe lines have no relation to monopoly; that the right to injure the public in general and one's neighbors in particular is merely one of the legitimate and inviolable advantages arising from the acquisition of substantial amounts of property."

7. Such ownership would prevent the evils sought to be remedied by the principle embodied in the "commodities clause" of the act to regulate commerce.

At page 70, in the Solicitor General's brief in the "Pipe Line cases" above referred to, the following language is used:

"The commodities case, United States v. Delaware & Hudson Co. (213 U. S., 366), is directly in point. It was there held that Congress could prohibit common carriers from carrying their own coal, despite the fact that many of the companies affected had invested enormous sums of money in the business of mining prior to the passage of the law. There is no substantial distinction between that case and the present. In both the motive of Congress was the same—to prevent an unconscionable use of an advantage in the means of transportation. In the one case the owner of a railroad is forbidden to carry his own coal, unless he first parts with ownership; in the other the owner of a pipe line is forbidden to carry his own oil, unless he transports also the oil of others for reasonable compensation. The same reasoning which supported the one supports the other."

The Solicitor General might have noted further the difficulties attending even the application of the principle of the "commodities clause" to pipe lines if the "commodities clause" were to be extended in the control of pipe lines by regulation. In the instances of the Prairie Oil & Gas Co. and the Ohio Oil Co. the evidence in the "Pipe Line cases" shows that these companies are engaged in producing as well as purchasing and transporting oil. As producers and purchasers they claim the right to use the pipe lines which they have built and own to carry their own commodities. Unless such pipe lines are held to be common carriers by the Supreme Court, their status will remain the same as it is at present. If they are held to be common carriers, in order to make them effectively such, further legislation extending the application of the "commodities clause" to pipe lines will be necessary. The organization of a producing company to purchase and take over the producing properties will be a fiction supported by a mere matter of bookkeeping to avoid the effectiveness of the provisions of the "commodities clause" principle. The stockholders, who are the real parties at interest, will continue to be the same as now. The great bulk of transportation offered to the pipe lines will be by the owners of the producing and purchasing companies, whose stockholders are the same as those of the pipe-line companies. If such pipe lines are owned and operated by the Government, no such embarrassment and complications can arise.

8. Government ownership and operation of transportation in interstate commerce not forbidden by any provisions of the Federal Constitution.

In the broad declaration of Federal powers in McCulloch v. Maryland, supra, it was said:

"If the end be legitimate and within the scope of the Constitution, all means which are appropriate, which are plainly adapted to that end, and which are not prohibited, may constitutionally be employed to carry it into effect."

During the early period in the history of this Government, when constitutional construction was less liberal than it afterwards became, unless there was a specific grant of power, the Federal Government was slow to act. There is no such specific grant of power as to permit the Government to appropriate money for internal improvements. On March 3, 1817, President Madison vetoed a bill to set apart the bonus and Government dividends of the national bank as a fund for constructing roads and canals and improving navigable rivers, on the ground that the Constitution did not provide for the expenditure of money for internal improvements. On March 14, 1818, the House of Representatives passed a resolution declaring the Congress had the power to appropriate money for such improvements, and on March 3, 1823, the first bill was passed for the construction of internal improvements, since which time, without specific authority, but on the ground that the end was legitimate and not forbidden by the Constitution, huge enterprises have been undertaken by the Government, such as the construction of the Panama Canal, the Alaskan Railroad, great irrigation projects, the improvement of rivers and harbors, all of which are of undoubted advantage and promote the general welfare. While the doctrine of the conservation of natural resources is fully accepted as a Federal policy, it is equally important that the Government should guard all of its natural resources from the encroachments of private monopoly, that the entire welfare of the people may thereby be promoted.

Since, therefore, there is no prohibition in the Constitution, and since the Government has already entered the field of ownership and transportation, there can be no question on this ground but what the Government would be justified in such ownership and operation of interstate pipe lines.

9. State laws recognize the public interest in pipe lines by requiring them to become common carriers.

In very nearly all of the States in which oil is produced in quantities, and through which pipe lines pass, are to be found statutes providing that pipe lines shall be common carriers, thereby indicating the public interest residing in such means of transportation.

ARKANSAS.

The Statutes of Arkansas of 1911 (Kirby's Digest, pp. 253, 254; title "Eminent domain—oil and gas companies") provide:

"SEC. 2991a. Any corporation organized by virtue of the laws of this State for the purpose of developing and producing mineral oil or petroleum or natural gas in this State, and marketing the same, or transporting or conveying the same by means of pipes from the point of production to any other point or points, either to refine or market such oil or conduct such gas to any point to be used for heat or light, may construct, operate, and maintain a line or lines of pipes for that purpose along and under the public highways and the streets of cities and towns with the consent of the authorities thereof, or across and under the waters and over any lands of the State, and on the lands of individuals, and along, under, or parallel with the rights of way of railroads and the turnpikes of this State: Provided, That the ordinary use of such highways, turnpikes, and railroad rights of way be not obstructed thereby or the navigation of any waters impeded, and that just compensation be paid to the owners of such lands, railroad rights of way, or turnpikes by reason of the occupation of such lands, railroad rights of way, or turnpikes by said pipe line or lines."

CALIFORNIA.

Pomeroy's Code of Civil Procedure of California, 1901, title 7, page 692, provides:

"SEC. 1237. Eminent domain is the right of the people or Government to take private property for public use. This right may be exercised in the manner provided in this title.

"SEC. 1238. Subject to the provisions of this title, the right of eminent domain may be exercised in behalf of the following public uses: * * *."

10. Oil pipe lines.

COLORADO.

The Revised Statutes of Colorado, 1908, chapter 45, 689, provide:

"SEC. 2436, subsection 22: Any foreign or domestic corporation organized or chartered for the purpose, among other things, of conducting or maintaining a pipe line for the transmission of power, water, air, or gas for hire to any mine or mining claim or manufacturing, milling, mining, or public purpose, shall have the right of way for the construction, operation, and maintenance of such pipe line or pipe lines, for such purposes, through any lands, without the consent of the owner thereof, where such right of way is necessary for the purpose for which said pipe line shall be used."

"SEC. 2439, subsection 25: Any such corporation or corporations organized or chartered for any or all of the purposes hereinbefore mentioned shall be deemed a common carrier or common carriers and shall fix and charge only a reasonable and uniform rate to all persons who desire the use of any such tunnel, pipe line, electric power transmission line, or aerial railway."

ILLINOIS.

The Legislature of Illinois in 1913 passed an act entitled "An act to provide for the regulation of public utilities," which provides inter alia:

"SEC. 10, subparagraph (a): May own, control, operate, or manage, within the State, directly or indirectly for public use, any plant, equipment, or property used or to be used for or in connection with the transportation of persons or property or the transmission of telegraph or telephone messages between points within this State; or for the production, storage, transmission, sale, delivery, or furnishing of heat, cold, light, power, electricity, or water; or for the conveyance of oil or gas by pipe line," etc.

INDIANA.

Burns's Annotated Indiana Statutes, Volume II, chapter 40, provide:

"SEC. 5148. Whenever three or more persons desire to form a company to lay on, over, or underneath the ground iron pipes or tubes, to erect pumps and pump stations and tanks for storing oil, and also to erect telegraph lines along said line or lines of pipe, and to carry on by means thereof the business of transporting and storing petroleum, they shall make, sign, and acknowledge before some officer capable to take acknowledgments of deeds, a certificate in writing which shall state the corporate name adopted by the company, the object of its formation, the amount of capital stock, the term of its existence (not, however, to exceed 50 years), the number of directors and their names, who shall manage the affairs of such company for the first year, and the names of the counties in which its operations are to be carried on, and the county where its principal office shall be located, and file the same in the office of the recorder of such county, which shall be placed upon the record, and a duplicate thereof in the office of the secretary of state."

KANSAS.

Dassler's General Statutes of Kansas, 1909, chapter 48, article 4, title "Transportation of oil," provide:

"SECTION 1. All pipe lines laid, built, or maintained for the conveyance of crude oil within the State of Kansas are hereby declared to be common carriers and said conveyance of oil shall be in the manner and under the restrictions of this act provided."

KENTUCKY.

Carroll's Kentucky Statutes, 1909, chapter 93a, title "Oil and gas—condemnation of land for," provide:

"SEC. 3766b. All corporations or companies organized for the purpose of constructing, maintaining, or operating oil or gas well or wells or pipe lines for conveying, transporting, or delivering oil or gas, or both oil and gas, are hereby vested with the right and power to condemn lands and material in this Commonwealth, or the use and occupation of so much thereof as may be necessary for constructing, maintaining, and operating such pipe line or lines, and all necessary machinery, pumping stations, appliances, and fixtures, including tanks, telephone and telegraph lines, for use in connection therewith, together with rights of ingress and egress to examine, alter, repair, maintain, and operate or remove such pipe line or lines, all such being hereby declared to be a public use."

LOUISIANA.

The Acts of the State of Louisiana, 1906, page 54, Act No. 39, approved June 29, 1906, provide:

"SECTION 1. That corporations, whether domestic or foreign, organized with the power of constructing and operating pipe lines for the transportation of oil or gas, or either, shall have the right to expropriate rights of way for such pipe lines and for telegraph and telephone lines incident to the operation of such pipe lines, and lands for pumping and tank stations, making part of such lines, or of storage stations connected therewith and necessary to the purpose thereof."

And Act No. 36, declaring pipe lines common carriers, provides:

"SEC. 1. That all pipe lines through which gases, oil, or other liquids are conveyed from one point in the State to another point in the State, for a consideration, are hereby declared to be common carriers, and are placed under the control and subject to regulation by the Railroad Commission of Louisiana."

NEBRASKA.

Sections 4575 and 4581, chapter 64, Compiled Statutes of Nebraska, 1911, provides—

"That any company, corporation, or association formed or created for the purpose of transporting, transmitting, or conveying petroleum or other like oil, and desiring or requiring a right of way for the laying and maintaining of any pipe line for such purpose within the State of Nebraska, and being unable to agree with the owner or lessee of any land, lot, or right of way on the amount of compensation for the use and occupancy of so much of any lot, land, real estate, or right of way as may reasonably be necessary for the laying, relaying, and maintenance of any such pipe line, shall have the right to acquire the same for such purpose, as hereinafter provided * * *."

NEW YORK.

Birdseye, Cumming & Gilbert's Consolidated Laws of New York, 1909, volume 5, page 6311, article 6, title "Pipe lines corporations," provide:

"SEC. 50. The pipe lines of every such corporation shall be open for transportation to the public use, and all persons desiring to transport products through such pipe line shall have the absolute right upon equal terms to such transportation in the order of application therefor on complying with the general requirements of such corporation, as to delivery for and payment of such transportation; but no application for such transportation shall be valid beyond or for a greater quantity of products than the applicant shall then own and have ready for delivery for transportation to such corporation, and every such corporation shall provide suitable and necessary receptacles for receiving all such products for transportation, and for storage at the place of delivery until the same can reasonably be moved by the consignee, and shall be liable as common carriers therefor from the time the same is delivered for transportation until a reasonable time after the same has been transported to the place of consignment and ready for delivery to the consignee, which time shall be fixed by general regulation by the corporation, and shall not be less than two days from and after the same shall be ready for delivery and notice thereof given to such consignee; and all rates and charges of every description, for or on account of or in any manner connected with the transportation of any products, shall be fixed by such corporation by general rules and regulations which shall be applicable to all parties who shall transport any products through such pipe line, or deliver or contract to deliver products for transportation, and shall be written or printed and exposed to public view and at all times open to public examination."

OHIO.

Page and Adams Annotated Ohio General Code, Volume IV, pages 1002, 1003, provides:

"SEC. 10132. Such company or companies, for the purpose of transporting natural gas, oils, water, and electricity, shall be a common carrier and subject to all the duties and liabilities of such carriers under the laws of this State."

OKLAHOMA.

Snyder's Constitution of Oklahoma, 1908, page 226, article 9, provides:

"SEC. 4. All oil pipe-line companies shall be subject to the reasonable control and regulation of the corporation commission, and shall receive and transport each other's tonnage or oils, or commodities, under such rules and regulations as shall be prescribed by law or such commission."

Section 786, chapter 11, article 1, provides:

"Every one who offers to the public to carry persons, property, or messages is a common carrier of what he thus offers to carry."

PENNSYLVANIA.

Pepper and Lewis Digest, 1910, volume 1, page 1903, title "Pipe line companies," provides:

"SEC. 458. * * * That any company organized for such purposes, under the provisions of said act, shall have the right to transport, store, insure, and ship petroleum, and for that purpose to lay down, construct, and maintain pipes, tubing, tanks, offices, and such other machinery devices, or arrangements as may be necessary, and to enter upon, use, and occupy such lands as may be requisite for the purposes of the company; and for rights of entry upon lands, rights of way, and the use of materials necessary for the construction, maintenance, and operation of said lines of pipes and fixtures as aforesaid they shall be entitled to all the rights and privileges, and be subject to all the limitations and restrictions, of railroad companies as contained in the act relating to railroad companies approved February 19, 1849, and the supplements thereto: Provided, however, That nothing herein contained shall be construed to authorize the construction of any railroad."

TEXAS.

Herron's Supplement to Sayles's Texas Civil Statutes, 1897–1906, chapter 15a, page 104, title "Oil, gas, salt, etc., corporations," provides:

"SECTION 1. Any number of persons, not less than three, may organize themselves into a corporation for the purpose of storing, transporting, buying, and selling oil and gas, salt, brine, and other mineral solutions in this State.

"SEC. 3. Such corporation shall have power to store and transport oil and gas, brine, and other mineral solutions, and to make reasonable charges therefor. * * *

"SEC. 6. It shall be unlawful for any corporation organized under this act to discriminate against any person, corporation, firm, association, or place in the charge for such storage or transportation, or in the service rendered; but shall receive, store, or transfer oil or gas for any person, corporation, firm, or association upon equal terms, charges, and conditions with all other persons, corporations, firms, or associations for like service."

WEST VIRGINIA.

West Virginia Code, 1906, chapter 62C, title "Transportation of petroleum or other oils or liquids," provides:

"SEC. 2830. Any company heretofore or hereafter organized for the purpose of transporting petroleum or other oils or liquids by means of pipe line or lines shall be required to accept all petroleum offered to it in merchantable order, in quantities of not less than 2,000 gallons, at the wells where the same is produced, making at its own expense all necessary connections with the tanks or receptacles containing such petroleum, and to transport and deliver the same at any delivery station, within or without the State, on the route of its line of pipes which may be designated by the owners of the petroleum so offered."

WYOMING.

The constitution of Wyoming, section 7, article 10, title "Corporations," provides:

"All corporations engaged in the transportation of persons, property, mineral oils and mineral products, news or intelligence, including railroads, telegraphs, express companies, pipe lines, and telephones, are declared to be common carriers."

Congress itself has recognized the public interest in interstate transportation by pipe lines in its amendment to the act to regulate commerce of 1906. It was undoubtedly the intention of Congress to include all pipe lines, whether common carriers or private (so called), engaged in the transportation of petroleum in interstate commerce.

The Interstate Commerce Commission, upon its own motion, after investigation, decided that such was the intention of Congress, and ordered such "private pipe lines," so called, to file tariffs and charges and rules and regulations with said commission. Those pipe lines, however, which did not profess to be common carriers secured an injunction against said order of the commission by application to the Commerce Court, which said court sustained, and the question has been appealed to and now is under consideration by the Supreme Court of the United States.

While there can be no question of the general recognition of the public interest in all State and interstate transportation of petroleum or gases by pipe lines, yet from all the facts heretofore set out it must be obvious that such control and regulation will always be attended with its embarrassing features, and that the entire interest of the public in such utilities can never be adequately accomplished or perfected until Congress shall exercise its sovereign power in the acquisition and operation of all interstate pipe lines.

PANAMA CANAL TOLLS.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. 14385) to amend section 5 of an act to provide for the opening, maintenance, protection, and operation of the Panama Canal and the sanitation of the Canal Zone, approved August 24, 1912.

Mr. TOWNSEND. Mr. President, I ask permission to print as a part of my remarks a letter written on March 27, 1914, to J. P. Tumulty, Esq., Washington, D. C., by J. H. O'Neil. I do not agree with the writer that the railroads are entitled to the higher rates they ask. I do not agree that the depressed conditions mentioned by him are due to too low rail rates. I insert this letter from a Democrat to the President's secretary because the facts mentioned have a bearing on the prosperity issue which has been raised this afternoon.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there any objection? The Chair hears none.

The matter referred to is as follows:

FEDERAL TRUST CO.,
Boston, Mass., March 27, 1914.

J. P. TUMULTY, Esq.,
Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR MR. TUMULTY: Pardon me for bothering such a very busy man as you, but I know you are interested in the success of the party, and I want you to believe that I have no other object in writing. I have written Judge Clements and Secretary McAdoo, urging them to do something to hasten the case of railroad rates. In my opinion, anything would be better than nothing.

It is impossible to blink at the fact that slowly but surely business is getting to a standstill. For the first six months of the administration business was first class; for the second six months it was fair, but to-day it is dragging. One of the oldest machine shops in New England, down in Biddeford, Me., laid off 250 men; the New Haven shops at Readville have shut down, throwing 1,500 men out, and the Boston & Maine shops at Billerica, in this State, which have a capacity of employing 6,000 men, will not open. Now, these two latter may, of course, be blamed to local railroad conditions, but that is not true in the case of the Biddeford shop, nor in the case of the Pennsylvania Railroad Co., which has recently thrown out 15,000 men, 8,000 of them east of Pittsburgh. The Sturtevant Blower Works here has just let 250 men go. My information is that this is true pretty generally throughout the country.

For the past 30 years I have believed that the nub of any question in this country was the railroad situation; that when the railroads were prosperous the country was prosperous. While I admit that the railroads have done many, many things for which somebody should go to jail, I do not see why the present generation should be punished for the faults of those who have gone before. A 10 per cent increase in freight rates, as I pointed out to Judge Clements, on a case of shoes shipped from Boston to San Francisco would mean an additional cost of 1 cent per pair, but this 10 per cent increase in freight rates would mean $3 a week in the pockets of hundreds of thousands of men who would have to buy shoes, because it would give them work.

As I wrote Mr. McAdoo, I think in regard to many corporations, they ought to adopt the old Chinese custom, and when crimes are committed by corporations some heads should be lopped off and dropped into the basket—be cut close off to the shoulders. But we are facing a condition to-day, not a theory. Now, mind me, I do not own a share of railroad stock, and do not know that I ever shall, but I am writing you as one who can put in a word at the right place close up, and as you are a practical man, like myself, and know conditions as I think I know them, from practical experience, I hope that you will do your best to see that something is done, and done at once.

Should the roads not be allowed to increase their rates, then they must face bankruptcy or make a reduction in wages. I am opposed to a reduction in wages—radically and unalterably. Wages are none too good now. If it may be claimed that the railroad capitalization is excessive, I will admit it, but I do not think that the workingman, working for his day's wage, should be the one to be punished; rather give them a fair wage, a chance to live, and punish the fellows who have put the water into the road and arranged to squeeze it out. This is not a difficult thing to do, although it may take some time.

Now, I take the liberty of writing you on account of the friendly spirit you showed when I met you with Congressman MURRAY, and also because I believe you to be a practical man, who realizes, as I do, what these facts mean. Do this thing, and, in my opinion, the Republican Party need not nominate a candidate against us in 1916; do not do it, and I do not think there is the least necessity of our nominating one.

I may be in Washington some time next month, and, if so, I shall take the liberty of calling on you to say "How are you?"

With kindest regards, I am,

Yours, very truly, J. H. O'NEIL.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The pending amendment is the amendment offered by the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. NORRIS] in lieu of the amendment proposed by the committee.

Mr. O'GORMAN. May I ask what is the amendment to which the Chair refers?

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary will state the amendment.

The SECRETARY. In lieu of the amendment at the end of the bill offered by the committee, the Senator from Nebraska offers the following——

Mr. O'GORMAN. The Chair was speaking, then, of the amendment of the Interoceanic Canals Committee.

Mr. President, the tolls bill has been nominally before the Senate all day; but owing to the peculiar rules of this body everything else has been discussed, and no opportunity has been given to the Senators who desired to be heard on this question to present their views.

I would ask at this time unanimous consent to make the tolls bill the business of the Senate to the exclusion of all other business until a vote can be reached, but I understand that making that request at this hour would involve calling the roll. I shall, however, make that request to-morrow morning; and I hope nothing will be presented to the Senate in the way of a discussion that will interfere with the tolls bill, and an opportunity to take a vote upon it at the earliest practicable moment.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Mr. President, I had thought of suggesting that instead of adjourning to-day we take a recess until 10 o'clock to-morrow morning.

Mr. SMOOT. I hope the Senator will not do that.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Or a recess until 8 o'clock to-night.

Mr. SMOOT. Oh, no; not to-night. If the Senator will leave that matter until to-morrow and see if a unanimous-consent agreement can be reached, such as the Senator from New York gave notice he would ask, I think more than likely it will be granted, and then we can go right along and get through with the bill in the early part of the week.

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President——

Mr. O'GORMAN. Unless the Senator from Iowa wishes to proceed——

Mr. CUMMINS. Will the Senator from New York yield for a moment?

Mr. O'GORMAN. Yes.

Mr. CUMMINS. I desire only to suggest that the unanimous-consent agreement which he has proposed, which he says he will bring before the Senate to-morrow, ought to contain a provision that will give the President of the Senate power to confine the discussion taking place here to the bill before the Senate. Otherwise it will accomplish nothing, inasmuch as we have had the canal bill before us all day long and not a word has been said with regard to it.

Mr. O'GORMAN. Mr. President, I agree with the suggestion of the Senator from Iowa. The unanimous-consent agreement would amount to nothing unless Members should respect the spirit of it, refrain from injecting other matters into the discussion until such a time as a vote is had upon the unfinished business.

Mr. CUMMINS. Of course I do not suggest that for the purpose of having it written into the agreement, but I do suggest it in order to create a proper spirit in the Senate if the agreement shall be made. I suspended a speech upon this question yesterday in order to permit the Members of the Senate to attend a very notable and worthy ceremony which was about to take place. I have been waiting all day long for an opportunity to resume the observations I was then making upon the canal bill. While I suppose I have no technical right to the floor, I hope that before many volumes shall have been filled with extraneous discussion I may be permitted to finish the argument I began.

Mr. OWEN. Mr. President, on Thursday, April 16, 1789, this was the rule of the Senate:

VIII. While a question is before the Senate no motion shall be received, unless for an amendment, for the previous question, or for postponing the main question, or to commit it, or to adjourn.

IX. The previous question being moved and seconded, the question from the Chair shall be: "Shall the main question be now put?"

I think the time has come to restore this venerable rule of the United States Senate, and to have a cloture in the Senate; to have the previous question.

The Senate of the United States has lost in large measure the respect of the people of the United States and of Senators on this floor by the abuse of the privilege of free speech in this body. I wish to enter my protest against the continuance of the custom which permits unending debate upon any question. I wish to enter my emphatic dissent from the practice of the Senate.

Last summer I called attention to this matter and introduced a proposed modification of the rule, establishing the previous question in the Senate, or at least permitting the Senate, by a vote of the majority of its Members, to terminate at some time any question before the Senate. The matter of unanimous consent which is in vogue in this body has the effect of denying to the majority of the Senate the right to conduct the affairs of the Senate. It permits any bill or any number of bills to be used for the purpose, or at least with the effect, of killing time ad libitum; and in that way the majority is excluded from discharging its obligations to the people of the United States.

The Democratic Party, although in nominal control of this body, is absolutely unable to carry out its pledges to the people of the United States because of the obstruction of the business of this body by unlimited debate, a debate to which nobody listens. Senators rise on this floor and talk for hours——

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Mr. President, I wish to ask the Senator if a cloture rule requiring him to address himself to the subject before the Senate would not preclude him from making his present speech?

Mr. OWEN. It would; and it would preclude the Senator from Georgia from making many speeches he has delivered on this floor.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I should like to have the Senator call attention to them.

Mr. OWEN. I will hunt through the RECORD and try to do so. If not, he is the only exception.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Oklahoma yield to the Senator from New Hampshire?

Mr. OWEN. I had concluded what I wished to say.

Mr. GALLINGER. It would also have prevented the Senator from Oklahoma from filibustering for six or eight hours a little while ago to defeat a bill which the Senator did defeat.

Mr. OWEN. If the Senator is referring to the occasion when I objected to Arizona being kept out of the Union, I plead guilty. I will say to the Senator, moreover, that so long as our rules permit that kind of thing any Senator with sufficient resolution can do as he pleases on the floor of this body. I do not think it ought to be permitted. I am opposed to it for myself, and I am opposed to it for the Senator from New Hampshire.

Mr. GALLINGER. It is a matter of regret to some of us that the Senate has lost the reputation it formerly enjoyed in the estimation of the Senator from Oklahoma; and yet I apprehend the Senate will go along and transact its business exactly as it would have done if the Senator from Oklahoma had not read his lecture to the Senate to-day. There is no trouble about it. The Senator has offered his amendment to the rules, and I apprehend that the Senator will live to be as old as I am, at least, before it shall be adopted.

Mr. OWEN. Mr. President, I thank the Senator from New Hampshire for his lecture read to the Senator from Oklahoma; but I advise him that no amount of lecturing or hectoring on his part will abate one iota the opinion of the Senator from Oklahoma on this question.

I serve notice on the Senator, and on the Senate, too, that at some convenient time the unanimous consent in this body will be discontinued.

Mr. KENYON. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Oklahoma yield to the Senator from Iowa?

Mr. OWEN. I have yielded the floor.

Mr. KENYON. I wish to ask the Senator a question, if he pleases.

Mr. OWEN. I shall be glad to answer any question I can.

Mr. KENYON. Where is the Senator's amendment now? What is the status of it?

Mr. OWEN. It is lying, as all matters of this kind lie, in the bosom of the committee.

Mr. KENYON. What does the Senator propose to do about it? I am very much in sympathy with his amendment, and I wish to support it. I wish to have an opportunity to vote on it. Why does not the Senator press it?

Mr. OWEN. Because of the hope that the matters which have so urgently pressed upon the attention of the Senate might be disposed of, and because that matter itself, under the rules of the Senate, would be made a subject of unlimited debate and would preclude the consideration of anything else at this time.

Mr. KENYON. I wish the Senator could get it in the program of work for the summer.

Mr. OWEN. If I were making the program, it would be the first on the list.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, the Senator referred to the fact that the majority in this body could not control legislation, and complained that the time was wasted by unnecessary talk.

Mr. OWEN. Yes; there is no question whatever about it.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, to be perfectly honest in this matter, as far as the discussion of to-day is concerned, if the Senator had been in the Chamber he would have known that the great majority of the time of this body has been taken by members of the majority party.

Mr. OWEN. Oh, well, this is the practice of the Senate, and Senators avail themselves of it; but it is a bad practice, and against the practice I enter my emphatic protest. There are many other Senators here who are silent now who realize as well as the Senator from Oklahoma the unwisdom of this rule, and the fact that it is impairing the standing of the Senate, and is degrading the Senate in the respect of the people of the United States.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, I have been a Member of this body for 23 years, and I do not recall a single important measure that has ever been before the Senate that has not been voted on, with one exception, and that was defeated by a Democratic filibuster.

I think we have attended to the business of the country diligently. We have debated questions of importance at great length, it is true; they needed such debate; but they have always been voted on, and a majority of the Senate has determined whether or not they should become laws.

I do not think the evil is so great as the Senator from Oklahoma imagines it to be. I feel quite sure that if we should adopt the rule that prevails in another body, where debate on these great questions is almost absolutely forbidden, we would live to rue the time when we made the change.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Mr. President, I rose to ask the Senator from Iowa at what hour it would suit him to-morrow morning to speak.

Mr. CUMMINS. Personally, one hour would suit me as well as another, but I see no reason for convening earlier than the usual time. There is no difficulty about this matter, Mr. President. If we will adhere to the subject before the Senate, we will finish the debate very soon.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. What I wished to say was that if it would suit the Senator from Iowa, promptly after 11, I hope, although we can not make a unanimous-consent agreement this afternoon, the Senator from New York will move to take up the bill immediately after the approval of the Journal to-morrow, and that without taking any time for morning business to-morrow we may proceed with the unfinished business.

Mr. CUMMINS. I have no objection to convening at 11 o'clock and going forward immediately with what I have to say. We have a very important meeting of the Committee on Interstate Commerce at 10 o'clock to-morrow, which I feel I must attend. I hope there will be no effort made to convene the Senate before the usual time.

Mr. SMOOT. I wish to say to the Senator from Georgia that we have the matter in our own hands. We can object to anything outside of the routine morning business, and that will not take over 10 minutes in the morning. We can object to any consideration of outside matters.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Of course, one certain way to avoid it would be to take a recess until 11 o'clock to-morrow morning, and then have no morning hour.

Mr. BRISTOW. Mr. President, I desire to express my opinion, and I think it is the opinion of a great many Senators on this side of the Chamber. I do not speak for them except that I have heard expressions in conversation in the cloakroom. There is no desire on the part of anyone on this side, so far as I have had any conversation with Members, to delay a vote upon the tolls bill. The time that has been taken to-day has been taken by the majority. There has nothing been injected in this debate and no bill has been used upon the part of anyone on this side of the Chamber to delay the discussion. It seems to me if the majority want to keep the tolls bill before the Senate, so that we may consider it hour after hour, we will get to a vote, and those of us who attempt to attend to business faithfully will not be required to be here at unusual hours, either morning or evening.

So far as I am concerned, I do not want to put any obstacle in the way of a prompt disposition of this measure. I do not intend, if I can help it, to spend another summer in working day and night continuously with a program before us that will keep us here at least until October. I am willing to stay until October, if it is so decreed by those who are in control of the legislation of the country, but I am not willing to spend unusual hours so as to impair my health and the health of other Members of this body.

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. President, I wish to say in reply to the Senator from Kansas [Mr. BRISTOW] that I think I know the feeling of Members on this side and on the other side, too. There seems to be a feeling on both sides of the Chamber unusually strong that we should get to a vote upon this question as speedily as possible. I do not believe there is any disposition on either side to filibuster. For what has happened to-day the gentlemen who have participated are solely responsible, and I do not think it has been done by them with any view to postponing the vote upon the tolls bill, although it has had that effect.

I wish to give notice that if some other Senator does not do so, immediately after the reading of the Journal to-morrow I shall object to the consderation of any measure except the tolls bill.

Mr. O'GORMAN. In order to insure expedition in the consideration of the tolls bill to-morrow, I move that the Senate take a recess until 11 o'clock to-morrow, at which time the Senator from Iowa will be permitted to proceed with his discussion.

Mr. OLIVER. Will the Senator from New York withhold that motion for a moment?

Mr. O'GORMAN. Yes.

Mr. OLIVER. Inasmuch as evidently no business will be transacted to-morrow except in connection with the tolls bill, I wish to say that after to-morrow I shall be compelled to be away for at least 10 days, and I wish to ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of House bill 14242. It is a bill to increase the cost of the public building at Harrisburg, and one in which our people are greatly interested. It is a House bill and has been favorably reported from the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds of the Senate.

Mr. O'GORMAN. I yield for that purpose.

PUBLIC BUILDING AT HARRISBURG, PA.

Mr. OLIVER. I ask the Senate to proceed to the consideration of the bill (H. R. 14242) to increase the limit of cost for the erection and completion of the United States Federal building at Harrisburg, Pa.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill. It proposes to so amend the provision in section 2 of the public-building act of June 25, 1910, for the enlargement, extension, remodeling, or improvement of the post office and courthouse at Harrisburg, Pa., as to increase by $75,000 the limit of cost fixed by that act for the work; and the Secretary of the Treasury is authorized to enter into contracts for the completion of the enlargement, extension, remodeling, and improvement of the building within the limit of cost as hereby extended.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

RECESS.

Mr. O'GORMAN. I move that the Senate take a recess until 11 o'clock a. m. to-morrow.

Mr. BRISTOW. Let me suggest to the Senator from New York that a single objection will prevent any delay at all by reason of the morning business. A Senator can not make a speech or do anything else that will consume time except by unanimous consent, and it is in the power of the Senator from New York to object.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. There are resolutions coming over upon which Senators will have a right to speak.

Mr. O'GORMAN. Unless the Senator from Kansas has some business that he thinks ought to be presented to-morrow morning, I believe the wiser course is simply to take a recess, so that as soon as we convene the consideration of the tolls bill may be resumed.

Mr. BRISTOW. I have no desire to open up any debate upon resolutions that are pending. There is routine business that comes in which sometimes ought to be attended to at once. I will make no objection to the motion of the Senator.

Mr. O'GORMAN. Very well. I move that the Senate take a recess until 11 o'clock a. m. to-morrow.

The motion was agreed to; and (at 6 o'clock and 6 minutes p. m.) the Senate took a recess until to-morrow, Saturday, June 6, 1914, at 11 o'clock a. m.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

FRIDAY, June 5, 1914.

The House met at 11 o'clock a. m.

Rev. Ulysses G. B. Pierce, D. D., of All Souls Church, Washington, D. C., offered the following prayer:

Our Father who art in heaven, ere we turn to the labors to which Thou hast called us, we pause to acknowledge Thy goodness and to implore Thy guidance. Grant, we humbly pray Thee, that this day we may so labor as to receive the benediction of Thy favor. And as we ask Thy grace so do we render to Thee all glory now and forevermore. Amen.

The Journal of the proceedings of yesterday was read and approved.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

The Clerk read as follows:

CAMDEN, N. J., June 4, 1914.

Hon. CHAMP CLARK,
Speaker House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR MR. SPEAKER: I met with an accident last week; I had a fall and broke two bones in my hand, and I am practically helpless. I would respectfully request that I be granted leave of absence indefinitely, or until I recover the use of my hand.

Yours, very truly,

WM. J. BROWNING.

The SPEAKER. Without objection, the request is granted.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. Tulley, one of its clerks, announced that the Senate had passed without amendment bill of the following title:

H. R. 3334. An act authorizing the quitclaiming of the interest of the United States in certain land situated in Hampden County, Mass.

The message also announced that the Senate had passed joint resolution and bill of the following titles, in which the concurrence of the House of Representatives was requested:

S. J. Res. 155. Joint resolution to remit, under certain conditions and for the year 1914, the penalties provided by the act approved October 3, 1913, for failure to properly return the income tax provided for in said act in cases where said returns are completed by June 1, 1914; and

S. 4522. An act to amend an act entitled "An act to amend an act entitled 'An act to regulate commerce,' approved February 4, 1887, and all acts amendatory thereof, and to enlarge the powers of the Interstate Commerce Commission," approved June 29, 1906.

The message also announced that the Vice President had appointed Mr. PAGE and Mr. LANE members of the joint select committee on the part of the Senate, as provided for in the act of February 16, 1889, as amended by the act of March 2, 1895, entitled "An act to authorize and provide for the disposition of useless papers in the executive departments," for the disposition of useless papers in the War Department.

NATIONAL STAR-SPANGLED BANNER CENTENNIAL CELEBRATION.

Mr. LINTHICUM. Mr. Speaker, I ask to take from the Speaker's table Senate joint resolution 148.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Maryland asks to take from the Speaker's table Senate joint resolution 148, there being one of similar tenor on the House Calendar. The Clerk will report the resolution.

The Clerk read as follows:

Joint resolution (S. J. Res. 148) authorizing the President to extend invitations to foreign Governments to participate, through their accredited diplomatic agents to the United States, in the National Star-Spangled Banner Centennial Celebration.

Resolved, etc., That the President be, and he is hereby, authorized to extend invitations to foreign Governments to be represented by their accredited diplomatic agents to the United States at the National Star-Spangled Banner Centennial Celebration to be held at the city of Baltimore, Md., in September of the year 1914: Provided, That no appropriation shall be granted by the United States for expenses of delegates or for other expenses incurred in connection with said invitation.

The joint resolution was ordered to be read a third time, was read the third time, and passed; and House joint resolution 209 of similar tenor was laid on the table.

SPEECH OF HON. PATRICK H. KELLEY, OF MICHIGAN.

Mr. CRAMTON. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD by inserting an address by my colleague, Hon. PATRICK H. KELLEY, of Michigan.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Michigan [Mr. CRAMTON] asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD by printing a speech by his colleague, Gov. KELLEY. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS IN THE RECORD.

Mr. FESS. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD by printing a dispatch that was carried in the papers yesterday relative to whether the Monroe doctrine is in danger of being superseded by some other doctrine by the mediators at Niagara Falls.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Ohio [Mr. FESS] asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD by printing a dispatch that was in the papers yesterday to ascertain whether the Monroe doctrine is still extant or whether we are going to have a new doctrine. [Laughter.] Is there objection?

Mr. BARNHART. Mr. Speaker, being a newspaper man and believing everybody in the United States reads the newspapers and that they have read this article, I shall object.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Indiana objects.

Mr. MANN. Will the gentleman withhold his objection for a moment?

Mr. BARNHART. Yes.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, yesterday morning the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GORDON] asked unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD by printing a speech by Mr. Untermyer made some time ago——

Mr. BARNHART. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MANN (continuing). And the gentleman from Indiana objected.

Mr. BARNHART. That was day before yesterday.

Mr. MANN. It may have been day before yesterday. Yesterday morning the gentleman from Ohio was recognized for half a minute and stated, under leave to print, he would extend his remarks, which he did by inserting the speech. That was contrary to the rule. The leave to print under the rule provides that debate shall be confined to the subject matter under discussion and that the right to print shall be upon the bill. Doubtless the gentleman from Ohio was not aware of this fact, but I think the Members of the House ought to know that leave to print under the rule under which we are operating is not a leave to print generally, and does not authorize the insertion of a lot of matter in the RECORD which is not pertinent to the subject under discussion.

Mr. FESS. Will the gentleman withhold his objection for just a moment?

Mr. BARNHART. Yes; to accommodate the gentleman.

Mr. FESS. I raised the question here some time ago whether the program of mediation might not reach this point. This dispatch of yesterday is no criticism of the administration, but rather complimentary to it, and I thought that probably there would be no objection to my having it inserted in the RECORD, indicating that I have not been dreaming on that question, and I would ask the gentleman if he would object, under the five-minute rule, to my inserting the dispatch?

Mr. BARNHART. I would have no disposition to object under the five-minute rule. I have no more control over that rule than any other Member of the House.

Mr. MANN. I will say under the five-minute rule the debate must be confined to the bill.

Mr. BARNHART. I understand that. In order to be understood in reference to this matter I desire to state that when I became chairman of the Committee on Printing I was asked by some leaders of the House if I could not be effective in preventing abuses of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD by extending remarks including newspaper and magazine articles. I have tried to do it in a modest way, and probably given some offense at times in endeavoring to do so, for which I am very sorry. Members have their rights under the regular rules of the House to insert speeches and addresses and extend remarks, and if they take advantage of that and impose upon the rights and privileges and consistency in the use of the RECORD that is no more my affair than it is of any other Member of the House; but what I have been trying to do is to prevent the publication of miscellaneous newspaper and magazine articles and addresses by Tom, Dick, and Harry, who are not Members of the House, on subjects which many times are entirely foreign to legislative matters, but which is no doubt wholesome reading to the man who wants it inserted. I have no objection to the ambition of speakers to get their remarks in the RECORD, but, so far as I am concerned, I am going to continue to object to the insertion of newspaper articles and such miscellaneous stuff when they are offered.

Mr. FESS. Mr. Speaker, I appreciate fully the situation of the chairman of the Committee on Printing. I have no criticism personally; but I should like, however, to get this matter before the House some time, because I regard it a matter sufficiently important to ask for its publication. Yesterday under the general debate we did violate the rule by discussing subjects not pertinent to the subject under discussion, and there was no objection then. However, if the gentleman has objected to it, I will have to submit.

Mr. DONOVAN. Mr. Speaker, was the request of the gentleman from Ohio agreed to?

The SPEAKER. No; the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. BARNHART] objected.

CORRECTION IN A VOTE.

Mr. BAILEY. Mr. Speaker, I wish to have a correction made in the RECORD. On page 9800 of the RECORD it is stated that I was among those who failed to answer to the roll call yesterday. I was in the Chamber and answered "present."

The SPEAKER. Without objection, the correction will be made both in the Journal and the RECORD.

Mr. DONOVAN. Mr. Speaker, I want to reserve the right to object.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Connecticut [Mr. DONOVAN] reserves the right to object. Will the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. BAILEY] give his attention?

Mr. DONOVAN. Now, I object for this purpose. The gentleman from Ohio [Mr. FESS] and the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. BARNHART] and the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] have more or less to say all the time as to what shall go into the RECORD. Here is a most villainous article in the RECORD, put in a few days ago, and I can not find for the life of me where the gentleman got any right or permission to put it in the RECORD. It is placed there by a Member from Wisconsin, one who is very seldom here, and it appears on page 10510. Now, that one article alone ought to eliminate everything from being extended or inserted in the RECORD. This Member practically calls a citizen of the District of Columbia a thief, and also accuses some of the officials of the District of Columbia. Now, the point I want to make is that the gentleman from Ohio and the great leader from Illinois allow those things to take place, as does the gentleman from Indiana, without any objection. I withdraw my objection.

Mr. RAYBURN and Mr. BARNHART rose.

The SPEAKER pro tempore (Mr. ADAMSON). The gentleman from Indiana [Mr. BARNHART] is recognized.

Mr. BARNHART. Mr. Speaker, just a word of explanation. I think if the gentleman from Connecticut [Mr. DONOVAN] will look at the RECORD he will discover that that speech is there by permission of the House, granted at the request of the Member to extend his remarks in the RECORD. The gentleman from Connecticut is just as much responsible to the House and to the country for having permitted what he thinks is an improper speech to be inserted in the RECORD as any other Member on the floor of the House, if he sits there dumb when requests are made for the extension of remarks. I have no means of knowing what a Member is going to say when he asks to extend his own remarks in the RECORD, and doubt if I have any right to object, and do not know that I could keep them out if I did object.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair understands that the gentleman from Connecticut has withdrawn his objection. Is there objection now to the request of the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. BAILEY]?

Mr. DONOVAN. I want to say that there was no request made to insert the speech, according to the RECORD.

Mr. MANN. Regular order, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. RAYBURN. Mr. Speaker, the regular order.

Mr. MANN. I hope the gentleman from Connecticut [Mr. DONOVAN] will be in order for once. He so seldom is in order.

REGULATION OF RAILWAY STOCKS AND BONDS.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The regular order is the further consideration of the stock-and-bond bill, H. R. 16586, and the House resolves itself automatically into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, with the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. HULL] in the chair.

The CHAIRMAN. The House is in the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the bill H. R. 16586 and other bills embraced in the special order of the House. The Clerk will report the bill by title.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (H. R. 16586) to amend section 20 of an act to regulate commerce.

Mr. CULLOP. Mr. Chairman, I desire to send to the Clerk's desk a committee substitute for the pending bill. Copies of it have been distributed to the Members here, and I shall ask the chairman of the committee to see if he can not make some arrangement for the consideration of the substitute at this time.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Indiana [Mr. CULLOP] offers a substitute——

Mr. MANN. A substitute is not in order.

Mr. GARNER. Mr. Chairman, the original bill has not been read.

Mr. ADAMSON. Mr. Chairman, I will not try to press that until I have an understanding about it. I wish to ask unanimous consent on behalf of the committee that in lieu of the bill the substitute, copies of which were circulated and are on the desk, shall be read and considered in lieu of the original bill, with all the rights and privileges of the bill.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I will have to object to that at this time. The bill has been reported. Let it be read, so that it will be printed in the RECORD, at least.

Mr. ADAMSON. I have no objection to its being printed in the RECORD. But I will say to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] that the committee has worked on the bill in light of the objections and discussions, and we are practically unanimous on the substitute, which divides the bill into two sections and rearranges some of the matter, in every respect making it much more satisfactory to the committee. And we can save time if we would read the substitute for amendment and discussion in lieu of the original bill.

Mr. MANN. That will come later when the gentleman offers a substitute in the regular order.

Mr. ADAMSON. The difficulty is that I thought it would come so much later that we could save time by reading the substitute now.

Mr. MANN. I think it would save time in this way.

The CHAIRMAN. Objection is heard to the request of the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. ADAMSON]. The Clerk will read the bill for amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That section 20 of an act entitled "An act to regulate commerce," approved February 4, 1887, as amended, be amended so as to hereafter read as follows.

Mr. ADAMSON. Mr. Chairman, would it be in order at the end of the reading down to the end of line 6 to offer a substitute to that section, with the understanding that we will move to strike out all the remainder of the bill?

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will state to the gentleman that when the first section of the bill is read——

Mr. ADAMSON. There is but one section to the bill.

The CHAIRMAN. Just one section. The rule of the committee in considering bills other than revenue and appropriation bills is to read them by sections instead of by paragraphs.

Mr. ADAMSON. Could I get unanimous consent here to offer a substitute?

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I think the original bill reported to the House ought to be read to the House.

Mr. ADAMSON. All right; go ahead.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk concluded the reading of the bill, as follows:

SEC. 20. That the commission is hereby authorized to require annual reports from all common carriers subject to the provisions of this act, and from the owners of all railroads engaged in interstate commerce as defined in this act; to prescribe the manner in which such reports shall be made, and to require from such carriers specific answers to all questions upon which the commission may need information. Such annual report shall show in detail the amount of capital stock issued, the amounts paid therefor, and the manner of payment for the same; the dividends paid, the surplus fund, if any, and the number of stockholders; the funded and floating debts and the interest paid thereon; the cost and value of the carrier's property, franchises, and equipments; the number of employees, and the salaries paid each class; the accidents to passengers, employees, and other persons, and the causes thereof; the amounts expended for improvements each year, how expended, and the character of such improvements; the earnings and receipts from each branch of business and from all sources; the operating and other expenses; the balances of profit and loss, and a complete exhibit of the financial operations of the carrier each year, including an annual balance sheet. Such reports shall also contain such information in relation to rates or regulations concerning fares or freights, or agreements, arrangements, or contracts affecting the same, as the commission may require; and the commission may, in its discretion, for the purpose of enabling it the better to carry out the purposes of this act, prescribe a period of time within which all common carriers subject to the provisions of this act shall have, as near as may be, a uniform system of accounts, and the manner in which such accounts shall be kept.

Said detailed reports shall contain all the required statistics for the period of 12 months ending on the 30th day of June in each year, or on the 31st day of December in each year if the commission by order substitute that period for the year ending June 30, and shall be made out under oath and filed with the commission at its office in Washington within three months after the close of the year for which the report is made, unless additional time be granted in any case by the commission; and if any carrier, person, or corporation subject to the provisions of this act shall fail to make and file said annual reports within the time above specified, or within the time extended by the commission for making and filing the same, or shall fail to make specific answer to any question authorized by the provisions of this section within 30 days from the time it is lawfully required so to do, such party shall forfeit to the United States the sum of $100 for each and every day it shall continue to be in default with respect thereto. The commission shall also have authority by general or special orders to require said carriers, or any of them, to file monthly reports of earnings and expenses, and to file periodical or special, or both periodical and special, reports concerning any matters about which the commission is authorized or required by this law, or any other law, to inquire or to keep itself informed or which it is required to enforce, including the matter of making public information regarding the issuance by said carriers of stocks, bonds, or other evidences of indebtedness. In such periodical or special reports the commission may require of the carrier, in addition to its income account, a balanced statement of its receipts and expenditures on capital account, and of the surplus of the income account accruing during the period covered by such statement, as well as of all other financial transactions that have taken place during such period, with whom had, whether in cash, in securities, or in other valuable consideration. The commission may also require the carrier to compile for the information of its shareholders such facts in regard to the financial transactions of the carrier for its fiscal year in such form as the commission may direct.

Every common carrier subject to the provisions of this act shall file with the commission on or prior to the date of issuance of any stocks, bonds, notes, or other evidences of indebtedness payable at periods of more than 12 months after the date thereof, and now or hereafter to be authorized, a certificate of notification in such form as the commission may from time to time determine and prescribe, which shall show:

First. (a) The total amount thereof authorized.

(b) The number and amount thereof outstanding prior to the date of such certificate; the amount thereof theretofore retired; the amount thereof then undisposed of, and whether such amount is held in the treasury of the corporation as a free asset or pledged, and if pledged, the terms and conditions of such pledge.

(c) The number and amount thereof then to be issued and whether to be sold, pledged, or held in the treasury of the corporation as a free asset; if such securities are to be sold, the terms of sale if a contract for such sale has been made, and if any part of the consideration to be received therefor is other than money, an accurate and detailed description thereof; if such securities are to be pledged, the terms and conditions of such pledge.

(d) The number and amount thereof remaining unissued.

(e) If the issue is of shares of stock, the certificate shall also show the par value thereof; or if the issue is of shares of stock that have no specified nominal or par value, the number of such shares, and the number of then outstanding shares previously issued.

2. The preferences of privileges granted to the holders of any such shares of stock; the dates of maturity, rates of interest of any such bonds, notes, or other evidences of indebtedness, and any conversion rights granted to the holders thereof, and the price, if any, at which such shares or bonds may be redeemed.

3. The purposes, in detail, to which the proceeds of the issue are to be devoted.

Whenever any securities set forth and described in any certificate of notification as pledged or held as a free asset in the treasury of the corporation shall, subsequent to the filing of such certificate, be sold or repledged or otherwise disposed of by the corporation, such corporation shall file a further certificate of notification to that effect, setting forth therein all such facts as are required by subdivision (c) of the foregoing first paragraph.

The provisions in regard to certificates of notification shall apply to notes or evidences of indebtedness running for periods of 12 months or less, and to the pledging or repledging of stocks, bonds, or other evidences of indebtedness to secure such notes or evidences of indebtedness running for periods of 12 months or less, except that such certificates may be filed within 10 days after the issue thereof instead of on or prior to the date of such issue.

The certificates of notification shall be signed and verified by the auditor, comptroller, or other acting fiscal head of the carrier.

Periodical or special reports to the commission, reports of the carriers to its stockholders, or certificates of notification shall be under oath whenever the commission so requires; and if any such carrier shall fail to make and file any such periodical or special report, or report to its stockholders, within the time fixed by the commission, it shall be subject to the forfeitures last above provided. If any such carrier shall refuse or fail to file certificates of notification as above provided, it shall be subject to a forfeiture of not less than $100 nor more than $5,000 for each such offense, and $100 for each day of the continuance of such offense; and the officer or officers of the carrier whose duty it is to cause the certificate to be filed shall, upon refusal or willful neglect to cause it to be filed, be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor, and shall be subject, upon conviction in any court of the United States of competent jurisdiction, to a fine of not less than $1,000 nor more than $5,000, or imprisonment for a term of not less than one year nor more than three years, or both such fine and imprisonment.

Said forfeitures shall be recovered in the manner provided for the recovery of forfeitures under the provisions of this act.

The oath required by this section may be taken before any person authorized to administer an oath by the laws of the State in which the same is taken.

It shall be the duty of the commission to make public by appropriate means the information received as in its discretion it may deem proper; and the certificates of notification shall at all times be deemed public records and open to inspection.

The commission shall have the power to investigate all financial transactions of said carriers and to inquire into the good faith thereof, to examine the books, papers, and correspondence of carriers, construction or other companies, or of firms or individuals with which the carrier shall have had financial transactions, for the purpose of enabling it to verify any statements furnished, and to examine into the actual cost and value of property acquired by it or services rendered to such carrier. The carrier may be required by order of the commission to disclose every interest of the directors of such carrier in any transaction under investigation. In addition to the certificates and reports hereinbefore mentioned, the commission may require the carrier to furnish any further statements of fact or evidence that it may deem necessary or appropriate.

The commission may, in its discretion, prescribe the forms of any and all accounts, records, and memoranda to be kept by carriers subject to the provisions of this act, including the accounts, records, and memoranda of the movement of traffic, as well as the receipts and expenditures of moneys. The commission shall at all times have access to all accounts, records, memoranda, correspondence, and other documents and papers regardless of the dates thereof kept by carriers subject to this act, and it shall be unlawful for such carriers to keep any other accounts, records, or memoranda than those prescribed or approved by the commission, and the commission may employ special agents or examiners, who shall have authority under the order of the commission to inspect and examine any and all such accounts, records, memoranda, correspondence, documents, and papers, and also the books, papers, and correspondence of carriers, construction or other companies, or of firms or individuals with which a carrier shall have had financial transactions. This provision shall apply to receivers of carriers and operating trustees.

In case of failure or refusal on the part of any such carrier, receiver, or trustee to keep such accounts, records, and memoranda on the books and in the manner prescribed by the commission, or to keep such correspondence and other documents and papers, or to submit such accounts, records, memoranda, and other documents and papers to the inspection of the commission, or any of its authorized agents or examiners, such carrier, receiver, or trustee shall forfeit to the United States the sum of $500 for each such offense and for each and every day of the continuance of such offense, such forfeitures to be recoverable in the same manner as other forfeitures provided for in this act. Failure or refusal of carriers, construction or other companies, or firms or individuals with which a carrier shall have had financial transactions to submit their books, papers, and correspondence for examination shall subject them to the same forfeitures, to be recovered in the same manner.

Any person who shall willfully make any false entry in the accounts of any book of accounts, or in any record or memoranda kept by a carrier, or who shall willfully file any certificate or other paper required under this act containing false or erroneous statements of fact, or who shall willfully destroy, mutilate, alter, or by any other means or device falsify the record of any such account, record, memoranda, correspondence, or other documents or papers, or who shall willfully neglect or fail to make full, true, and correct entries in such accounts, records, or memoranda of all facts and transactions appertaining to the carrier's business, or shall keep any other accounts, records, or memoranda than those prescribed or approved by the commission, shall be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor, and shall be subject, upon conviction in any court of the United States of competent jurisdiction, to a fine of not less than $1,000 nor more than $5,000 or imprisonment for a term not less than one year nor more than three years, or both such fine and imprisonment: Provided, That the commission may, in its discretion, issue orders specifying such operating, accounting, or financial papers, records, books, blanks, tickets, stubs, or documents of carriers which may, after a reasonable time, be destroyed, and prescribing the length of time such books, papers, or documents shall be preserved.

Any examiner who divulges any fact or information which may come to his knowledge during the course of such examination, except in so far as he may be directed by the commission or by a court or judge thereof, shall be subject, upon conviction in any court of the United States of competent jurisdiction, to a fine of not more than $5,000 or imprisonment for a term not exceeding two years, or both.

That the district courts of the United States shall have jurisdiction, upon the application of the Attorney General of the United States at the request of the commission, alleging a failure to comply with, or a violation of any of the provisions of said act to regulate commerce, or of any act supplementary thereto or amendatory thereof, by any common carrier, to issue a writ or writs of mandamus commanding such common carrier to comply with the provisions of said act, or any of them.

That it shall be unlawful for any common carrier subject to the act to regulate commerce as amended to issue any capital stock or certificate of stock or any bond or other evidence of indebtedness or to assume any obligation as lessor, guarantor, or surety for the securities of any other person, natural or artificial, even though permitted by the authority creating the carrier corporation, except for some purpose within its corporate powers necessary to the proper performance of its service for the public and not tending to impair the financial ability of the carrier to discharge its duty to the public. Extensions and improvements of its railroads and terminals used in connection therewith, increasing and improving its equipment, refunding and retiring existing bonds, and similar and kindred purposes, shall be held to be necessary purposes in the meaning of this paragraph. It shall likewise be unlawful to issue any such stock or bonds for purposes hereinbefore mentioned or for any other purpose connected with or relating to that part of the business of such carrier governed by the act to regulate commerce as amended unless and until upon application and after investigation in the premises by the Interstate Commerce Commission of the purposes and uses of the issue and the proceeds thereof, such issue is approved by said commission as necessary and appropriate for the purpose stated: Provided, That nothing herein shall be construed to imply any guaranty or obligation as to such issues on the part of the United States: Provided, however, That the provisions of this section shall not apply to notes issued by such carrier maturing not more than two years after their date, when such notes do not at any time aggregate more than 5 per cent of the total amount of the stocks and bonds of such carrier which may have been issued and are then outstanding: And provided further, That upon application to the Interstate Commerce Commission for approval of proposed issues of stocks and bonds the said commission shall cause notice to be given, with copy of application and any other proceedings had, to the railroad commission or public-service or utilities commission, or whatever other appropriate authority may exist; and, if none, then to the governor and attorney general in each State through which any railroad or part of the system concerned passes or through which the carrier making the application operates any part of its lines. The railroad commission, public-service or utilities commission, governor, attorney general, or other appropriate State authority thus notified shall have the right to present before the Interstate Commerce Commission such representations as they may deem just and proper for preserving and conserving the right and interests of their people and the States, respectively, as involved in such proceeding, and the right to be fully heard touching the same; the allegations thus presented to be fully considered and determined by the Interstate Commerce Commission, in each instance, as may be just and reasonable, along with the other matters and things under said proceeding or application pending before that body as aforesaid.

All issues of capital stock, certificates of stock, bonds, and other evidences of indebtedness, contrary to the provisions of this section, may be enjoined by any court of competent jurisdiction at the suit of the United States, or of any director, officer, or stockholder of the carrier proposing to make the issue; and any director, officer, or stockholder of such corporation who assents to, or concurs in, any issue of securities forbidden by this section shall be punished by a fine of not less than $1,000 nor more than $10,000, or by imprisonment for not less than one year nor more than three years, or by both such fine and imprisonment.

That after two years from the passage hereof, unless the previous approval of the Interstate Commerce Commission shall have been secured, it shall be unlawful for any person to hold the position of officer or director of more than one carrier subject to the act to regulate commerce, or for any officer of such carrier to issue any certificate of stock, or issue and deliver any bonds until the approval of the Interstate Commerce Commission shall have first been secured. It shall also be unlawful for any president, vice president, chairman of board of directors, director, or directory of any such carrier to appropriate, pay, or receive as salaries or dividends any money resulting from the sale of stocks or bonds. Any violation of this provision shall be a misdemeanor, and on conviction in any United States court having jurisdiction shall be punished by a fine or imprisonment, or both, in the discretion of the court.

And to carry out and give effect to the provisions of said acts, or any of them, the commission is hereby authorized to employ special agents or examiners, who shall have power to administer oaths, examine witnesses, and receive evidence. That any common carrier, railroad, or transportation company receiving property for transportation from a point in one State to a point in another State shall issue a receipt or bill of lading therefor, and shall be liable to the lawful holder thereof for any loss, damage, or injury to such property caused by it or by any common carrier, railroad, or transportation company to which such property may be delivered, or over whose line or lines such property may pass, and no contract, receipt, rule, or regulation shall exempt such common carrier, railroad, or transportation company from the liability hereby imposed: Provided, That nothing in this section shall deprive any holder of such receipt or bill of lading of any remedy or right of action which he has under existing law.

That the common carrier, railroad, or transportation company issuing such receipt or bill of lading shall be entitled to recover from the common carrier, railroad, or transportation company on whose line the loss, damage, or injury shall have been sustained the amount of such loss, damage, or injury as it may be required to pay to the owners of such property, as may be evidenced by any receipt, judgment, or transcript thereof.

Mr. ADAMSON. Mr. Chairman, I would like to make a suggestion to the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. STEVENS] and see if we can not reach an agreement as to considering the substitute sent to the desk by the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. CULLOP] in lieu of the original bill. If amendments are to be offered and arguments addressed to them, I would like to get an agreement that they be offered to the substitute instead of the original bill. It is unnecessary, I think, to proceed to perfect the original, because our committee is practically unanimous on agreeing to the substitute in lieu of the original, and if we can agree to let further consideration be directed to the substitute instead of the original bill, I think it would be better.

Mr. STEVENS of Minnesota. The substitute is composed of more than one section, and the rules of the House should apply, as usual, to the substitute.

Mr. MANN. The substitute is offered as one amendment.

Mr. STEVENS of Minnesota. But I know it would be more convenient. However, Mr. Chairman, it is satisfactory to us.

Mr. ADAMSON. Then the proposition is that further consideration of the matter be addressed to the substitute offered by the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. CULLOP].

Mr. MURDOCK. Does the gentleman mean by that that no amendment will be in order?

Mr. ADAMSON. I am willing that the substitute shall be considered instead of the original. I do not want to abridge amendments at all.

Mr. MANN. Has the substitute been offered?

Mr. ADAMSON. It has been sent to the desk.

Mr. CULLOP. I offer it now.

Mr. MANN. I call for the regular order, Mr. Chairman.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Indiana [Mr. CULLOP] offers a substitute to the section of the bill just reported.

Mr. ADAMSON. The unanimous consent request is that amendment and argument be addressed to the substitute.

Mr. MANN. I ask for the regular order.

The CHAIRMAN. The regular order is demanded. The substitute will be read.

The Clerk read as follows:

(Proposed substitute for H. R. 16586.)

[NOTE.—The parts of the bill in italics are new legislation proposed by the committee bill; parts in brackets are present law, to be omitted.]

A bill to amend section 20 of an act to regulate commerce, to prevent overissues of securities by carriers, and for other purposes.

Be it enacted, etc., SECTION 1. That section 20 of an act entitled "An act to regulate commerce," approved February 4, 1887, as amended, be amended so as hereafter to read as follows:

"SEC. 20. That the commission is hereby authorized to require annual reports from all common carriers subject to the provisions of this act, and from the owners of all railroads engaged in interstate commerce as defined in this act; to prescribe the manner in which such reports shall be made, and to require from such carriers specific answers to all questions upon which the commission may need information. Such annual report shall show in detail the amount of capital stock issued, the amounts paid therefor, and the manner of payment for the same; the dividends paid; the surplus fund, if any, and the number of stockholders; the funded and floating debts and the interest paid thereon; the cost and value of the carrier's property, franchises, and equipments; the number of employees, and the salaries paid each class; [the accidents to passengers, employees, and other persons, and the causes thereof;] the amounts expended for improvements each year, how expended, and the character of such improvements; the earnings and receipts from each branch of business and from all sources; the operating and other expenses; the balances of profit and loss, and a complete exhibit of the financial operations of the carrier each year, including an annual balance sheet. Such reports shall also contain such information in relation to rates or regulations concerning fares or freights, or agreements, arrangements, or contracts affecting the same, as the commission may require; and the commission may, in its discretion, for the purpose of enabling it the better to carry out the purposes of this act, prescribe a period of time within which all common carriers subject to the provisions of this act shall have, as near as may be, a uniform system of accounts, and the manner in which such accounts shall be kept.

"Said detailed reports shall contain all the required statistics for the period of 12 months ending on the 30th day of June in each year, or on the 31st day of December in each year if the commission by order substitute that period for the year ending June 30, and shall be made out under oath and filed with the commission at its office in Washington within three months after the close of the year for which the report is made, unless additional time be granted in any case by the commission; and if any carrier, person, or corporation subject to the provisions of this act shall fail to make and file said annual reports within the time above specified, or within the time extended by the commission for making and filing the same, or shall fail to make specific answer to any question authorized by the provisions of this section within [30 days from] the time [it is lawfully required so to do] fixed by the commission, such party shall forfeit to the United States the sum of $100 for each and every day it shall continue to be in default with respect thereto. The commission shall also have authority by general or special orders to require said carriers, or any of them, to file monthly reports of earnings and expenses, and to file periodical or special, or both periodical and special, reports concerning any matters about which the commission is authorized or required by this law, or by any other law, to inquire or to keep itself informed or which it is required to enforce, including the matter of making public, by appropriate means, any information regarding the issuance by said carriers of stocks, bonds, or other evidences of interest or indebtedness. In such periodical or special reports the commission may require of the carrier, in addition to its income account, a balanced statement of its receipts and expenditures on capital account, and of the surplus of the income account accruing during the period covered by such statement, as well as of all other financial transactions that have taken place during such period, with whom had, whether in cash, in securities, or in other valuable consideration. The commission may also require the carrier to compile for the information of its stockholders such facts in regard to the financial transactions of the carrier for its fiscal year and in such form as the commission may direct.

[and] "Such periodical or special reports to the commission, and reports of the carriers to stockholders, shall be under oath whenever the commission so requires; and if any such carrier shall fail to make and file any such periodical or special report, or report to its stockholders, within the time fixed by the commission, it shall be subject to the forfeitures last above provided.

"Said forfeitures shall be recovered in the manner provided for the recovery of forfeitures under the provisions of this act.

"The oath required by this section may be taken before any person authorized to administer an oath by the laws of the [State] place in which the same is taken.

"The commission shall have the power to investigate all financial transactions of said carriers and to examine into the actual cost and value of property acquired by, or services rendered to, said carriers. The carrier may be required by order of the commission to disclose every interest, direct or indirect, of the directors, stockholders, officers, agents, attorneys, employees, receivers, or operating trustees of such carrier in any transaction under investigation. In addition to the certificates and reports herein mentioned, the commission may require the carrier to furnish any further statements of fact or evidence that it may deem necessary or appropriate relating to business transactions of, for, or with said carrier.

"The commission may, in its discretion, prescribe the forms of any and all accounts, records, and memoranda to be kept by carriers subject to the provisions of this act, including the accounts, records, and memoranda of the movement of traffic, as well as the receipts and expenditures of moneys, and it shall be unlawful for [such] said carriers to keep any other accounts, records, or memoranda than those prescribed or approved by the commission.

"In case of failure or refusal on the part of any [such] said carrier [receiver, or trustee] to keep such accounts, records, and memoranda [on the books and] in the manner prescribed by the commission, [or to submit such accounts, records, and memoranda as are kept to the inspection of the commission, or any of its authorized agents or examiners, such] said carrier [receiver, or trustee] shall forfeit to the United States the sum of $500 for each such offense and for each and every day of the continuance of such offense, such forfeitures to be recoverable in the same manner as other forfeitures provided for in this act.

"The commission shall at all times have access to all accounts, records, [and] memoranda, correspondence, documents, papers, and other writings, regardless of the dates thereof, [kept by carriers subject to this act,] relating to financial transactions of, for, or with said carriers, and kept or preserved by or for, or in the custody or under the control of—

"(a) Any carrier subject to this act;

"(b) Any director, stockholder, officer, agent, attorney, employee, receiver, or operating trustee of said carrier;

"(c) Any other person, persons, corporation, joint-stock company, or corporate combination having, or having had, any financial transactions with or for said carrier.

Mr. MOORE. Mr. Chairman, a parliamentary inquiry.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. MOORE. Would it be in order to move to strike out the last word now for the purpose of discussion under the five-minute rule, or must we wait until the reading is completed?

The CHAIRMAN. It would not be in order. The substitute would have to be read and considered as one amendment.

Mr. MOORE. This is the close of the paragraph; but we must not discuss it until the close of the reading of the section?

The CHAIRMAN. That is the Chair's understanding of the parliamentary situation. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk resumed the reading of the substitute, as follows:

[and it] The commission may employ special agents or examiners, who shall have authority under the order of the commission to inspect [and] examine and take copies of any and all accounts, records, [and] memoranda, correspondence, documents, papers [kept by such carriers. This provision shall apply to receivers of carriers and operating trustees], and other writings to which the commission has the right of access as above provided. Failure or refusal to afford such access shall constitute an offense for which the offender shall forfeit to the United States the sum of $500 for each such offense, and for each and every day of the continuance of the offense, such forfeitures to be recoverable in the same manner as other forfeitures provided for in this act.

"Any person or persons, natural or artificial, who shall willfully make, or cause to be made, any false entry in [the] any accounts, [of any book of accounts, or in any record] records, or memoranda kept by a carrier subject to this act, or who shall willfully neglect or fail to make, or cause to be made, full, true, and correct entries in such accounts, records, or memoranda of all facts and transactions appertaining to the carrier's business, or shall keep or cause to be kept any other accounts, records, or memoranda of said business than those prescribed or approved by the commission, or who shall willfully file, or cause to be filed, any application, certificate, or other paper required under this act containing false or erroneous statements of fact, or who shall willfully destroy, mutilate, alter, or by any other means or device falsify any [the record of any such account, record, or] accounts, records, memoranda, correspondence, documents, papers, or other writings to which the commission has the right of access as above provided, shall be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor, and shall be subject, upon conviction in any court of the United States of competent jurisdiction, to a fine of not less than $1,000 nor more than [$5,000] $5,000 or, if a natural person, to imprisonment for a term of not less than one year nor more than three years, or to both such fine and imprisonment, in the discretion of the court. In construing and enforcing the provisions of this section, the act of any director, stockholder, officer, agent, attorney, employee, receiver, operating trustee, or other person acting for or employed by any carrier, corporation, joint-stock company, or other corporate combination, acting within the scope of his employment, shall be deemed the act of the carrier, corporation, joint-stock company, or other corporate combination, as well as that of the person so acting. [: Provided, That the] The commission may, in its discretion, issue orders [specifying such] designating the operating, accounting, or financial papers, records, books, blanks, tickets, stubs, [or] documents, [of carriers] or other papers or writings to which the commission has the right of access as aforesaid, which may, after a reasonable time, be destroyed, and prescribing the length of time [such books, papers, or documents] that all or any of the same shall be preserved.

"Any examiner who divulges any fact or information which may come to his knowledge during the course of such examination, except in so far as he may be directed by the commission, or by a court or judge thereof, shall be subject, upon conviction in any court of the United States of competent jurisdiction, to a fine of not more than $5,000 or to imprisonment for a term of not exceeding two years, or to both such fine and imprisonment, in the discretion of the court.

"[That the] The [circuit and] district courts of the United States shall have jurisdiction, upon the application of the Attorney General of the United States at the request of the commission, alleging a failure to comply with, or a violation of, any of the provisions of said act to regulate commerce, or of any act supplementary thereto or amendatory thereof, by any common carrier, to issue a writ or writs of mandamus commanding such common carrier to comply with the provisions of said acts, or any of them.

"And to carry out and give effect to the provisions of [said acts, or any of them] the act to regulate commerce or any amendment thereof the commission is hereby authorized to employ special agents or examiners, who shall have power to administer oaths, examine witnesses, and receive evidence.

"[That any] Any common carrier, railroad, or transportation company receiving property for transportation from a point in one State to a point in another State shall issue a receipt or bill of lading therefor, and shall be liable to the lawful holder thereof for any loss, damage, or injury to such property caused by it or by any common carrier, railroad, or transportation company to which such property may be delivered, or over whose line or lines such property may pass, and no contract, receipt, rule, or regulation shall exempt such common carrier, railroad, or transportation company from the liability hereby imposed: Provided, That nothing in this section shall deprive any holder of such receipt or bill of lading of any remedy or right of action which he has under existing law.

"[That the] The common carrier, railroad, or transportation company issuing such receipt or bill of lading shall be entitled to recover from the common carrier, railroad, or transportation company on whose line the loss, damage, or injury shall have been sustained the amount of such loss, damage, or injury as it may be required to pay to the owners of such property, as may be evidenced by any receipt, judgment, or transcript thereof."

Sec. 2. That the act to regulate commerce as amended be further amended by inserting therein a new section, to be designated section 20a, to be placed after section 20 and before section 21, to read as follows:

"Sec. 20a. That from and after the passage hereof it shall be unlawful for any common carrier subject to the act to regulate commerce, as amended, to issue any capital stock or certificate of stock or any bond or other evidence of interest in or indebtedness of the carrier (hereinafter collectively termed "securities"), or to assume any obligation or liability as lessor of another carrier, or as lessee, guarantor, surety, or otherwise in respect of the securities of any other person, natural or artificial, if connected with or relating to that part of the business of such carrier governed by the act to regulate commerce as amended, even though permitted by the authority creating the carrier corporation—

"(a) unless it be for some purpose within its corporate powers and in the public interest, necessary or appropriate to the proper performance of its service for the public, and not tending to impair the financial ability of the carrier to discharge its duty to the public; and

"(b) unless and until, and then only to the extent that, upon application by the carrier, and after investigation by the commission of the purposes and uses of the issue and the proceeds thereof, such issue is approved by order of the commission as reasonably necessary or appropriate for the purposes stated.

"Each such application shall be made in such form as the commission may from time to time determine and prescribe, and shall set forth such matters as the commission may require, including:

"First. (a) The total amount of proposed issue, and how authorized by or on behalf of the carrier;

"(b) The number and amount of all of its securities outstanding at any time prior to the date of such application, the amount thereof retired prior to said date, the amount thereof then undisposed of, and whether such amount is held in the treasury of the corporation as a free asset or pledged, and, if pledged, the terms and conditions of such pledge;

"(c) The number and amount of securities then to be issued, and whether to be sold, pledged, or held in the treasury of the corporation as a free asset, or otherwise disposed of or applied, as the case may be, specifying number and amount in each case; if any such securities are to be sold, the terms and conditions of sale; if any part of the consideration to be received therefor is other than money, an accurate and detailed description of such consideration; if any such securities are to be pledged, the terms and conditions of [such] pledge; or if other disposition or application is to be made, a full and detailed explanation thereof;

"(d) The number and amount of its securities so authorized, but not then to be issued;

"(e) If the issue is of shares of stock, the number thereof, the face or par value thereof, if any, specifying whether common or preferred, and the number and kinds of then outstanding shares previously issued.

"Second. The preferences or privileges granted to the holders of any such securities; the dates of maturity, rates of interest, or fixed dividend, whether cumulative or not, and any conversion rights granted to the holders thereof, and the price, if any, at which any such securities may be retired or redeemed.

"Third. The purposes to which the proceeds of the issue are to be devoted, in such detail as the commission may require.

"Fourth. In case of proposed assumption of any obligation or liability in respect of the securities of any other person, natural or artificial, like showing shall be made as to the financial condition of said other person, as also of the objects sought and benefits to be realized by the carrier from such assumption, to be accompanied by copies of any agreements or contracts therefor.

"Every application for authority, as also every certificate of notification hereinafter provided for, shall be made out under oath, signed, and filed on behalf of the carrier by its president, a vice president, auditor, comptroller, or other executive officer having knowledge of the matters therein set forth and duly designated for that purpose by the carrier.

"Whenever any securities set forth and described in any application for authority or certificate of notification as pledged or held as a free asset in the treasury of the carrier shall, subsequent to the filing of such application or certificate, be sold, pledged, repledged, or otherwise disposed of by the carrier, such carrier shall, within 10 days after such sale, pledge, repledge, or other disposition, file a certificate of notification to that effect, setting forth therein all such facts as are required by subdivision (c) of the foregoing first paragraph, or as may be required by the commission.

"Upon application to the commission for approval of proposed issues of securities the commission shall cause notice to be given to the railroad commission or public service or utilities commission, or other appropriate authority, of each State in which the applicant carrier operates. The railroad commission, public service or utilities commission, or other appropriate State authority thus notified shall have the right to present before the commission such representations as they may deem just and proper for preserving and conserving the right and interests of their people and the State, respectively, as involved in such proceeding. The commission may hold hearings, if it sees fit, to enable it to determine its decision upon the application for authority.

"Nothing herein shall be construed to imply any guaranty or obligation as to such issues on the part of the United States.

"The foregoing provisions of this section 20a shall not apply to notes to be issued by any said carrier maturing not more than two years after the date thereof and aggregating not more than 5 per cent at any time of the securities of said carrier then outstanding. Within 10 days after the date of such notes the carrier issuing the same shall file with the commission a certificate of notification, in such form as may from time to time be determined and prescribed by the commission, setting forth as nearly as may be the same matters as those required in respect of applications for authority to issue other securities.

"The commission shall require periodical or special reports from all carriers hereafter issuing any securities, including such notes, which shall show, in such detail as the commission may require, the disposition made of said securities and the application of the proceeds thereof.

"All issues of securities contrary to the provisions of this section may be enjoined by any court of competent jurisdiction at the suit of the United States, or of any director, officer, or stockholder of the carrier proposing to make the issue; and any director, officer, attorney, or agent of such corporation who assents to or concurs in any issue of securities forbidden by this section 20a shall upon conviction be punished by a fine of not less than $1,000 nor more than $10,000, or by imprisonment for not less than one year nor more than three years, or by both such fine and imprisonment, in the discretion of the court.

"From and after two years from the passage hereof it shall be unlawful for any person to hold the position of officer or director of more than one carrier subject to the act to regulate commerce, as amended, unless such holding shall have been authorized by order of the commission, upon due showing, in form and manner prescribed by the commission, that neither public nor private interest will be adversely affected thereby. From and after the passage hereof it shall be unlawful for any officer or director of any such carrier to receive for his own benefit, directly or indirectly, any money or thing of value in respect of the negotiation, hypothecation, or sale of any securities issued or to be issued by said carrier, or to share in any of the proceeds thereof, or to participate in the making or paying of any dividends of an operating carrier from any funds properly included in capital account, or otherwise than from the revenues of said carrier. Any violation of these provisions shall be a misdemeanor, and on conviction in any United States court having jurisdiction shall be punished by a fine not exceeding $10,000, or imprisonment for a term not exceeding three years, or by both such fine and imprisonment, in the direction of the court."

Mr. ADAMSON. Mr. Chairman, the proposition of the committee is to strike out all the original bill after the enacting clause and substitute the new matter beginning with section 1, in line 3, as read by the Clerk. The committee has no disposition at all to press the original bill, but prefers the substitute. Therefore we hope that gentlemen offering amendments will offer them to the substitute, and it will not be necessary to go through the routine under the rule of trying to perfect the original, because we do not desire to stand for that, but desire to perfect the substitute.

Mr. GARNER. Mr. Chairman, a parliamentary inquiry.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. GARNER. If we could get unanimous consent to consider the substitute as an original bill for the purpose of offering amendments, it would give greater latitude in perfecting the substitute in this, that an amendment could be offered as if it were an original bill, and then an amendment to that amendment, and also a substitute for the amendment, whereas if you consider this substitute as one amendment you can offer only one amendment to it, and there is no opportunity to perfect the proposed amendment to the substitute. I hope the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. STEVENS] and the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] will agree by unanimous consent that we may consider this substitute as an original proposition for the purpose of offering amendments.

Mr. MANN. Well, there will be plenty of opportunity to amend unless the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. ADAMSON], supported by a majority of the House, moves to close debate upon the amendment to the section, which he could do at any time, but which I think he will not do as long as any actual matter is pending before the committee. But if it is opened, as the gentleman suggests, there will be practically no way to limit debate at all except by limiting debate on each amendment as it is offered. It seems to me that it is to the interest of the House at present to proceed according to the rules. If it develops differently, that is all right. I think no one wants to prevent reasonable debate or consideration.

Mr. ADAMSON. Mr. Chairman, if the gentleman has finished, I will go on with the statement I started to make. The substitute is substantially little more than a division of the original bill into two sections, the entirely new part of the bill beginning on page 11—in the original bill at the bottom and in the substitute at the top of page 11—the new part of the bill, providing for the regulation of stocks and bonds, which a great many members of the committee insist ought to be in a separate section, being made section 2. The committee yielded to that insistence, and therefore drafted a substitute, placing in a second section the new part, and leaving the old part of section 20, with its verbal amendments, in section 1. There are a few linguistic changes, though none that radically affect the bill; but, such as there are, they can be dealt with in amendments to the substitute, and I am perfectly willing to enter into any sort of agreement for amendments to be offered to the subsitute and for fixing a time for debate on the substitute, and not waste time to perfect the original bill, because we do not want to consider the original bill, but wish to consider the substitute and perfect it in Committee of the Whole if the committee is willing to adopt it in Committee of the Whole.

Mr. STEVENS of Minnesota. Mr. Chairman, for the purpose of expediting the matter, I think we should consider the substitute, and not allow the suggestion of the gentleman from Texas [Mr. GARNER] to prevail. It would save time in the committee to offer each amendment by itself; and I therefore request that the substitute may now be considered as open to amendment as a substitute. I offer an amendment, Mr. Chairman.

Mr. ADAMSON. Then I suggest to the gentleman from Minnesota that we agree that amendments may be offered and that we agree upon a limit of debate, and, when that limit has expired, to vote on all the amendments and on the substitute.

Mr. STEVENS of Minnesota. I do not think we can agree on that at this time.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Minnesota offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

Mr. BRYAN. Mr. Chairman, a parliamentary inquiry.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. BRYAN. Under the present status, then, an amendment to the amendment will be entirely out of order. In other words, all of these amendments will be construed as an amendment to an amendment, and therefore we can not perfect any amendment that is offered here on the floor by an amendment in a subsequent degree.

The CHAIRMAN. An amendment to the amendment proposed to a substitute would be an amendment in the third degree.

Mr. BRYAN. The Clerk will report the amendment offered by the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. STEVENS].

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 11, line 17, after the word "purpose," insert "for corporate organization or reorganization or."

Mr. STEVENS of Minnesota. Mr. Chairman, there is a request among Members around me here that the amendment may be again reported.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, the Clerk will again report the amendment.

There was no objection.

The amendment was again read.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, a parliamentary inquiry.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. MANN. Perhaps the Chairman can not answer this parliamentary inquiry; but I would like to know if it were possible to obtain the "5.30 edition" of this bill. I have the "noon edition," but that is a little behind the times. [Laughter.]

Mr. ADAMSON. Mr. Chairman, this bill in serial form——

Mr. MANN. I received the noon edition a little after 11 o'clock. I understand there is a 5.30 edition.

Mr. ADAMSON. The serial form of this bill has not yet reached the class and grade of the political papers on which the gentleman relies for his information.

Mr. MANN. We have what the gentleman sent to me this morning as the proposed substitute, and that is not the one that is now before us. I ask if it is possible to obtain copies of the one that has been offered.

Mr. ADAMSON. This bill was corrected and reprinted last night, and there is a stack of that print on the desk of the Doorkeeper, at the left of the Speaker's chair, and I have time and again requested the pages to furnish all gentlemen with them.

Mr. MANN. And the gentleman has had circulated over here on this side this morning a print of the bill dated June 3.

Mr. ADAMSON. No; that is not my fault.

Mr. MANN. It is not our fault.

Mr. ADAMSON. I am sorry that the gentleman from Illinois has been furnished with literature that is obsolete. I hope the gentleman will be furnished with the print of June 4, and that all gentlemen wil receive that print.

Mr. MANN. Is the print of June 4 the latest edition?

Mr. ADAMSON. Yes. There is an abundant supply of them, and I hope it will remain the latest edition.

Mr. BUTLER. Will the gentleman answer a question?

Mr. ADAMSON. If I can.

Mr. BUTLER. I am sure the gentleman can. Is there any report accompanying this last edition?

Mr. ADAMSON. The gentleman may adapt to it the last report made, coupled with——

Mr. BUTLER. That is dated May 16.

Mr. ADAMSON. That report covers the last print.

Mr. BUTLER. Under date of May 16?

Mr. ADAMSON. Yes; coupled with the statement I just made, if the gentleman will use his ears. I understood him to say that he could not hear on account of the disorder, and I hope we will have better order.

Mr. BRYAN. I should like to ask the gentleman if this print, which is headed "Confidential committee print," is the one that we are considering?

Mr. ADAMSON. If it is dated June 4, it is.

Mr. BRYAN. It is a confidential proposition, is it?

Mr. ADAMSON. It is dated June 4, and it is now released from its confidential character. The gentleman can publish it now.

Mr. STEVENS of Minnesota. Mr. Chairman, the amendment which I offer enlarges the scope of the authority for which the securities may be issued. It seems to me there is some doubt whether the paragraph on page 11, lines 7 to 21, allows securities to be issued for the purpose of corporate organization and reorganization. This morning I examined the statutes of the various States as far as I could within the limited time, and I find that about half of them contain these words and about half of them do not in granting authority to their commissions to regulate the issuance of securities.

This amendment that I propose was taken from the law of Wisconsin, which is as well drafted as any one of the State laws, and it clearly authorizes the issuance of securities for organization and reorganization.

The reason I suggest it is this: There will be many legal contests over our constitutional powers and statutory powers. I think these legal contests ought to be limited as far as possible, and the question might be raised as to whether or not the language in this paragraph did grant this authority. To make it clear and to eliminate the possibility of this kind of a lawsuit, I offer this amendment.

Mr. ADAMSON. Mr. Chairman, we do not regard that amendment as at all necessary. We think the bill confers ample power, and I am ready for a vote.

SEVERAL MEMBERS. Let the amendment be reported again.

The CHAIRMAN. If there be no objection, the Clerk will again report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 11 of the substitute of June 4, line 17, after the word "purpose," insert the words "for corporate organization or reorganization or."

Mr. GARRETT of Texas. Let the Clerk read it as it would be if amended.

The CLERK. So that the paragraph as amended will read:

(a) Unless it be for some purpose for corporate organization or reorganization or within its corporate powers and in the public interest, necessary or appropriate to the proper performance of its service for the public, and not tending to impair the financial ability of the carrier to discharge its duty to the public.

Mr. PAYNE. Do I understand that the chairman of the committee accepts this amendment?

Mr. ADAMSON. No; I do not. We went over this language very carefully, studied it thoroughly, conferred with the commissioners and their attorney about it, and we have no doubt that sufficient authority is conferred to cover all proper cases. I ask for a vote.

Mr. PAYNE. I did not know but the gentleman might be persuaded to accept an amendment striking out the enacting clause of the bill.

Mr. ADAMSON. I would not be at all surprised if the gentleman should propose that.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment of the gentleman from Minnesota.

The question being taken, on a division (demanded by Mr. STEVENS of Minnesota) there were—ayes 46, noes 67.

Accordingly the amendment was rejected.

Mr. STEVENS of Minnesota. Another amendment, Mr. Chairman.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Minnesota offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 15, line 19 of the substitute, after the word "thereof," insert the following:

"The provisions of this section shall not apply to carriers whose property or business may be wholly within one State or whose total mileage as reported to the Interstate Commerce Commission may be less than 200 miles."

Mr. STEVENS of Minnesota. Mr. Chairman, the purpose of this amendment is to take out from the provisions of this regulatory section the small carriers.

Those of you who have kept track of what are described as the Tap Line cases, recently decided by the Supreme Court, will recall that the Supreme Court held a few weeks ago that these small lumber railroads, especially in the Southwest, were common carriers within the provisions of this act. There are quite a number of them which have been before the commission, I think, for several years. Some were built by lumber companies, some by mining companies. They are intended to be used as common carriers for the benefit of the people adjacent to these places, and they are so used.

Mr. GOEKE. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. STEVENS of Minnesota. I will.

Mr. GOEKE. Would the effect of this amendment be to take out of the operation of this law electric urban street railroads that operate on lines less than 200 miles in length?

Mr. STEVENS of Minnesota. Yes; every carrier within the scope of the interstate-commerce act would be taken out of it if less than 200 miles in length.

Mr. GOEKE. Would it not be better to take them out of the operation of the law and leave it to the States?

Mr. STEVENS of Minnesota. Yes; I intended to say that the scope of the interstate-commerce act covers electric lines, telephones, express, and cable companies.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. If the gentleman will yield, I think he inadvertently made a misstatement. The gentleman said that the scope of the interstate-commerce act applied to street railways.

Mr. STEVENS of Minnesota. I thought it did not, but I took the suggestion of the gentleman from Wisconsin. It occurred to me that there was an exclusion in the act.

Mr. MANN. Not in the act, but by the decision of the courts.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. By a decision of the Supreme Court.

Mr. STEVENS of Minnesota. Yes; I recall, the gentleman is correct. However, the purpose I had in mind was to except these small companies that are within the scope of the interstate-commerce act. They are financed by small concerns, and it would be an expensive and unnecessary burden for them to come here to Washington and present their securities for approval to the commission. It would prevent their formation; it would prevent their operations; it would prevent their development; it would prevent the development of considerable sections of the newer portion of the country. Unless such a provision be adopted, you will much retard and injure the newer sections of the South and West. The testimony before the committee was that some such elimination should be made in the interest of development of the newer sections of the country.

Section 20, which we have had read, provides for all of them reporting to the commission to the fullest extent within its provisions. They are obliged to report to the other officials and examiners investigating all their affairs, so that there is the utmost publicity as to what they may have to do. The reasons which rendered necessary the passage of an act like this in the interest of investors for furnishing general facilities of transportation to the people do not apply to these small concerns. The Interstate Commerce Commission can investigate them at any or all times and see that the proper things are done, but I do not believe it is best for the commission to be loaded with this sort of small business, or for the small business to be loaded with the burdens provided by this section.

Mr. ADAMSON. Mr. Chairman, I could not hear distinctly the reading of the gentleman's amendment—if the 200 miles limit it to one State, or may it run into different States?

Mr. STEVENS of Minnesota. First, within the State which may be subject to the jurisdiction of the Interstate Commerce Commission under the Minnesota rate case, and, secondly, 200 miles, wherever it may extend.

Mr. ADAMSON. If it is under 200 miles long, it would be exempt even if it ran into different States?

Mr. STEVENS of Minnesota. Yes.

Mr. SIMS. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. STEVENS of Minnesota. Certainly.

Mr. SIMS. The gentleman's amendment applies to ordinary steam railroads, does it not?

Mr. STEVENS of Minnesota. It would apply to all sorts of common carriers.

Mr. SIMS. Take the State of Tennessee, which is about 110 miles wide. A railroad running from Decatur, Ala., through the whole State of Tennessee to some place in Kentucky, and doing a very large interstate business, would be exempt from the operation of this law if determined by the length of the road rather than by the service rendered?

Mr. STEVENS of Minnesota. Does the gentleman desire to ask a question?

Mr. SIMS. Take the State of Connecticut, a railroad could run through that State and into New York and New Jersey and yet be exempt.

Mr. STEVENS of Minnesota. The gentleman can make those statements in his own time. The financing of a road 200 miles long is not a very important transaction. The securities practically do not get to the public. They are not dealt with on the exchange and there is no speculation in it. There are not evils existing in that kind of securities which there are in the great corporations. As a rule, most of such lines would be entirely within the State and subject to State regulation. There is no particular reason why 200 miles should be the limit, but it is for the purpose of exempting the small lines that I offer this amendment.

Mr. GARNER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. STEVENS of Minnesota. Certainly.

Mr. GARNER. What the Texas Members are agitated about is that the proposition limits it to 200 miles. Now, where a railroad is wholly within a State, the mileage entirely within the State, does the gentleman see any reason why the State authorities should not control?

Mr. STEVENS of Minnesota. I think that ought to be done.

Mr. GARNER. The amendment does not go to that extent. The amendment says that a railroad 200 miles or less in length; so that a road over 200 miles in length, although it is entirely within a State——

Mr. STEVENS of Minnesota. No; the amendment is drafted with two conditions—wholly within the State or less than 200 miles in length.

Mr. GARNER. I would like to have the amendment reported, Mr. Chairman, because I have looked at it, and it is limited to 200 miles.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, the Clerk will again report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 15, line 19, after the word "thereof," insert the following: "The provisions of this section shall not apply to carriers whose property or business may be wholly within one State or whose total mileage as reported to the Interstate Commerce Commission may be less than 200 miles."

Mr. GARNER. Mr. Chairman, I apologize to the gentleman from Minnesota; he is correct.

Mr. STEVENS of Minnesota. Now, Mr. Chairman, I yield to my colleague from Texas [Mr. RAYBURN].

Mr. RAYBURN. I want to make a parliamentary inquiry. I want to know if this amendment is divisible. As far as I am individually concerned, I would like to vote for the first part of the amendment; but as to the latter part of it, I do not want to vote for it.

The CHAIRMAN. The present impression of the Chair is that the amendment is not divisible.

Mr. HARRISON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman from Minnesota yield?

Mr. STEVENS of Minnesota. I yield to the gentleman.

Mr. HARRISON. I understand from the amendment that the gentleman says these roads doing business wholly within the State are exempt from the operations of the act?

Mr. STEVENS of Minnesota. That is what I intended.

Mr. HARRISON. I would like the gentleman's opinion on whether or not he believes the provisions of this bill will apply to railroads operating wholly within a State and not engaged in interstate commerce?

Mr. STEVENS of Minnesota. Oh, no; the railroads must engage in interstate commerce, of course, to come within the scope of the commission; but there are very few railroads entirely within the State but that come within the scope of the interstate commerce act, under the decisions of the Supreme Court.

Mr. BARKLEY. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. STEVENS of Minnesota. Certainly.

Mr. BARKLEY. The provisions of this bill, as has been suggested by the gentleman from Mississippi, exclude all railroads except those that come within the purview of the act to regulate commerce. Is not that true?

Mr. STEVENS of Minnesota. Yes.

Mr. BARKLEY. And that means that only railroads that are interstate railroads or doing an interstate business are regulated by the act to regulate commerce, and, therefore, is not the gentleman's amendment unnecessary?

Mr. STEVENS of Minnesota. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman has just made a statement which shows the necessity for it. He spoke of railroads doing an interstate business. The Supreme Court held this doctrine in a Colorado case. There was a narrow-gage road entirely within the State of Colorado, not having any possible physical connection with roads outside, and yet the Supreme Court held that such road was doing an interstate business and came within the scope of the safety-appliance act and, I think, other acts of that kind. Under the construction of that case as applied to this statute, that road would be obliged to submit its securities to the Interstate Commerce Commission and be taken out of the power of the authorities of the State of Colorado.

Mr. BARKLEY. With reference to the latter part of the amendment, limiting it to railroads 200 miles in length, notwithstanding they may cross State lines, would not that bring about this situation: That a railroad company which ran from one State into another, although it had only 200 miles of road or less, might make such connections and traffic arrangements and leases and contracts with other railroads that had more mileage than that, so as to form a complete system of many hundreds of miles, and by this provision absolutely escape the provisions of this law?

Mr. STEVENS of Minnesota. Oh, no; that would come under other arrangements and rules prescribed in the act to regulate commerce. All of the traffic arrangements would come within the general scope of the act to regulate commerce.

Mr. GARRETT of Texas. Mr. Chairman, is it not well recognized that there are practically no roads in the country that do not do an interstate business?

Mr. STEVENS of Minnesota. I think the gentleman is right.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Minnesota has again expired. The gentleman from Texas [Mr. RAYBURN] made a parliamentary inquiry with reference to the divisibility of the pending amendment. On further examination the Chair is inclined to modify the former opinion and to answer that the amendment, in the judgment of the Chair, would be divisible.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, in the first place, no road or other carrier whose business is wholly confined to intrastate business is affected by this bill or by the Interstate Commerce Commission at all. The language of the amendment of the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. STEVENS] undertakes to exempt carriers whose property and business is wholly confined to a State. I confess I do not quite understand what that means, and I would like the gentleman from Minnesota to state whether carrier business wholly confined within the State may be interstate business.

Mr. STEVENS of Minnesota. Yes; it may be under the decision in the Minnesota rate case; if it is a burden on interstate commerce or affects it directly, it may be.

Mr. MANN. If a lumber tap line takes lumber from a point in Louisiana and carries it on the tap line which is wholly within the State of Louisiana for shipment to Chicago, is that business, as far as the tap line is concerned, wholly within the State of Louisiana and exempt under the provisions of the amendment, or is it business which is interstate? I do not know what the gentleman intended by his amendment, but it seems to me that that business is interstate, and that if you want to exempt at all you must exempt either upon the basis of the amount of business per mile or the total business which is done by the railroad company or according to the mileage of the company. I do not believe there is a railroad in the United States of any importance, and I doubt whether there is any of no importance, whose business is wholly confined to intrastate business. They all connect in some way with other lines, and they all carry freight and passengers from in and out of the State, and unless the gentleman should define the word "business" as the business of the carrier and separate it from interstate business and say that, although it carried an interstate shipment, its own business was wholly within the State. I doubt whether that part of the amendment would have very much effect.

Mr. SIMS rose.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will state that debate is exhausted on this amendment under the rule.

Mr. SIMS. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word.

The CHAIRMAN. That motion would not be in order under the rule.

Mr. ADAMSON. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman from Texas [Mr. RAYBURN] may discuss the amendment for five minutes.

Mr. BRYAN. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that I may have five minutes.

Mr. GARNER. Mr. Chairman, we ought to have some kind of understanding at this time in reference to the discussion of amendments offered to this substitute. It would be in the interest of bad legislation, if the Chair will indulge me for a moment, to hold to the rule that five minutes' debate on each amendment offered to this substitute, which is being considered really as an original bill, is all that can be had, not giving the House an opportunity to get all of the information possible in respect to any amendment that is offered. I make this request, that all amendments to this substitute be discussed pro and con until the chairman of the committee may ask that debate be limited and cut off.

Mr. ADAMSON. Mr. Chairman, I ask that debate on this amendment end in 20 minutes, one half to be controlled by myself——

Mr. MANN. It is not usual for the Chair to invoke the rule unless it is made by a Member on the floor of the House.

Mr. GARNER. I want to call the attention of the Chair at this time to the very great importance of the various amendments that are likely to be offered to this bill, and if debate is confined to five minutes on a side it will not give the House the information to which it is entitled.

Mr. MANN. It will not be; the gentleman need not worry.

Mr. ADAMSON. I only want a few minutes to help the gentleman from Illinois answer the gentleman from Minnesota, and I think the gentleman from Texas will do it as well as I can.

Mr. SIMS. I want to discuss this amendment.

Mr. GARNER. It is seldom that I take up the time of the committee in discussing propositions, and I would like to be heard on this amendment.

Mr. ADAMSON. Then, I ask unanimous consent, the gentleman from Illinois and the gentleman from Minnesota having spoken, that debate be concluded in 20 minutes, I to consume 5 minutes, the gentleman from Texas 5 minutes, the gentleman from Tennessee 5 minutes, and the gentleman from Texas [Mr. GARNER] 5 minutes.

Mr. CRAMTON. I would like to ask the gentleman from Minnesota a question, if he is willing to answer it.

Mr. STEVENS of Minnesota. I have not the floor.

Mr. MANN. The gentleman from Michigan wants five minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. Will the gentleman from Georgia please repeat the request?

Mr. ADAMSON. Mr. Chairman, I withhold the request for the present. There seems to be a disposition to talk.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Tennessee asks to proceed for five minutes.

Mr. ADAMSON. But, Mr. Chairman, I first requested that the gentleman from Texas have five minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair did not hear the gentleman.

Mr. ADAMSON. That is the first request I made.

The CHAIRMAN The Chair will state the request. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Georgia?

Mr. BRYAN. Mr. Chairman, reserving the right to object, the Chair suggested that further debate was out of order, and, of course, if that is not to be enforced, I have no objection to proceeding without any further request.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair is aware that under the five-minute rule where amendments to strike out in the nature of a pro forma amendment are in order there is no difficulty as to extending the time; but the Chair has not felt called upon to recognize gentlemen——

Mr. ADAMSON. The history is this: The Chair has stated that, and I asked unanimous consent for five minutes for the gentleman from Texas.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. RAYBURN. Mr. Chairman, as indicated by my question a while ago to the Chair about the divisibility of this amendment I stated at that time I would be willing to support the first part of it; but since I have reread the amendment I do not believe that the first part of it accomplishes anything whatever, and I am absolutely against the second part of it. As stated by the gentleman from Illinois and by others here, this bill can not apply to any transaction or to the business of a carrier that is wholly within a State and not connected with or does not affect its ability to do an interstate business.

Mr. GOEKE. Does the gentleman think there is a road in the country that will come within that exception? Every railroad in the United States does some kind of interstate business.

Mr. RAYBURN. There could be an amendment offered, I think, to the bill applying to lines wholly within the State, but this amendment certainly does not apply to that instance. Now, as to the second part of this amendment, I think it is going far afield. Mr. Chairman, I have in mind the transcontinental division of the Texas & Pacific Railroad that has a Federal charter. That railroad is something like 200 miles long, running from Texarkana, Tex., to Fort Worth, Tex. That corporation has for years been defying the people of Texas and the shippers who live along that line for the simple reason that the Texas Railroad Commission could not touch it, because each time they would make an order upon it it would jump behind its Federal charter and say that the Texas Railroad Commission has no right to control. This is one of the roads we hope to reach by this legislation, Mr. Chairman, and under the provisions of the amendment of the gentleman from Minnesota it would absolutely let that railroad out. As I said before, it has a Federal charter, and we can not reach it, and if this law does not reach it it can not be reached at all.

I will tell you what is the fact, for the simple reason the railroad can not be reached by the Texas Railroad Commission, the roadbed is in such a bad condition that within 12 miles I have known seven wrecks to occur in four days, not because the trains were running fast, because they were cut down to 18 miles an hour, but because, in my judgment, the tracks were so soggy and the roadbed was in such condition that it absolutely could make no more time than that, and even with making that time they had seven wrecks in four days, and it might be interesting to note further that, according to the statistics, it is the best paying piece of railroad in the State of Texas.

Mr. BARTLETT. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. RAYBURN. Yes.

Mr. BARTLETT. The gentleman says this road has a Federal charter.

Mr. RAYBURN. Yes.

Mr. BARTLETT. What is to prevent the Congress which chartered this road to make any regulations or pass any statute it pleases without regard to whether it is engaged in interstate commerce or not, because if it is a Federal chartered road, then the authority that charters it can deal with it, whether it is interstate commerce or not.

Mr. RAYBURN. Nobody has contested for a moment that the road is in interstate commerce, but if it is 200 miles or less, under the Stevens amendment, it would be exempt from the operations of this law.

Mr. BARTLETT. I understood the Stevens amendment to apply in words, if not in spirit, to those railroads that were chartered by the State.

Mr. RAYBURN. It says nothing about that whatever. It says a railroad that had its lines wholly within the State or a railroad that had a mileage of 200 miles or less.

Mr. BARTLETT. Then if the amendment of the gentleman from Minnesota applies to State chartered railroads, the gentleman would not have any objection to it?

Mr. RAYBURN. I certainly would, and I am opposing that very amendment because I do not think it reaches anything, because I believe that railroads that amount to anything and that could be controlled by Congress under the act to regulate commerce can not be excluded by this bill; and the second part of this amendment, as I have just stated in connection with the Texas & Pacific Railroad of Texas and many other railroads of that character, I believe would render this amendment very detrimental to the bill.

Mr. GARRETT of Texas. Will my colleague yield?

Mr. RAYBURN. Yes; I will yield.

Mr. GARRETT of Texas. I understand from my colleague that if this amendment should be adopted, it would exempt the Texas-Pacific from being a Federal chartered railroad——

Mr. RAYBURN. It does not make any difference whether it is a Federal chartered railroad or State chartered railroad, because it applies to 200 miles or less.

Mr. GARRETT of Texas. I understand, then, if this amendment should be adopted the Texas-Pacific, not being under the regulation of the Texas Railroad Commission and being exempted by this law, would pass out from under the control of both commissions, Federal and State?

Mr. RAYBURN. It would pass out from under it as far as this bill is concerned.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Texas [Mr. RAYBURN] has expired.

Mr. SIMS. Mr. Chairman, I am opposed to this amendment in toto. The Constitution settles this as to commerce wholly within a State, though performed by a railroad engaged in interstate commerce. Therefore we do not need it, so far as that is concerned. And the second provision, that it shall not apply to a railroad whose mileage does not exceed 200 miles, will practically destroy this bill.

Now, there are a number of terminal companies that own all the trackage which reaches a great terminal station and charge for its use that do not have 200 miles of track or anything like it, and why will not this amendment exempt every terminal company in the country from complying with this act? We ought not to exempt a railroad 10 miles long from the provisions of this bill. A railroad from the center of Manhattan Island to Jersey City can carry hundreds of millions of tons of freight each year, and under this amendment would not be subject to the provisions of this bill. This amendment, if adopted, will practically destroy this bill. Take a railroad running from Mobile, Ala., through a portion of Mississippi into New Orleans, La., connecting two great seaports less than 200 miles apart—it will not have to comply with the provisions of this section.

Mr. ADAMSON. Will the gentleman permit an interjection there?

Mr. SIMS. I will.

Mr. ADAMSON. Two of the most important railroads I know of in this country have a common management. One of them about 87 miles long, from Atlanta to West Point, all in Georgia, and the other 87 miles long, all in Alabama, together about 175 miles. The two combined make an important link between the Southern Railroad at Atlanta, Ga., and the Louisville & Nashville at Montgomery, Ala., and make one of the most important links in connection with interstate traffic in the United States. It would be entirely exempt under the amendment of the gentleman from Minnesota.

Mr. SIMS. And they do an immense interstate business.

Mr. ADAMSON. That is only one. There are many more cases which are similar.

Mr. SIMS. Which would be determined from the reports to be filed, and, consequently, the reports of the roads with which they are connected would not be complete, and the information furnished the Interstate Commerce Commission would not be the information that would enlighten the commission, but information that would obscure and confuse the commission. There is no need of the first part of this amendment, as we can neither add to or take away the powers of the States that are preserved under the Constitution, whether the limit is 200 miles, 100 miles, or 50 miles. So far as railroads doing an interstate business are concerned, they should not be exempt from the provisions of this bill.

Mr. STEVENS of Minnesota. Does not the gentleman understand that only this section as to reports would apply as to these railroads? They would make their reports just the same.

Mr. SIMS. The section as amended has reference to reports as I caught it.

Mr. STEVENS of Minnesota. Oh, no.

Mr. ADAMSON. It does require reports, the gentleman will admit, as to expenditure of money.

Mr. SIMS. I may have gotten mixed upon the different editions of the substitute bill.

Mr. BARKLEY. I would suggest to the gentleman, if these 200-mile railroads are to be exempt from the provisions of this bill there would be no use for them to report, because the reports would not be complete.

Mr. SIMS. And if this amendment is adopted, any number of such amendments can follow and so amend the bill as not to have any of its provisions apply to any railroad not over 200 miles in length, regardless of what the provisions may be.

Now, I think it is very important to vote down this amendment regardless of the application that it may have to this part of the bill. If an interstate road or one doing an intrastate business is not covered by the provisions of this bill, then I do not think the bill is worth passing.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Tennessee has expired.

Mr. BRYAN. Mr. Chairman, it seems to me that the committee has taken a different position than what it seemed they were going to take when this amendment was offered, and I am glad of that. The only effect this amendment can have, no matter what are our views as to State rights and other rights concerned, would be to weaken this section. It only provides a loophole to help some get away from the restrictions we are putting on interstate commerce. I say "interstate commerce" advisedly. It does not make any difference whether it is a hundred-mile railroad or a ten-mile railroad; it is interstate commerce if it handles interstate traffic. That is all we are considering and all we have a right to consider in Congress; and whenever we weaken the power of the Interstate Commerce Commission to handle interstate commerce we weaken this bill; we weaken a movement that has been going on all over the country to strengthen the Interstate Commerce Commission and to tighten the people's hold on the railroads. The first amendment proposed by the able gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. STEVENS] had to do with reorganization. That suggestion is enough. If we leave loopholes in this bill and enable railroads to reorganize within State lines and then get out of the jurisdiction of the Interstate Commerce Commission we had better not pass this bill. If we incorporate an amendment of this kind in this bill, we would weaken the act as it now stands, and instead of progressing we would be going backward. Certainly we would not agree to do that. The State of Texas is a big State and has tremendous areas. We can not take their 200 miles or 300 miles or 400 miles as a measuring rod and say that a railroad which is that long or that short shall not be subject to the Interstate Commerce Commission.

Mr. GARNER. Would the gentleman object to an amendment saying it should not apply to railroads wholly within the State?

Mr. BRYAN. I certainly would. We do not want to take them out from under the jurisdiction of the Interstate Commerce Commission simply because they are in the State. Look at my State of Washington. We have five or six transcontinental railroads with terminals at Seattle, and all they would have to do would be to incorporate their properties in the State of Washington into a separate corporation, and all the interstate commerce that starts from one side of this continent and terminates on the other side of the continent, in the great Northwest, would be relieved from the regulation of the Interstate Commerce Commission the very moment it got into the boundaries of the State of Washington. Of course we do not want anything of that kind. Every time there has come up in this Congress a measure for strengthening the hands of the Federal Government against institutions of this kind some one on this side or on that side has proposed to the other side that the question of State rights is involved and that State rights are about to be invaded, in order to weaken the power of Congress by talking about the power of some State. We are dealing with the power of the people and with the rights of the people of this Nation, and we ought not for one moment to listen to a proposition to weaken a bill like this, or to enable the transportation companies of any State to avoid responsibility to the Interstate Commerce Commission. I would like to extend that responsibility so that every railroad, even where both its termini are in one State and where it can not handle interstate commerce, would be subject to the provisions of the Federal law; but under our Constitution we can not do that. But we can make every railroad that deals with interstate commerce subject to the provisions of the law. I say let us not accept any amendment that would limit that proposition.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Washington has expired.

Mr. GARNER. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to offer to the committee a substitute for the amendment offered by the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. STEVENS].

Mr. ADAMSON. I would like to hear the substitute read.

Mr. GARNER. I ask unanimous consent to offer a substitute for the substitute offered by the gentleman from Minnesota.

Mr. ADAMSON. I am willing to hear it read; then I will decide whether I shall object or not. I reserve the right to object to its being offered or considered.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the substitute proposed by the gentleman from Texas.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 15, line 19, after the word "of," insert the following: "The provisions of this section shall not apply to carriers whose total mileage is wholly within one State."

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Texas asks unanimous consent——

Mr. ADAMSON. I object, Mr. Chairman.

[Mr. GARNER addressed the committee. See Appendix.]

Mr. ADAMSON. Mr. Chairman, I am glad to hear the gentleman from Texas give such a good report from that State. I hope when the bill goes into effect it will not be necessary for the Federal Government to interfere with any railroads that run through Texas, as to the issuance of stocks and bonds. The reason that impelled us was that the issuance of stocks and bonds had been abused; there was speculation, there was robbery, there was inefficiency and carelessness, and the railroads were practically so far destroyed that they could not perform their duty as carriers. I have as much regard for my State as the gentleman has for his State, but I do not think it will be necessary to interfere much with my State because we have also a good railroad commission. But I want to warn my brethren not to be misled by the specious propositions of gentlemen appealing to the idea of State rights. I am not the only original State rights man, and I hope I will not be the last State rights man, and I want my State to enjoy the privileges and perform the duties of discharging its part of the functions of the Government as much as any man here. The question is, Do you want to pass this law authorizing the Federal Government to prevent the overissue of stocks and bonds? If you do, you had better steer clear of these amendments. This amendment would exempt every railroad in the United States. The Constitution protects wholly domestic railroads, and the language of this bill exempts wholly domestic business of railroads. The test of interstate commerce is not where the railroad is chartered. Any railroad, no matter where, is subject to the regulation by the Interstate Commerce Commission if it engages in interstate-commerce business.

Mr. GARRETT of Texas. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ADAMSON. Certainly.

Mr. GARRETT of Texas. Will the gentleman state just what rights and powers would be left to the railroad commission of Texas to control the issue of bonds after this bill is passed as now reported?

Mr. ADAMSON. The railroad commission of Texas may pass upon proposals to issue stocks and bonds, and if the Interstate Commerce Commission thinks that it is unwise, if it thinks that it is an overissue, if it thinks that it is reckless and not within the law, the Interstate Commerce Commission will veto that issue.

Mr. GARRETT of Texas. In that case the Interstate Commerce Commission is supreme over the Texas commission?

Mr. ADAMSON. The word "supreme" is misused by everybody talking about this matter. The question is one of function. Is it a Federal function or a State function? If it is a Federal function, the Supreme Court has declared that under the commerce clause of the Constitution there is plenary power to regulate it by the Interstate Commerce Commission. If it is a Federal function conferred by the Constitution, there is no question of supremacy about it.

Mr. GARNER. Will the able and distinguished chairman of the committee yield?

Mr. ADAMSON. If the gentleman is referring to me, I will. I could not help it. [Laughter.]

Mr. GARNER. If a road in Texas doing an interstate-commerce business should apply for the issuance of stocks and bonds, they would have to come to the Interstate Commerce Commission in Washington.

Mr. ADAMSON. I think the plan of this bill is that they shall apply to their own authority, and if that authority grants it they can ask the Federal commission to sanction it, and it would be all right; but if they veto it, it is all wrong.

Mr. GARRETT of Texas. Suppose the railroad of Texas should go to the Texas commission, and the commission should go out and inspect the physical property, inspect the road, and say to the railroad, "You are not entitled to the issuance of any more stocks and bonds," and the road appeals to the Interstate Commerce Commission and they say they may issue the stocks and bonds, which will control?

Mr. ADAMSON. It was not our intention to encourage anything of that sort in this bill.

Mr. GARRETT of Texas. It is not what you intend, but what the law will provide.

Mr. ADAMSON. It was our purpose to write the bill so that the law would cover only the veto power, but the gentleman from Minnesota contends that they could take original jurisdiction. I do not think it is so.

Mr. GREGG. Does not the commission have appellate jurisdiction, at least?

Mr. ADAMSON. That is the veto power.

Mr. GREGG. If the State commission refuses, can not the Interstate Commerce Commission grant it?

Mr. ADAMSON. I do not think so.

Mr. GREGG. If the State refuses to permit the bond issue, does the gentleman say that the Interstate Commerce Commission can not grant it?

Mr. ADAMSON. I do not see why it is necessary to interfere there.

Mr. GREGG. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman agree to an amendment saying that in the bill?

Mr. ADAMSON. I do not think so. I hope it does not.

Mr. HARDY. Will the gentleman agree to an amendment saying that?

Mr. ADAMSON. No.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Georgia has expired.

Mr. ADAMSON. Mr. Chairman, may I proceed until I finish the statement that I desire to make?

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Georgia asks unanimous consent to proceed with his statement for five minutes. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. ADAMSON. Mr. Chairman, if it is our purpose to regulate the overissue of stocks and bonds, I hope my brethren will not be misled by ideas of State sovereignty to take out of the operation of the bill every solitary railroad in the United States. I admit one good thing would be accomplished, but others would not say that that is a good thing. The first result of adopting any of these amendments would be the breaking up of every consolidation in the country. The railroads would get out of the jurisdiction of the Interstate Commerce Commission by resolving themselves into their original elements. I would welcome that, but others would not.

Mr. GARNER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ADAMSON. Because they are made up of independent sections, originally chartered in the different States, coupled together in these consolidations. It is impossible to exempt one without destroying the entire scheme, unless it is one already exempted under the Constitution and terms of the bill by being entirely within a State and not doing any interstate business at all.

Mr. SUMNERS. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ADAMSON. I will yield first to the gentleman from Texas [Mr. GARNER].

Mr. GARNER. I yield to my colleague.

Mr. SUMNERS. Mr. Chairman, I desire to ask the chairman of this committee what inducement there would be under this bill for these big railroad systems to break up because of the fact that their status is fixed by the character of the business they do and not by their charter?

Mr. ADAMSON. One can not always tell definitely what they will do in a given case, but this is the general rule, that whatever authority is trying to regulate them at that time they try to avoid that, hoping no other would operate. When we first tried to regulate they plead State rights, and when the States regulated they went into the States and plead the other side of the proposition. Their law and their insistence depend entirely on what their temporary interests may seem to be.

Mr. CULLOP. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ADAMSON. Yes.

Mr. CULLOP. This provision that they are seeking to amend does not apply to the regulation of freight, but to the issue of stocks and bonds.

Mr. ADAMSON. I am perfectly familiar with that fact.

Mr. CULLOP. I suggest that in reply to the gentleman from Texas [Mr. SUMNERS].

Mr. ADAMSON. And I will say to the gentleman that, rather than have an amendment of this sort adopted, they better follow the gentleman from New York [Mr. PAYNE], who is consistent, and who wanted to strike out the enacting clause of the bill. It will have the same effect and cause less trouble.

Mr. SUMNERS. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman again yield?

Mr. ADAMSON. Yes.

Mr. SUMNERS. In practical operation every railroad in the United States doing a common-carrier business does an interstate business, does it not?

Mr. ADAMSON. If it accepts or delivers freight or passengers or express or any business to or from railroads in other States, it does.

Mr. SUMNERS. In practical operation they all do interstate business?

Mr. ADAMSON. Yes.

Mr. MURRAY of Oklahoma rose.

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. HOUSTON). The gentleman from Oklahoma [Mr. MURRAY].

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I call for the regular order.

Mr. ADAMSON. That would be a vote on the amendment of the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. STEVENS].

Mr. GARNER. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent at this time to offer my substitute.

Mr. ADAMSON. I object.

Mr. MURRAY of Oklahoma. Mr. Chairman, I believe I was recognized.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I demand the regular order.

Mr. MURRAY of Oklahoma. But I was recognized before the gentleman made that demand.

Mr. MANN. That would not make any difference.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Oklahoma would not be in order in face of the demand for the regular order.

Mr. MURRAY of Oklahoma. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to address the committee for five minutes.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I do not like to object, but I shall have to demand the regular order at this time.

The CHAIRMAN. The regular order is to vote on the amendment of the gentleman from Minnesota. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Minnesota.

The question was taken, and the amendment was rejected.

Mr. GARNER. Mr. Chairman, I now offer the amendment which I send to the desk and ask to have read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 15, line 19, after the word "thereof," insert the following: "The provisions of this section shall not apply to carriers whose total mileage is wholly within one State."

Mr. MURRAY of Oklahoma. Mr. Chairman, referring to what the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. ADAMSON], the chairman of the committee, said a while ago, it does not occur to me that this is a question of State rights. It may be a question of State power—regretful enough with our present Constitution that in the matter of the control of transportation and transmission companies the power is too much divided, and too much of the twilight zone. I rather believe it would be wisest to turn over to the Federal Government the entire control of such carrier by amendment to the Constitution.

This does not involve the question of State rights, but it does involve under present conditions the rights and interests of a great people in different sections of the country. I do not know of another State similarly situated to the State of Texas. They began in their old republic with a provision that "no bonds or stocks should be issued for the roads except for money paid, labor done, and property actually received." They have another clause that compels every railroad company to become a State corporation. Unfortunately many other of the Western States, and I include my own, had their railroads built before they were enabled to make a constitution. We tried the same experiment in Oklahoma, but we failed because the railroads were constructed before the constitution was made, but I know that the conditions existing in Texas are such that under that strict power which is stronger than the Federal policy this Federal authority, if permitted, would do injury to those companies who are holding and who have always held their stock down to these three defined in their constitution.

Now, in reply to what the gentleman from Kentucky said, let us take the State of Texas. The M., K. & T. of Texas and the M., K. & T. of Kansas are not only distinct corporations in name, but they are distinct in the matter of expenses, in the matter of their operation, in the matter of their bonds; so I sympathize with the amendment offered by the gentleman from Texas, because I realize the possibility of a great damage being done to the people of Texas. It does not affect my State, because we were unable to do it——

Mr. CULLOP. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. MURRAY of Oklahoma. I do not wish to break my line of thought. The gentleman does not want to get information from me, but he wants to interrupt me, and I will not permit the interruption. The great trouble about the proposition is perhaps this may not be the proper amendment, and yet I believe it could be framed so as to take care of all the questions concerned if the provision were made that no bonds and stocks should be granted to any railroad company operating or chartered under the State—in other words, an intrastate railroad—by the Interstate Commerce Commission of the United States without the permission of the State railroad or corporation commission. This would relieve the situation and do no damage, which is feared by the gentleman from Georgia, and yet at the same time leave those few States which have been enabled to meet the situation of the common carriers as they have. Now, I think that this bill without some provision will do an injury to the people of the State of Texas without doing thereby any benefit to the people of other sections of the country. Therefore I feel like voting for this amendment, but I raise the question that perhaps it would be wiser to provide that there shall be no increase in those States without the permission of the State corporation commission.

Mr. CULLOP. Mr. Chairman, a moment ago I rose to interrupt the gentleman from Oklahoma, who said that this amendment would not affect the people of his State. This amendment would affect the people of his State. There is no State in the Union that has been complaining as much of the oppression of the pipe lines of the Standard Oil Co. as the citizens of the State of Oklahoma. Pipe lines are common carriers and come under the provisions of this bill. Now let us see what the effect of this amendment would be. Take the great terminal lines at Chicago and St. Louis and other large cities.

Mr. GARNER. They do not go outside of Oklahoma.

Mr. CULLOP. They go to the Oklahoma State line and then are under the name of another corporation. Now, if this amendment is adopted it would exempt terminals in every big city in this country. There is not a more oppressive railroad institution in the land than the terminals at Chicago and St. Louis. That is what this amendment, if adopted, would do, and that is the injury and oppression that would be kept upon the people of this country if the amendment of the gentleman from Texas should be adopted here. In other words, for the purpose of upholding his Texas law, which would not be impaired in fact by the passage of this measure, by the adoption of this amendment he is willing to oppress and asks that the millions of people throughout the other States of this Union shall be oppressed by the adoption of his amendment. It will not destroy the power of the railroad commission of the State of Texas.

There is nothing that can be done under the operations of this bill unless the railroad commissions of the different States or the public-utilities commissions, the commissions that have jurisdiction, are notified and have the right to appear and be heard on the subject to be investigated. But if this amendment is adopted, you will add a burden to every shipper in the United States whose product is shipped through from one State to another. It would relieve terminals like St. Louis, which is the commercial emporium through which most of the products of Texas either go or come, from the provisions of this law; and when you adopt this amendment, instead of relieving the people of Texas you will place a burden upon them by subjecting them to the exorbitant charges of terminal lines in our large cities, over which the major portion of the freight of the country must necessarily pass. I concede Texas has a good railroad law, much better than most of the States.

Mr. BARKLEY. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CULLOP. I will.

Mr. BARKLEY. Would it not be better to adopt an amendment exempting the whole State of Texas from the operations of this law than to adopt this amendment which is now under consideration?

Mr. CULLOP. Certainly it would. Whenever we adopt this amendment we bring about a dangerous condition and make it possible to be continued. Relief from present conditions the country demands. Two hundred miles is just about an average division of railroads. They can then incorporate to the State line and operate their divisions under separate corporations, and thereby escape entirely this law. A number of the largest and most populous States of the Union are not more than 200 miles wide. The State of Illinois is not 200 miles wide, and every railroad crossing that State could make a separate organization and incorporate under the State laws of Illinois and be relieved from the provisions of this act.

Mr. GARNER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CULLOP. Certainly.

Mr. GARNER. If they did organize under the Illinois statute and became wholly within the State, could not the commission of Illinois require the issuance of stocks and bonds? Has not the gentleman confidence enough in the people of Illinois to believe that they can prevent the issue of watered stocks and bonds?

Mr. CULLOP. Oh, State laws on this subject would not all be uniform, and then we would have a diversity of regulations which complicate rather than simplify conditions. We could have a different rate for the same product practically in every State in the Union, and then all control would be lost; the situation would be chaotic, and relief would be impossible under such a system. One of the troubles we have is to get a uniform classification. There is in the gentleman's State one classification, and there is a different one for the same product in New York.

Mr. GARNER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CULLOP. Yes.

Mr. GARNER. This bill has nothing to do with the question of rates; it is a question of the issuance of stocks and bonds. Does the gentleman from Indiana believe that the Interstate Commerce Commission is better qualified to pass upon the issue of stocks and bonds of a railroad wholly within his State than the railroad commission of Indiana?

Mr. CULLOP. If it does an interstate business, it is. The commission in Texas would not be impaired by this, so far as the citizens of Texas are concerned in intrastate shipping. The intrastate transportation of products would be identically under the same jurisdiction as it is now, and the Interstate Commerce Commission would only affect interstate commerce transported over the railroads in that State. The jurisdiction would remain the same as it now is. The railroad commission of that State can not regulate charges for interstate shipments, but its jurisdiction is limited to intrastate matters only.

The adoption of this amendment would destroy the purposes for which this measure is intended, and I hope it will be defeated.

Mr. STEVENS of New Hampshire. Mr. Chairman, I would like to call the attention of the committee to one result of this amendment, certainly in its present shape. A great many roads of the eastern part of the United States have been built up by consolidations of small lines, lines which still retain to-day their own organization, issue their own stocks and bonds. They are frequently held by the parent company on long-term leases. The Boston & Maine system as it exists to-day is composed of many separate complete organizations. The same way with the Pennsylvania Railroad system. This amendment would exempt from this law every one of those original separate roads which have really become part of a big system but retain their own organization and their own stocks and bonds. It would mean that some of the most important railroad systems of the country would be entirely relieved from the provisions of this act.

Mr. HULINGS. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SUMNERS. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. STEVENS of New Hampshire. Yes.

The CHAIRMAN. To whom does the gentleman yield?

Mr. STEVENS of New Hampshire. To the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. HULINGS].

Mr. HULINGS. Mr. Chairman, I would like to ask the chairman of the committee a question. Assuming that a railroad that had gone into Texas and had built a line within the State and had been built under the conditions and provisions established by their State commission, then, if this bill be passed, will the Interstate Commerce Commission oust the jurisdiction of that State commission?

Mr. ADAMSON. They can overrule it if the commission acts unwisely. It will interdict any unwise issue that the State commission allows.

Mr. HULINGS. And it does oust it?

Mr. ADAMSON. Yes; to that extent, if it is engaged in interstate commerce. The test is, Does it do business in interstate commerce?

Mr. BARKLEY. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ADAMSON. Certainly.

Mr. BARKLEY. I would like, if the gentleman would yield long enough in this argument for me to read into the RECORD a part of the Democratic platform on this subject.

Mr. ADAMSON. The gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. HULINGS] has the time.

Mr. HULINGS. I desired only to ask the question which seemed to me to meet the crux of this situation.

Mr. BARKLEY. I wish to read into the RECORD a statement from the Democratic platform on this subject, as follows:

> We favor such legislation as will effectually prohibit the railroads, express, telegraph, and telephone companies from engaging in business which brings them into competition with their shippers or patrons, also legislation preventing the overissue of stocks and bonds by interstate railroads, express companies, telegraph and telephone lines.

Mr. HARRISON. You do not find anything in the Democratic platform, however, that says we have a right to take away from the States those powers that are now exercised by the railroads and public-utility commissions of those States, do you?

Mr. BARKLEY. But we are not trying to do that in this bill.

Mr. HARRISON. You admit that—that you are——

Mr. BARKLEY. I do not admit anything of the kind.

Mr. HARRISON. I understood the gentleman to say, and also the chairman of the committee [Mr. ADAMSON] to say, that the public-service commission of a State may pass certain orders about this matter, but that they must be approved by the Interstate Commerce Commission, and that the Interstate Commerce Commission might accept or reject the recommendations of the railroad or public-service commissions of the States.

Mr. BARKLEY. Not unless the order of the commission permits the issue of stocks and bonds that affect interstate commerce.

Mr. HARRISON. But you can overrule the public-service commission of a State?

Mr. BARKLEY. A State commission can not regulate interstate commerce, because Congress has the exclusive right to regulate interstate commerce and things that affect it. But if the railroad commission of Texas or any other State should permit the issue of stocks and bonds that affect only intrastate business, the Interstate Commerce Commission would have no right to exercise power over that.

Mr. GREGG. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BARKLEY. I yield.

Mr. GREGG. It could state what series of bonds issued by a railroad would affect interstate commerce and what series would affect intrastate commerce?

Mr. BARKLEY. We are not called upon to settle that question.

Mr. GREGG. The gentleman said that if the bonds authorized by the State only affected intrastate traffic, then this bill would not affect it.

Mr. BARKLEY. The application for the bond itself by the interstate carrier must show that it affects interstate business.

Mr. BARTLETT. May I ask the gentleman a question?

Mr. BARKLEY. I yield to the gentleman.

Mr. BARTLETT. The gentleman has read from the Baltimore platform. Will he turn to pages 168 and 169 and read the extended assertion there of the rights of the States and of the duty of the Democratic Party to preserve and maintain in their integrity the rights of the States?

Mr. BARKLEY. That is a very lengthy provision. I can not read that in the time that I have, but I will answer the gentleman by saying that there is not a word or syllable, line, or sentence in the bill now under consideration that in any way abridges the right of the State to regulate their internal affairs.

Mr. BARTLETT. There is not a line in it that does not destroy it.

Mr. MANN. Regular order, Mr. Chairman.

The CHAIRMAN. The regular order is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Texas [Mr. GARNER].

Mr. DECKER. Mr. Chairman——

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I ask for the regular order.

Mr. DECKER. I want to speak on the amendment, if it is in order.

Mr. HARDY. Is it in order to offer an amendment to the amendment of the gentleman from Texas [Mr. GARNER]?

Mr. MANN. The gentleman can offer an amendment later.

The CHAIRMAN. The regular order is on the amendment, as all debate has been exhausted. The question is on the adoption of the amendment.

The question was taken, and the Chairman announced that the noes seemed to have it.

Mr. BARTLETT. Division, Mr. Chairman.

Mr. GARNER. Mr. Chairman, I ask for a division.

The committee divided; and there were—ayes 9, noes 76.

Mr. HARDY. Mr. Chairman, I voted against the amendment offered by Mr. GARNER a moment ago, but I wish to offer an amendment to this section of the bill which incorporates what I have understood from more than one member of the committee was their understanding. In other words, I do not believe where the State jurisdiction has limited the amount of stocks and bonds of a railroad wholly within that State the Interstate Commerce Commission, or the United States itself, ought to undertake to raise the limit.

The CHAIRMAN. There is nothing before the House for the gentleman to address his remarks to.

Mr. STEVENS of Minnesota. Mr. Chairman, have I the floor?

Mr. HARDY. Mr. Chairman, I believe I had the floor for the purpose of offering an amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Texas [Mr. HARDY] offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

Mr. HARDY. I have it in my own language, and, if I may be permitted, I will read it.

Mr. MANN. It will have to be sent to the Clerk's desk to be reported.

Mr. HARDY. I think the Clerk can read it. If not, I will go and help him.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair thinks the amendment is offered to the original bill and not to the substitute we have under consideration.

Mr. HARDY. I offer it to the substitute, as we are considering the substitute.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will have to show where the amendment is offered to the substitute.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. HARDY: Page 15, line 19, of substitute bill, after the word "thereof," insert: "Provided further, That nothing in this act shall authorize or legalize the issue of any stocks or bonds, by any railroad wholly within any State, in excess of the amount of such stocks and bonds as fixed and limited by the law of such State."

Mr. HARDY. Mr. Chairman, if we are to preserve any authority in the State administrations over the amount of bond issues and stock issues of railroads—a matter which the State of Texas has for a number of years endeavored to do by passing laws limiting the amount of stocks and bonds which railroads organized within that State may issue—we ought to adopt the amendment I offer. I have no objection to supplementing the State's action by providing that even though a State commission does authorize the issuance of stocks and bonds, the Interstate Commerce Commission may have the veto power on it and may say that those bonds or that amount of bonds shall not be issued; but I think that when the State of Texas or any other State, by its legal authorities, has said to a railway organized and wholly lying within its boundaries that "the value of your property does not warrant the issuance of more than so much of bonds or stock" there ought not to be a higher authority to override that veto and say that "notwithstanding the State of your residence or habitation has limited the amount of your bonds to, say, $20,000 a mile, we will give you authority to issue $30,000 a mile."

If it be true, as the chairman of the committee said a moment ago, that the purpose of this bill was not to authorize an appeal by the railroads from the action of the State or an increase of bonds over the limitations fixed by a State, then we ought to adopt this provision, which provides that nothing contained in this law shall authorize the Interstate Commerce Commission to authorize the issue of more bonds or stocks than are permitted by the State. My amendment will make this matter plain and free from doubt or question.

Now, I have said all that is involved in the matter. If it is right, if the chairman is right in his opinion, if that is the intention of this bill, it ought to be so clearly written into the face of the bill that it can not be questioned.

Mr. BARKLEY. Mr. Chairman, it would be manifestly unwise to limit the jurisdiction of the Interstate Commerce Commission in matters over which it has exclusive jurisdiction, as proposed by the amendment of the gentleman from Texas [Mr. HARDY].

There can not be two jursdictions over interstate commerce. Wherever the Federal Government enters upon fields which by the Constitution are given to it exclusively it enters them exclusively, so far as other jurisdictions over those particular things are concerned; and to adopt the amendment which has been offered here by the gentleman from Texas, that notwithstanding the fact that the Interstate Commerce Commission has exclusive and supreme jurisdiction to regulate not only interstate commerce but things that affect interstate commerce or that may affect it, would simply be to prescribe a rule to the effect that they can perform within their jurisdiction only so long as they are permitted to do so by a State railroad commission.

Mr. STEVENS of Minnesota. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield for a question?

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Kentucky yield to the gentleman from Minnesota?

Mr. BARKLEY. I will yield to the gentleman.

Mr. STEVENS of Minnesota. The amendment proposed by the gentleman from Texas [Mr. HARDY] proposes that nothing in this act shall be construed to legalize or authorize the issue of any stocks and bonds by any railroad wholly within a State in excess of the amount of such stocks and bonds as fixed and limited by the State law. Is there anything in this act that is intended to legalize any issue of securities?

Mr. BARKLEY. There is nothing in this bill that undertakes to legalize an issue of bonds. It merely gives the Interstate Commerce Commission the right to approve or consent to the issue, but it does not bind the United States Government to guarantee either their legality or the forms through which the companies may have gone in order to bring it about. Therefore the amendment would be vicious in that respect.

Mr. GARRETT of Texas. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Kentucky yield to the gentleman from Texas?

Mr. BARKLEY. I do.

Mr. GARRETT of Texas. I understood from the statement of the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. ADAMSON], the chairman of the committee, a few moments ago, that if the Railroad Commission of Texas should grant to the railroads of that State the right to issue bonds to a certain amount and the railroads desired to issue a greater amount than that and should appeal from the decision of the Texas commission to the Interstate Commerce Commission for an increase, this law would not apply to that increase, and that he did not so construe it or understand it to mean that the Interstate Commerce Commission could override the State commission and allow this increase in the issuance of bonds and securities?

Mr. BARKLEY. The chairman of the committee has made his position plain on that subject. I would like to read this provision here.

Mr. GARRETT of Texas. Do you agree with his position on that?

Mr. BARKLEY. Let me read it.

Mr. GARRETT of Texas. I would like to have the gentleman's opinion.

Mr. BARKLEY. I will answer the gentleman if I get the time. I read:

That it shall be unlawful for any common carrier subject to the act to regulate commerce—

And so forth. Now, bear in mind that no carrier is subject to the act to regulate commerce except an interstate carrier, a carrier engaged in interstate commerce.

Mr. GARRETT of Texas. I believe they are nearly all engaged in interstate commerce.

Mr. BARKLEY. No. There is one in my district only 10 miles long.

Mr. ADAMSON. Mr. Chairman, we have spent a great deal of time on this section and different amendments concerning the same subject, and I want to call for a vote. I do not want to cut off the gentleman from Texas [Mr. HARDY], who is such a quiet, modest gentleman. Let his amendment be read again.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I ask for the regular order.

Mr. ADAMSON. If the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] will consent, I shall not object to this modest gentleman.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Illinois object to the Clerk reporting the amendment?

Mr. MANN. Oh, no.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, the Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 15, line 19, of substitute bill, after the word "thereof," insert: "Provided further, That nothing in this act shall authorize or legalize the issue of any stocks or bonds, by any railroad wholly within a State, in excess of the amount of such stocks and bonds as fixed and limited by the law of such State."

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Texas [Mr. HARDY].

The question was taken, and the Chairman announced that the noes seemed to have it.

Mr. HARDY and Mr. LINTHICUM demanded a division.

The CHAIRMAN. A division is demanded.

The committee divided; and there were—ayes 12, noes 15.

So the amendment was rejected.

Mr. STEVENS of Minnesota. Mr. Chairman, I have an amendment which I wish to offer.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. STEVENS] offers an amendment which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment by Mr. STEVENS of Minnesota: Page 15, line 18, after the word "outstanding," strike out the period and insert a comma and the following language: "Or to notes issued by such carriers for the purpose of discharging lawful obligations of the carriers, secured by pledge of or lien upon any securities or property of said carriers."

Mr. STEVENS of Minnesota. The effect of that amendment is as follows: The bill provides that the Interstate Commerce Commission shall have jurisdiction to regulate the issuance of notes issued by carriers, exceeding 5 per cent of the total amount of stocks and bonds then outstanding.

Mr. SIMS. Not to run over two years.

Mr. STEVENS of Minnesota. Carriers have the right to issue notes to an amount less than 5 per cent of the amount of outstanding stocks and bonds without the approval of the commission. This amendment authorizes the carriers to issue notes without the approval of the commission whenever necessary to pay outstanding indebtedness secured by property or securities of the carriers.

The reason for that is this: It is very evident from the discussion here that there is a violent difference of opinion as to whether this authority be exclusive or not in the Interstate Commerce Commission. We realize that this question is fundamental and must be settled by the Supreme Court. And until these questions shall be settled, not one dollar of securities can be sold or marketed under the operation of this bill. Now, the railroads have large amounts of securities maturing from time to time, and while this litigation shall be in progress these securities will continue to mature, and unless we suitably provide for the proper discharge of those securities and provide in some way that they can be settled or refunded and cared for, there will necessarily be receiverships of solvent companies, and such a condition will surely bring disaster upon the business affairs of this country. Now, my amendment is solely designed to provide that for the purpose of caring for existing obligations secured by mortgages, or pledge of securities, that in such cases the carrier may issue its notes without approval of the commission, to care for that kind of obligation. If it desires to issue its securities or its notes for anything else for any other purpose, then the provisions of the bill with its regulation should apply. This amendment is only designed to act for the temporary purpose of preventing receiverships and enabling solvent corporations to care for themselves in this emergency, until this litigation shall be settled. For that reason I offer the amendment.

Mr. RAYBURN. Mr. Chairman, I oppose this amendment, for the reason that I believe the exceptions in this bill have already beeen carried far enough. It seems to me when we say that a railroad company, without the approval of the Interstate Commerce Commission or without that commission having the right to exercise their veto power, shall have the right to issue notes running two years or less, and that that amount may come up to 5 per cent of the outstanding securities of the carrier at that time, that is giving latitude enough, and, as far as I am individually concerned, when I first submitted this part of the bill to the committee it had in it only the provision that they could issue notes to an amount equaling 5 per cent of their outstanding stocks and bonds and that the notes should not run for more than one year. But after much consultation we decided that possibly it would be fairer and better if they were allowed to issue notes running two years or less equal to 5 per cent of their outstanding obligations. I want to say that this one specific provision has been submitted to the Interstate Commerce Commission more than once, and, as I understand it, they stand almost solidly behind the proposition that this is as much latitude as the railroad companies should be allowed in this particular instance. I hope the committee will vote down the amendment, and if nobody else desires to be heard I should like to have a vote.

Mr. SIMS. Mr. Chairman, I had risen to my feet to say substantially what the gentleman from Texas [Mr. RAYBURN] did say; but I wish to refer to one thing to which he did not refer. Every once in a while it turns up that some railroad company is in a terrible financial condition that was not previously known. We do not know how many companies are now in that condition. Now, if they are permitted to issue their notes, stocks, and bonds under this amendment without submitting to the Interstate Commerce Commission, it becomes a power of refunding that might not be authorized if submitted to the commission, and I think where the amount is larger than 5 per cent of the entire stock and bond issues of a road it is too important to allow them to be freed from the necessity of submitting that matter to the Interstate Commerce Commission, especially when they can issue notes to the extent of 5 per cent of their outstanding stocks and bonds, and for a term of two years or less without approval by the commission. Therefore, I think the amendment ought to fail.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Minnesota.

The amendment was rejected.

Mr. STEVENS of Minnesota. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Minnesota offers an amendment which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 16: Strike out lines 5 to 11, both inclusive, and the first three words in line 12, and insert in lieu thereof the following:

"It shall be unlawful for any person to hold the position of officer or director of two or more carriers subject to the act to regulate commerce as amended, which shall substantially compete with each other."

Mr. STEVENS of Minnesota. Mr. Chairman, the provisions of this amendment are that instead of excluding all——

Mr. ADAMSON. If the gentleman will pardon me, the conversation around me prevented my getting the scope of the amendment. Does it strike out the entire paragraph and substitute that language?

Mr. STEVENS of Minnesota. No; it strikes out from lines 5 to 11, both inclusive, and the first three words of line 12, on page 16. It strikes out the prohibitory provision against all interlocking directorates, and inserts in lieu of that a provision against interlocking directorates in competing corporations.

The reason for that is this: It has been shown in this debate this morning that quite a number of States, like Oklahoma, Texas, Missouri, and other States in the West and South, compel the corporations to have a local domicile or to be reincorporated in those States for the purpose of doing business. The situation is, then, that some of these transcontinental railroad systems are compelled to have local incorporations, and in order to have the proper control of those local corporations they have the officials of the parent line as officials and directors of the local corporations. They could have dummy directors, of course, but as good public policy we do not want and should not allow that. We want the responsible men who operate these corporations to be the responsible directors and managers of them. These State laws compel local incorporation, and they ought to have the best class and quality of directors. That is the best way to encourage honest, capable, and responsible management of our business concerns. Under these circumstances it is for the interest of the public that that shall be done, and there can be no question that when that fact shall be presented to the Interstate Commerce Commission under the provisions of this bill the Interstate Commerce Commission will at once grant such request that those responsible officials be allowed to serve as directors. There is no doubt about such a policy. Again, many of these through lines are made up of subsidiaries, branch lines, extensions of lines, and these lines maintain their corporate entity for various good reasons; but the stock is entirely or mostly owned by the parent corporation. For that reason also these subsidiary corporations have as directors the officers of the main line.

When that fact shall be presented to the Interstate Commerce Commission, of course it will make an order allowing these men to act as directors of these subsidiary corporations. The result will be that several thousand of these corporations under the provision of your substitute must be presented to the Interstate Commerce Commission within the next two years requesting an order allowing them to serve. The Interstate Commerce Commission will grant such request, and they ought to, but the result will be that it will place an additional burden on the commission. It compels them to do much work that is unnecessary, it compels the carriers to do work that is unnecessary. The evil which is desired to be cured is against the practice of acting as interlocking directors in competing lines. Is it not the best thing to do to put a straight prohibition against that evil, as provided by my amendment, subject to the penalty provision in your paragraph, and that is all that is intended or covered by my amendment.

Mr. ADAMSON. Mr. Chairman, the question of competition, although important in a great many situations, is not the entire moving cause for this part of the legislation. That can easily be taken care of. The greatest evil of interlocking directorates is in cases where railroads are wrecked by speculation and wreckers getting charge of the different corporations whether they are competing lines or not. The strongest argument before us for giving them the control of all this matter was that some States would not authorize them to issue stocks and bonds to use on their line in other States, which was abhorrent to the moral sense, because each State has a right to tax the property in the State and look to the preservation of that property to some extent. The trouble is that a little coterie of men would get possession of a number of railroads through being directors of all. They may sacrifice one of these roads in order to build up another, not primarily for the purpose of building it up, but because by that particular transaction they can pocket more gains from speculation. This statement is borne out by the history of all the wrecks that have disgraced the transportation conditions of this country. [Applause.]

Now, the first result of this amendment will be that corporations will quit trying to fill offices with a few men. There are enough good men in the world to fill the offices, and there are not enough offices to go around. It will be only when peculiar conditions make it necessary for some man to be a director in different railroads, and when those conditions exist the Interstate Commerce Commission will already know it, because under the operation of section 20 as amended they keep themselves posted all the time as to who are the directors and other officers of the railroad. These conditions would have to be proven to the commission. The burdens of the commission will not be increased, because the occasions for this provision will be fewer and fewer. When they find out what the law is the corporations will quit putting excuses up to them except in meritorious cases.

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. HOUSTON). The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Minnesota.

The question was taken, and the amendment was rejected.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

The committee informally rose; and Mr. ALEXANDER having taken the chair as Speaker pro tempore, a message from the Senate, by Mr. Tulley, one of its clerks, announced that the Senate had agreed to the reports of the committees of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the House to bills of the following titles:

S. 4167. An act granting pensions and increase of pensions to certain soldiers and sailors of the Regular Army and Navy, and of wars other than the Civil War, and to certain widows and dependent children of such soldiers and sailors;

S. 4260. An act granting pensions and increase of pensions to certain soldiers and sailors of the Regular Army and Navy, and of wars other than the Civil War, and to certain widows and dependent children of such soldiers and sailors;

S. 4353. An act granting pensions and increase of pensions to certain soldiers and sailors of the Regular Army and Navy, and of wars other than the Civil War, and to certain widows and dependent children of such soldiers and sailors; and

S. 4657. An act granting pensions and increase of pensions to certain soldiers and sailors of the Regular Army and Navy, and of wars other than the Civil War, and to certain widows and dependent children of such soldiers and sailors.

REGULATION OF RAILWAY STOCKS AND BONDS.

The committee resumed its session.

Mr. STEVENS of Minnesota. Mr. Chairman, I present another amendment, which is my last.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 16, line 26, after the word "court," insert the following:

"SEC. 3. That section 24 of the act to regulate commerce, approved February 4, 1887, as amended, be, and the same is hereby, further amended so as to read as follows:

"'SEC. 24. That the Interstate Commerce Commission is hereby enlarged so as to consist of nine members with terms of seven years, and each shall receive $10,000 compensation annually. The qualifications of the members and the manner of the payment of their salaries shall be as already provided by law. Such enlargement of the commission shall be accomplished through appointment by the President, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, of two additional interstate commerce commissioners, one for a term expiring December 31, 1920, one for the term expiring December 31, 1921. The terms of the present commissioners, or of any successor appointed to fill a vacancy caused by the death or resignation of any of the present commissioners, shall expire as heretofore provided by law. Their successors and the successors of the additional commissioners herein provided for shall be appointed for the full term of seven years, except that any person appointed to fill a vacancy shall be appointed only for the unexpired term of the commissioner whom he shall succeed. Not more than five commissioners shall be appointed from the same political party.

"'That all existing laws relating to the attendance of witnesses and the production of evidence and the compelling of testimony under the act to regulate commerce and all acts amendatory thereof shall apply to any and all proceedings and hearings under this act.'

"SEC. 4. That in the performance of the duties prescribed by this act the Interstate Commerce Commission, for such time as it may deem necessary, may authorize a division of three commissioners, to be selected by the chairman of the commission, to have full power to investigate, order, certify, report, and determine as to all matters arising under this act.

"In any such proceeding, such division shall have all the jurisdiction and powers and may proceed as provided under said act to regulate commerce as amended, the same as therein authorized to or for said commission, subject to the order of the commission.

"In carrying out the provisions of this act the commission may consider all facts within its jurisdiction, and whenever it shall deem necessary, it may utilize, for the purpose of carrying out the provisions of this act, such of its employees, experts, or engineers as may be employed in the duties provided in section 19a of the said act to regulate commerce, as amended. In such case, an accurate account shall be kept of such use and the expense thereof, which shall be borne and shall be paid by said applicant to said Interstate Commerce Commission, which shall deposit the same in the Treasury of the United States, to be credited to the general fund, taking the receipt of the Treasurer therefor, and filing the same in its office with said application. If the applicant shall refuse or neglect to pay the expense of said appraisal, the Interstate Commerce Commission shall dismiss such application."

Mr. ADAMSON. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order that that amendment is not germane to this portion of the bill or to any other portion of the bill.

Mr. STEVENS of Minnesota. Will the gentleman reserve his point of order?

Mr. ADAMSON. I will reserve it if the gentleman desires to be heard.

Mr. STEVENS of Minnesota. Mr. Chairman, the provisions of this bill put upon the Interstate Commerce Commission a very large burden and a very great increase of duties. It is absolutely necessary for the public welfare that these duties imposed by this bill shall be properly performed. Unless they are so performed, not only will the operation of the law be a failure but a great injury will be liable to be visited upon the carriers, on the public, and on the investors in the securities of the carriers. More than that, there will be a temptation for the Interstate Commerce Commission itself, in order to perform some of the many duties imposed on it by this law, to neglect its other work. There is a growing complaint throughout the country that this is being done now, that too much of the commission's important work is being done by subordinates, by examiners, and by clerks. The work under this bill could not be so performed. It ought to be done by the commissioners personally. For that reason I have introduced this amendment to increase the number of the members of the commission, to provide how the work shall be performed by a subdivision of three, with authority to do the work provided by this measure. If they do the work personally, it will be well done. Unless the work shall be done by the commissioners in that way, under their personal supervision and personal responsibility, the work will not be well done and injury will come to the work of the commission, to the foresight of the commission, and to the country.

For that reason I have introduced this amendment. I admit that it is not germane if the gentleman from Georgia cares to enforce the rule on me. But I think it is my duty to apprise the committee of the situation which will arise and of the remedy which ought to be presented now, and which must be faced some day in the near future by this House. [Applause.]

Mr. ADAMSON. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order with less reluctance than I should if I had not consulted with the commissioners about it. They do not approve of it as necessary in carrying out the provisions of the existing or proposed law. We, furthermore, are going ahead now with the general consideration of all amendments proposed to be made to the interstate-commerce law, and we will thrash out all these questions and try to report to the House a bill as early as possible, with such amendments as we deem meritorious. A bill comprising this amendment is already before the committee, and I insist on the point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair sustains the point of order.

Mr. BARTLETT. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment, which I send to the desk and ask to have read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 16, line 26, after the word "court," insert: "Provided, That nothing contained in this act shall deprive the railroad commissions or the public service or utilities commissions of the various States from exercising all the powers now conferred upon them by the various States.

Mr. BARTLETT. Mr. Chairman, we are told by the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. BARKLEY] and others that the compelling reason to pass this bill is that a promise to do so is contained in a certain part of the Democratic platform made by the Democratic Party in 1912 at Baltimore, and the gentleman from Kentucky has read a few lines on which he bases his support of this bill—more extreme in its provisions, Mr. Chairman, than was ever dreamed of by Hamilton or any Federalist that advocated the Hamiltonian theories of government. The platform at Baltimore does contain three lines, which I will read:

Also legislation preventing the overissue of stocks and bonds by interstate railroads, express companies, telegraph and telephone lines.

But that platform contains sentences and sections which assert in no uncertain terms the rights of the States, and the promise to preserve the rights of the States, and I want to read to the gentleman from Kentucky and his conferers on the Interstate and Foreign Commerce Committee what they seem, in the preparation and report of this bill, to have forgotten, which is a part of the platform, namely, a duty to sustain the rights of the States now proposed by this amendment, and to call to their attention their duty to the States as demanded and required by the Democratic platform. Let us see what it says:

RIGHTS OF THE STATES.

We believe in the preservation and maintenance in their full strength and integrity of the three coordinate branches of the Federal Government—the executive, the legislative, and the judicial—each keeping within its own bounds and not encroaching upon the just powers of either of the others.

Believing that the most efficient results under our system of government are to be attained by the full exercise by the States of their reserved sovereign powers, we denounce as usurpation the efforts of our opponents to deprive the States of any of the rights reserved to them and to enlarge and magnify by indirection the powers of the Federal Government.

We insist upon the full exercise of all the powers of the Government, both State and National, to protect the people from injustice at the hands of those who seek to make the Government a private asset in business. There is no twilight zone between the Nation and the State in which exploiting interests can take refuge from both. It is as necessary that the Federal Government shall exercise the powers reserved to them, but we insist that Federal remedies for the regulation of interstate commerce and for the prevention of private monopoly shall be added to, and not substituted for, State remedies.

Gentlemen, I pause to call your attention back to that promise of the party when you propose by this bill to substitute for State remedies in control of interstate commerce roads the remedies you now propose, and to call your attention to the fact that this amendment I have offered rings with the declaration of the platform, preserving to the State every right it has to regulate by its railroad commission or its public-utilities commission, whatever it may be named, as it exists in my State and in the State of Kentucky and in the State of Michigan and in the State of Wisconsin, and all these States, the internal affairs of corporations created by them, and I intend to vote for it, and to say, as I have said before on the floor of this House, aided at the time by some who now take the opposite position, that the Government has not the right under the Constitution to undertake to say that the States shall not regulate the issuance of the stocks and bonds in those corporations that it creates, and to assert that the issuance of stocks and bonds is not commerce.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Georgia has expired.

Mr. BARTLETT. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for five minutes more.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. RAYBURN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BARTLETT. Certainly.

Mr. RAYBURN. Mr. Chairman, does the gentleman recall another part of the platform that also says that we demand legislation to prevent the overissue by railroad companies of securities?

Mr. BARTLETT. I just read it.

Mr. RAYBURN. Is not the gentleman good enough lawyer to know that under the commerce clause of the Constitution, and generally under the Constitution, any power that Congress has has already been delegated by the States, and that when Congress has the power to enter a field of legislation and does enter it, it does it to the exclusion of the States?

Mr. BARTLETT. I do; and what I say is that this power to regulate the issue of stocks and bonds has never been delegated by the people of the States to the Congress of the United States, but remains by the tenth amendment preserved to them and the people thereof, and if I had the time I would read now some of the decisions of the Supreme Court which declare that the issuance of stocks and bonds is not commerce and that therefore we have not the right to do what we are attempting to do.

But I am not going to change my position upon this bill, because the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] knows I fought that out with him in the Sixty-first Congress, and the gentleman knows what remarks I made at that time, and I am not ashamed of them, and I stand by them now.

Mr. GARNER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BARTLETT. Yes.

Mr. GARNER. If the gentleman's amendment should be adopted, it would not prohibit what the gentleman from Texas desires to do?

Mr. BARTLETT. No.

Mr. GARNER. And that is for the Interstate Commerce Commission here to regulate interstate railroads.

Mr. BARTLETT. That is all.

Mr. GARNER. It only reserves the right to the States to control that which is within their border.

Mr. BARTLETT. Yes; and which the Democratic Party by its platform promised the people it would do, that it would only exercise that right in conjunction with the various States and not deprive them of their power.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BARTLETT. Yes.

Mr. MANN. The gentleman stated that he had not changed his position?

Mr. BARTLETT. Yes.

Mr. MANN. I agree with the gentleman. But does not the gentleman admit, in view of the fact that his party almost unanimously voted against the stock-and-bonds provision which I had in the bill four years ago and has now reported substantially the same thing, that his party has changed its position?

Mr. BARTLETT. Mr. Chairman, I am not here to criticize what anybody else has done, but I am here to say and to repeat and to maintain it by the decisions of the courts that the duty of issuing stock and bonds by a corporation is not commerce, and in proof of my position I used at that time the language of no less distinguished jurists than Judge Harlan and Judge White and others.

Now, I read from the One hundred and sixty-first United States Court Reports in the case of the Louisville and Nashville Railroad Co. against The State of Kentucky. The two roads undertook to combine in this case against the public policy expressed by the constitution and laws of Kentucky that no railroad or telegraph company should consolidate its capital stock or pool its earnings, in whole or in part, with any other railroad.

Now, what do they say about that? I will read:

Section 201 of the constitution of the State of Kentucky is a legitimate exercise of the police power of the State, and forbids the consolidation between the Louisville & Nashville Co. and the Chesapeake, Ohio & Southwestern Co., which is the subject of the controversy in this suit, at least so far as the power to make it remains unexecuted.

They undertook to say in this bill, which they filed against the State of Kentucky, that they could consolidate notwithstanding the laws of Kentucky and the constitution, because they were interstate railroads, and therefore when Kentucky undertook to prevent a combination it undertook to pass a law which interfered with interstate commerce. I will read:

But little need be said in answer to the final contention of the plaintiff in error that the assumption of a right to forbid the consolidation of parallel and competing lines is an interference with the power of Congress over interstate commerce. The same remark may be made with respect to all police regulations of interstate railways. All such regulations interfere indirectly, more or less, with commerce between the States in the fact that they impose a burden upon the instruments of such commerce and add something to the cost of transportation by the expense conferred in conforming to such regulations. These are, however, like the taxes imposed upon railways and their rolling stock, which are more or less, according to the policy of the State within which the roads are operated, but are still within the competency of the legislature to impose.

It has never been supposed that the dominant power of Congress over interstate commerce took from the States the power of legislation with respect to the instruments of such commerce, so far as the legislation was within its ordinary police powers. Nearly all the railways in the country have been constructed under State authority, and it can not be supposed that they intended to abandon their power over them as soon as they were finished. The power to construct them involves, necessarily, the power to impose such regulations upon their operation as a sound regard for the interests of the public may seem to render desirable. In the division of authority with respect to interstate railways Congress reserves to itself the superior right to control their commerce and forbid interference therewith, while to the States remains the power to create and to regulate the instruments of such commerce, so far as necessary to the conservation of the public interests.

If it is to be assumed that the States have no right to forbid the consolidation of competing lines because the whole subject is within the control of Congress, it would necessarily follow that Congress would have the power to authorize such consolidation in defiance of State legislation, a proposition which only needs to be stated to demonstrate its unsoundness. As we have already said, the power of one railway corporation to purchase the stock and franchises of another must be conferred by express language to that effect in the charter; and hence if the charter of the Louisville & Nashville Co. had been silent upon that point, it will be conceded that it would have no power to make the proposed purchase in this case. As the power to purchase, then, is derivable from the State, the State may accompany it with such limitations as it may choose to impose. It results, then, from the argument of the appellant that, if there be any interference with interstate commerce, it is in imposing limitations upon the exercise of a right which did not previously exist, and, hence, if the State permits such purchase or consolidation it is bound to extend the authority to every possible case or expose itself to the charge of interfering with commerce. This proposition is obviously untenable.

That opinion was by Judge Brown, and was concurred in by all. The court further says:

That, conceding that the requisite power existed in both the above companies, section 201 of the constitution of 1891 was a legitimate exercise of the police power of the State, and forbade such consolidations, at least so far as such power remained unexecuted.

So that the Kentucky case, which permitted the consolidation of the Louisville & Nashville with other roads, contrary to the laws of the State of Kentucky, saying that the State had no right to forbid them because the whole subject was in control of Congress, is a proposition which only needs to be stated in order to demonstrate its unsoundness.

I am somewhat concerned about this, because my State has this in its constitution:

Article 4 of paragraph 3 of the constitution of Georgia says:

The general assembly shall have no power to authorize any corporation to buy shares and stock of any other corporation in this State or elsewhere, to make any contract or agreement with any such corporation which shall have the effect to lessen competition in their respective business or to encourage monopolies, and all such contracts and agreements are void.

We have in my State two great railroad lines, which could not be consolidated under the laws of the State of Georgia. And yet, if they desire to consolidate, the Interstate Commerce Commission is to be consulted, and, although they are competing lines, the laws of Georgia are to be destroyed by stretching the power of Congress under this elastic shield of interstate commerce, permitting any violation of the policy of my State, or all other States, to consolidate or destroy competition.

I am opposed to the provisions of the bill which endeavor to regulate

THE ISSUES OF STOCKS AND BONDS AND CONSOLIDATION OF COMPETING LINES.

The case chiefly relied upon is the Northern Securities case, volume 193. But that case does not sustain the contention nor justify the provisions in this bill relative to the control of the issues of stocks and bonds by railroads engaged in interstate commerce, or the right of Congress under that power to authorize the consolidation of competing lines contrary to the laws of the States where such railroads may have been chartered and where they operate. That question was distinctly stated by Justice Harlan not to be a question in that case. On page 333 he says:

It is said that whatever may be the power of a State over such subjects Congress can not forbid single individuals from disposing of their stock in a State corporation, even if such corporation be engaged in interstate and international commerce; that the holding or purchase by a State corporation or the purchase by individuals of the stock of another corporation, for whatever purpose, are matters in respect of which Congress has no authority under the Constitution; that, so far as the power of Congress is concerned, citizens or State corporations may dispose of their property and invest their money in any way they choose; and that in regard to all such matters citizens and State corporations are subject, if to any authority, only to the lawful authority of the State in which such citizens reside or under whose laws such corporations are organized.

This was the claim made in the case, and, continuing, Justice Harlan says, on page 334:

It is unnecessary in this case to consider such abstract general questions. The court need not concern itself with them. They are not here to be examined and determined.

Continuing, Justice Harlan said:

In this connection it is suggested that the contention of the Government is that the acquisition and ownership of stock in a State railroad corporation is itself interstate commerce, if that corporation be engaged in interstate commerce. This suggestion is made in different ways, sometimes in express words, at other times by implication. For instance, it is said that the question here is whether the power of Congress over interstate commerce extends to the regulation of the ownership of the stock in State railroad companies by reason of their being engaged in such commerce. Again, it is said that the only issue in this case is whether the Northern Securities Co. can acquire or hold stock in other State corporations. Still further, it is asked, generally, whether the organization or ownership of railroads is not under the control of the States under whose laws they come into existence? Such statements as to the issues in this case are, we think, wholly unwarranted and are very wide of the mark; it is the setting up of mere men of straw to be easily stricken down. We do not understand that the Government makes any such contentions or takes any such positions as those statements imply. It does not contend that Congress may control the mere acquisition or the mere ownership of stock in a State corporation engaged in interstate commerce. Nor does it contend that Congress can control the organization of State corporations authorized by their charters to engaged in interstate and international commerce.

So that in this case, if we take the view of Justice Harlan, who pronounced the opinion of the court, instead of deciding the question contended for by those who assume that Congress has the power to regulate the issuance of stocks and bonds of railroad corporations because they are engaged in interstate commerce, or to prescribe the manner in which they shall so issue, or acquire competing lines, the court stated positively that that question was not involved.

Justice White, in his dissenting opinion in behalf of himself and three other justices, cited the case in the One hundred and sixty-first United States as controlling, but as the majority of the court decided that that question was not there to be examined and determined, the Northern Securities case can not be invoked to sustain the action of the committee. In this dissenting opinion Justice White refers to the case decided by Justice Jackson, In re Green, Fifty-second Federal Reporter, with approval, and quotes from that decision, as follows:

Congress may place restrictions and limitations upon the right of corporations created and organized under its authority to acquire, use, and dispose of property. It may also impose such restrictions and limitations upon the citizen in respect to such restrictions and limitations upon the citizen in respect to the exercise of a public privilege or franchise conferred by the United States. But Congress certainly has not the power or authority, under the commerce clause or any other provision of the Constitution, to limit and restrict the right of corporations created by the States or the citizens of the States in the acquisition, control, or disposition of property. Neither can Congress regulate or prescribe the price or prices at which such property, or products thereof, shall be sold by the owner or owners, whether corporations or individuals. It is equally clear that Congress has no jurisdiction over, and can not make criminal, the aims, purposes, and intentions of persons in the acquisition and control of property which the States of their residence or creation sanction and permit. It is not material that such property, or the products thereof, may become the subject of trade or commerce among the several States or with foreign nations. Commerce among the States, within the exclusive regulating power of Congress, consists of intercourse and traffic between their citizens, and includes the transportation of persons and property, as well as the purchase, sale, and exchange of commodities. * * *

Continuing, Justice White said that if this opinion had been written in the case now considered, it could not more completely than its reasoning does have disposed of the contention that the ownership of stock by a corporation in competing railroads was commerce.

We do not understand that the Government makes any such contention, nor does it contend that Congress can control the organization of State corporations organized by their charters to engage in interstate commerce.

Another case from which I read to show that the issue or transfer of stock and bonds is not interstate commerce, is that of Hatch v. Reardon (204 U. S., 153), in which the court held:

The protection of the commerce clause of the Federal Constitution is not available to defeat a State stamp-tax law on transactions wholly within a State because they affect property without that State or because one or both of the parties previously came from other States.

The tax of 2 cents a share imposed on transfers of stock, made within that State, by the tax law of New York of 1905, does not violate the equal-protection clause of the fourteenth amendment, * * * nor is it as to such transfers of stock an interference with interstate commerce.

On page 160 the court say:

The other ground of attack is that the act is an interference with commerce among the several States. * * * There is not a shadow of ground for calling the transaction described such commerce. The communications between the parties were not between different States, * * * and the bargain did not contemplate or induce the transport of property from one State to another, as in the Drummer cases. * * * The bargain was not affected in any way, legally or practically, by the fact that the parties happened to have come from another State before they made it. It does not appear that the petitioner came into New York to sell his stock, as it was put on his behalf. It appears only that he sold after coming into the State. But we are far from implying that it would have made any difference if he had come to New York with the supposed intent before any bargain was made.

Here it is plainly stated that the taxing of these kinds of property, though the sale is made between citizens of different States, is not an interference with commerce. Another case which to me seems to be directly in point is Chicago, and so forth, Railway Co. v. Solan, to be found in One hundred and sixty-ninth United States Reports, page 133. In the opinion of the court, pronounced by Justice Gray, we find, on page 137, the following:

Railroad corporations, like all other corporations and persons doing business within the territorial jurisdiction of a State, are subject to its laws. It is in the law of the State that provisions are to be found concerning the rights and duties of common carriers and the measures by which injuries resulting from their failure to perform their obligations may be prevented or redressed. A carrier exercising his calling within a particular State, although engaged in the business of interstate commerce, is answerable to the laws of the State for acts of nonfeasance or of misfeasance committed within its limits. * * *

It is equally within the power of the State to prescribe the safeguards and precautions foreseen to be necessary and proper to prevent by anticipation those wrongs and injuries which, after they have been inflicted, the State has the power to redress and punish. The rules prescribed for the construction of railroads and for their management and operation designed to protect persons and property are strictly within the scope of the local law. They are not in themselves regulations of interstate commerce, although they control in some degree the conduct and the liability of those engaged in such commerce.

But it may be, Mr. Chairman, that I am lagging somewhat, lagging behind in progressiveness. It may be that devoted as I am to the theory of government that that which is not delegated by express language, or by language which is implied that it is necessary to carry out the powers granted, can not be exercised; it may be I am mistaken in following the old law writers and the decisions of the Supreme Court which declare the regulation of the internal affairs of a corporation, such as the issuance of stocks, the issuance of bonds, is a police power belonging to the State which granted the charter; but if I am in error, my path of error is blazed by great statesmen and approved of by great judges. I can not content myself without such an amendment is adopted in full conformity with the Democratic platform; I can not content myself to vote for this bill, and will not do it, unless we ingraft upon that bill such a provision, without which it sails out into a sea of infinite federalism and Hamiltonism. Why? Because we meant when we put that in the Democratic platform that the rights of the States can not be taken away in this day of mad federalism and mad days of centralizing all the power in the Federal Government. [Applause.] Others may follow that path; others may seek promotion, office, and the approval of the unthinking crowd. For myself I will be content to surrender the commission that I have borne for 20 years from my constituency rather than advance along the line of federalism, advance along the line of Hamiltonism, do that which will drive a dagger to the hearts of the States—that will destroy them. [Applause.]

Mr. SIMS. Mr. Chairman, all of us who have served as long with the distinguished gentleman from Georgia [Mr. BARTLETT] as I have know that he is a good lawyer and a sincere and honest man. He never makes a mere play for political effect; in everything he does he is sincere. I want to say, as far as I am concerned, that I have no more desire that Congress should take upon itself jurisdiction to which it is not entitled under the Constitution than is the gentleman himself. There is not a line in this bill that undertakes anything of that kind, neither in purpose nor in fact. Now, as the gentleman from Texas said a moment ago, there are fields of legislation authorized by the Constitution to be exercised by the National Legislature, the Congress. That field may be of great benefit to a State, and if Congress does not legislate, and the State legislates, the legislation of the State is good and valid to the extent of its powers, because Congress has not seen proper up to that time to occupy that field. But the moment Congress does see proper to act, it occupies that field to the exclusion of the State. As it were, the State is not a legislative trespasser, although not exercising a reserved power, so that legislation by Congress is, in the language of the Democratic platform, really supplemental and does not in any way undertake to substitute the Federal authority to the exclusion of the State authority in all things reserved to the States. Now, there is no question better settled than that the States have no power to regulate interstate commerce. There is no authority that is better settled, no question of law, than that Congress alone has authority to do so; and there is not a line in this bill that can deprive a State of any of its reserved powers, because such powers are reserved to the people of the States under the Constitution; and if we have no power we can not exercise it, and if we attempted to do so it would be void.

Mr. BARTLETT. May I interrupt the gentleman?

Mr. SIMS. I yield to the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. ADAMSON].

Mr. ADAMSON. I did not see the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. BARTLETT] on his feet. I just wanted to ask this: If you could do that, would not you exempt everything in the country and leave nothing for this bill to operate on?

Mr. SIMS. Providing the States all legislate on the same subject.

Mr. BARTLETT. The gentleman has proceeded on the ground that issues of stocks and bonds are interstate commerce; he has got to have that basis for doing what he desires to do.

Mr. SIMS. If I understood the gentleman's amendment, it provides that this bill shall not apply to any State——

Mr. BARTLETT. No; it does not.

Mr. SIMS. Will the gentleman state what it does?

Mr. BARTLETT. The amendment provides that nothing in this bill shall be construed to take away from the various State railroad commissions, public-service commissions, utilities commissions exercising the powers they have now that have been conferred upon them by the various States; and if the various States can not confer power to regulate commerce, it does not take that away.

Mr. SIMS. Now, the State——

Mr. ADAMSON. Will the gentleman yield for a moment?

Mr. SIMS. Certainly.

Mr. ADAMSON. I am perfectly familiar with the decisions referred to by my beloved and distinguished colleague, and I would not run counter to them for anything in the world. In shaping this bill we do not run counter to them, and it is not proposed under this bill that the Federal Government will issue any bonds or stocks. We confine our efforts in this bill to prohibiting agents and officers of interstate railroads from doing things inimical to the public interest. We say that if they do so-and-so in connection with interstate commerce it is unlawful, and we punish them, and the Supreme Court of the United States has never said that is unconstitutional.

Mr. SIMS. If I understand the question raised, it is this: That this bill can not take——

Mr. BARTLETT. Does not.

Mr. SIMS. Does not take from the State commissions the public-service commissions, the public-utilities commissions of any State any power already vested in it by the States in which such commission serves. Is that correct?

Mr. BARTLETT. That is what it is.

Mr. SIMS. Mr. Chairman, just what authority has been vested in these respective State commissions by their respective State legislatures I do not know, but if they confer upon the State commissions authority to do that which Congress, under the Constitution, is alone authorized and empowered to do and which the State may do when Congress does not act, then if any State has authorized its State commission to regulate interstate commerce and any provision of this bill should run counter to that authority, of course the authority in the State commission would be void as against this bill to that extent.

It is just as the distinguished chairman of the committee has said. Suppose the legislature of every State in the Union should meet before this bill becomes a law and enact laws in every State of the Union regulating interstate commerce or regulating the facilities and means of doing interstate commerce, and then we should pass a bill with the amendment of the distinguished gentleman from Georgia [Mr. BARTLETT] in it, our bill would not be worth the paper on which it is written.

Mr. SUMNERS. Mr. Chairman, I wanted to ask the gentleman from Tennessee a question.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Tennessee has expired.

Mr. SIMS. Mr. Chairman, I ask for five minutes more, but do not expect to use it all.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I ask for the regular order. Debate is exhausted on this amendment.

Mr. ADAMSON. The vote is on the amendment offered by my colleague from Georgia [Mr. BARTLETT].

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. BARTLETT].

The question was taken, and the Chairman announced that the noes seemed to have it.

Mr. BARTLETT. Division, Mr. Chairman.

The committee divided; and there were—ayes 13, noes 57.

So the amendment was rejected.

Mr. SUMNERS and Mr. TOWNER rose.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Iowa [Mr. TOWNER] is recognized.

Mr. TOWNER. Mr. Chairman, I wish to offer an amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Iowa [Mr. TOWNER] offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 10, line 5, strike out the paragraph and insert in lieu thereof the following.

Mr. ADAMSON. Mr. Chairman, I will ask if the Members of the House are not sufficiently acquainted with the amendment to waive the reading of it?

Mr. TOWNER. I hardly think they are. I will not insist on it, though.

Mr. ADAMSON. I did not know but that they were familiar with it. It has been pending in the Senate and likewise in our committee.

Mr. MANN. Is it satisfactory to the committee?

Mr. ADAMSON. No, sir; but we are considering it.

Mr. MANN. Let it be read.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 10, line 5, strike out the paragraph and insert in lieu thereof the following:

"That any common carrier, railroad, or transportation company receiving property for transportation from a point in one State or Territory or the District of Columbia to a point in another State, Territory, District of Columbia, or foreign country shall issue a receipt or bill of lading therefor, and shall be liable to the lawful holder thereof for any loss, damage, or injury to such property caused by it or by any common carrier, railroad, or transportation company to which such property may be delivered or over whose line or lines such property may pass, and no contract, receipt, rule, regulation, or other limitation of any character whatsoever, shall exempt such common carrier, railroad, or transportation company from the liability hereby imposed; and any such common carrier, railroad, or transportation company so receiving property for transportation from a point in one State, Territory, or the District of Columbia to a point in another State or Territory, or from a point in a State or Territory to a point in the District of Columbia, or to a foreign country, or for transportation wholly within a Territory shall be liable to the lawful holder of said receipt or bill of lading or to any party entitled to recover thereon, whether such receipt or bill of lading has been issued or not, for the full actual loss, damage, or injury to such property caused by it or by any common carrier, railroad, or transportation company to which such property may be delivered or over whose line or lines such property may pass, notwithstanding any limitation of liability or limitation of the amount of recovery or representation or agreement as to value in any such receipt or bill of lading, or in any contract, rule, regulation, or in any tariff filed with the Interstate Commerce Commission; and any such limitation, without respect to the manner or form in which it is sought to be made, is hereby declared to be unlawful and void: Provided, however, That if the goods are hidden from view by wrapping, boxing, or other means, and the carrier is not notified as to the character of the goods, the carrier may require the shipper to specifically state in writing the value of the goods, and the carrier shall not be liable beyond the amount so specifically stated, in which case the Interstate Commerce Commission may establish and maintain rates for transportation, dependent upon the value of the property shipped as specifically stated in writing by the shipper. Such rates shall be published as are other rate schedules: Provided further, That nothing in this section shall deprive any holder of such receipt or bill of lading of any remedy or right of action which he has under the existing law: Provided further, That it shall be unlawful for any common carrier to provide by rule, contract, regulation, or otherwise a shorter period for giving notice of claims than 90 days, and for the filing of claims for a shorter period than 4 months, and for the institution of suits than 2 years: Provided, however, That if the loss, damage, or injury complained of was due to delay or damage while being loaded or unloaded, or damaged in transit by carelessness or negligence, then no notice of claim nor filing of claim shall be required as a condition precedent to recovery.

"SEC. 2. That this act shall take effect and be in force from 90 days after its passage."

Mr. TOWNER. Mr. Chairman, what is known as the Carmack amendment to the antitrust law was adopted in 1906. It provides among other things that a railroad or transportation company receiving property for carriage shall issue a receipt or bill of lading therefor, shall be liable to the lawful holder thereof for any loss, damage, or injury to such property while in transit, and further provides that—

No contract, receipt, rule, or regulation shall exempt such common carrier, railroad, or transportation company from the liability hereby imposed.

Under the common law as it had been interpreted by the courts in the various States carriers could not by contract limit their liability for their own negligence. But the railroads and other transportation companies found a means of avoiding the rule by a skillfully designed bill of lading or contract, in which a rate was made on a stated valuation, and the carrier's liability was limited to such declared valuation. This contract was sustained by most of the courts, largely on the ground of estoppel. That is, it was held that the shipper having declared the value of his property, and having received a rate based on that value, could not afterwards be heard to claim that the value was in fact greater than the declared value, but must be limited in his right to recover in case of loss to the declared value.

This seems sound as stated, but it did not work fairly to the shipper. In most cases no rates upon a higher valuation were given the shipper, or if given they were so much higher than the rate fixed on the low standard stated in the contract by the railroad as to be prohibitive. In many cases the shipper did not know the limitation until he was confronted with it when a loss occurred. In many cases the shipper did not know his rights and supposed he was forced to accept the terms proposed for the company.

So universal was the complaint that many of the States passed laws preventing the railroads from in any way limiting their liability from negligence by contract. These laws were sustained both in the State courts and by the Supreme Court of the United States.

Such was the situation when the Carmack amendment was adopted. The evident purpose of this provision was to prevent transportation companies engaged in interstate commerce from limiting their liability for negligence by contract. That purpose, however, in large measure failed, for the effect of the amendment as finally interpreted by the courts was something very different. In the first place it was held that it manifested the purpose of Congress to bring contracts for interstate shipments under one uniform rule of law, and therefore overthrew all State legislation. It was held that the amendment was so loosely drawn as not to prevent the railroad companies from limiting their liability by contract in cases where a rate was made on a valuation stated. So that conditions under the Carmack amendment, instead of being made better, were much worse than they were before its adoption.

Until February, 1913, when the Supreme Court of the United States handed down the decision in Adams Express Co. against Groninger, the railroads responded in cases of loss or damage for the full value of the property. This decision held that the Carmack amendment did not prescribe or require full liability in cases where a contract limiting liability to a value stated had been made. It will thus be seen that the very object and purpose of the law has failed, and instead of extending the benefits of the prohibition to all the States it has taken away those benefits from the States which had secured them. Thus, in Iowa the legislature passed a law which prohibited the railroad company from escaping from or limiting its liability for negligence. The validity of the law was contested by the railroads, and the law was sustained by the supreme court of the State. It was then carried to the Supreme Court of the United States. The decision of the State court was affirmed in Solan v. Railroad Co. (169 U. S., 133). Thereafter the railroads, without further contest, responded for losses in Iowa to the full value, until the passage of the Carmack amendment and its interpretation by the Supreme Court in the Groninger case. Since then all contracts of shipment and bills of lading contain the limitation, and losses are paid on that basis.

The standard valuations, as stated in the railroad companies' printed bills of lading, which the shipper is virtually compelled to accept and sign, are much below the real values on live stock. Thus recovery on the western roads is practically limited to $100 for horses, $50 for cattle, $10 for calves, hogs, sheep, and goats. In most cases this is about one-half the real value.

HOW THE LAW WORKS AT PRESENT.

In order that Members of the House may understand just how the law operates I will give some specific instances:

A shipper desired to ship a carload of horses from Benton, Iowa, to Buffalo, N. Y. He was asked to sign a contract which contained, among others, the following provisions:

1. It is agreed, and the shipper hereby declares, that none of said animals exceeds in value the value given by the shipper, as above specified; and if no value is specified above said shipper hereby declares that none of said animals exceeds in value the value as given in paragraph 2 of this contract of animals of like kind.

2. The rates provided in the tariffs of the carrier and the rates given above are based upon the following values of animals named, to wit: Each horse, ass, or pony (gelding, mare, stallion, mule, jack, or jenny), $100; each colt (under 1 year), $50; each ox, bull, or steer, $50; each cow, $30; each hog or calf, $10; each sheep or goat, $3.

3. Where the value declared herein by the shipper exceeds the value given in paragraph 2 above an addition of 25 per cent to the rate will be made and collected for each 100 per cent or fraction thereof additional declared value per head.

4. In case of loss or damage of said animals, the carrier shall not be liable in excess of said agreed and declared valuation upon each animal lost or damaged, and in no case for any loss or damage incurred after delivery to any connecting carrier or when not on the line of the carrier. No connecting carrier shall be considered an agent of the carrier.

On this the carload rate was $145.90. The shipper demurred to the limitation to $100, saying he had paid over $200 each for the horses he proposed to ship, and asked for a rate based on $200 valuation. The agent was unable to give a rate on that valuation and referred the matter to the division freight agent. After several days' delay a letter was received from the division freight agent, in which he stated:

Beg to advise the rate of horses, carload, from Benton to Buffalo, when the valuation of each horse is $200 per head, on a car of 20 head, the animals being loaded in a common 36½-foot car, would be $763.55.

Of course this rate was prohibitive, and the shipper was compelled to send them at the $100 valuation.

In his testimony before the committee in the Senate hearings the representative of the railroads admitted the values "were determined upon many years ago—perhaps 25 years or more—and it is a fact that the average value of live stock has gradually increased since the time the values were established." But he said the railroads had determined they could not increase the valuations without increasing the rates. On examination he was forced to admit, however, that until February, 1913, the roads did respond in cases of loss or damage for the full amount, and did not increase their rates by reason of that fact. It clearly appears that the railroads make their standard of valuation low, because by this means they can reduce their liability almost one-half.

It was further admitted by the railroads in the hearings that the increase for a higher or actual valuation was not uniform. We have seen that by contract they increase it in some cases to 25 per cent on each 100 per cent additional value, while in practice it is increased to a much higher rate.

It further appears that while the standard valuation is supposed to be uniform, in fact it is not. It is seen that in Iowa the standard is $100 for horses, while in Illinois, at least in some instances, the valuation is $160.

A lawyer writes of this instance:

We have a client who lives in Sturgis, N. Dak. This last spring he shipped a carload of horses to Port Washington, Wis., through Omaha. They should have gone the direct route, but through the negligence of the railroad companies, particularly the North Western, they were diverted through South Omaha, delaying them about two days, and when they arrived at Port Washington they were terribly emaciated, tired, gaunt, and depreciated for market to the extent of some $20 to $30 per head, which undoubtedly, and I might say concededly, affected the sale to that amount.

The plaintiff sues the North Western, and now this defendant answers and relies upon the Carmack amendment as construed in the Groninger case, saying that your horses sold for $100 or more per head, and the bill of lading which you shipped them under expressly specifies that the value of the horses is not to exceed $100, which is printed on all bills of lading uniformly through this country and approved by the Interstate Commerce Commission, I understand. In other words, the railroad company concedes that he has been damaged to the extent of $1,000 or so, but that he is estopped to claim it on account of shipping his horses under the uniform bill of lading at the regular rate and not paying a higher rate for insurance. This rule meets us on every hand when a farmer or shipper asks for protection and remuneration for delayed shipments, and I believe it is not the spirit of the Carmack amendment and should be rectified.

A farmers' cooperative society in Iowa shipped a carload of hogs to Milwaukee. The hogs were destroyed by fire in transit. They cost $1,635.61. The railroad company only paid $730.80 at the $10 per head valuation. The farmers' loss on this carload was $904.81.

A shipper shipped a carload of hogs, 64 in number, from another point in Iowa to Chicago. They were destroyed in a collision. They were worth on the market $25 per head, or $1,600. He was compelled to settle with the railroad company for $640, or $10 per head. His loss on that one car was $960.

It is not alone as to live stock that these written limitations work injustice. A letter from a freight commissioner of a western city representing shippers gives instances of another character:

I do not think that live stock is at all the only traffic that is transported at so-called released rates, which have the effect of depriving the shipper of the right to recover for loss or damages while the property is in the carrier's hands. Examples: The western classification provides for certain charges if the propery is shipped released to a declared valuation limit of $10 per hundred pounds.

There is a great deal of household goods and emigrant movements being transported every day in every direction, so this is not a trivial matter.

A recent case was spoken of to me—so that my knowledge is to that extent hearsay, but I am convinced it is accurate—was a shipment from a point in Texas to Chicago, Ill. It appeared that the shipper had not signed the bill of lading releasing the property to the $10 per 100 pounds valuation. He had, however, asked to be named the freight rate, and the charge quoted was the figure that would have applied had the business been shipped subject to the released contract. When the property reached Chicago the owner was away from the city on business. A business associate, but without power of attorney, as a matter of neighborliness, when he found that the freight had come in and was charged very much greater than the figure that he had understood from the owner it was to bear, took the matter up with the railroad company and asked that the charge be reduced to the lower—the quoted—rate. This was done, and then the property was delivered, and not until then was it found by the unloaders that the car had been robbed of somewhere between nine hundred and one thousand dollars worth of property. The carrier, because of having collected the released rate, tendered settlement, according to my information, in a lump sum of about $40.

Another illustrative case was a shipment from some point in Pennsylvania to a point in Iowa some time ago. The car contained some hay, a buggy, and a typewriter, which the preacher-owner used in his work. This machine was boxed and the box screwed to the floor of the car as a matter of safeguarding it from damage by being slammed around in the car in the event of rough transportation. Here again the car was robbed, and it was the typewriter that was stolen. Payment is said to have been tendered at the rate of $10 per 100 pounds released valuation. The question which naturally arises is, if, instead of the typewriter being stolen, some of the hay had been stolen, would they have paid $10 per 100 for the stolen hay? We think not.

A representative of the Nebraska Stock Shippers' Association writes as follows:

As the law now stands the carrier is permitted to place an arbitrary valuation upon the commodity, this valuation having but little, if any, relation to the rate charged, but being made almost wholly for the purpose of limiting the carrier's liability to the lowest possible figure; and the increased rate exacted for an increased valuation is ridiculously out of proportion to the increased risk assumed. For instance, in ordinary live-stock shipping contracts steers are valued at from $30 to $50, these valuations being printed in advance on the contract, and an increase of 10 per cent is exacted for each 100 per cent increased valuation of the commodity, whereas you are probably aware that the average beef steer—especially the corn-fed Iowa variety—brings from $75 to $90, and in many cases more, on the market. It is a matter of common knowledge that the ratio of loss in transit is considerably less than 1 per cent of the value of the goods actually shipped. The increased rate charged for increase in valuation is wholly arbitrary. Again, an important factor in working injustice upon the shipper is the fact that only one rate is ordinarily quoted to him, that being the rate supposed to be based upon the very limited valuation above described, and unless he makes specific inquiry as to the other rates he is not advised of their existence and is given no real choice of contracts on conditions under which he may ship.

TIME LIMITATIONS.

The same principle of interpretation of the Carmack amendment has upheld as valid provisions in shipping contracts which prevent a recovery for any amount unless notice is given and suit commenced within a very limited time. It was stated by the representative of the railroads in the Senate hearings that "the notice of damage varies on different railways from 5 to 24 hours." In many instances the owner of the property might not know of his loss until after the time of giving notice had expired and his right of recovery be lost entirely. It can readily be seen how unjust such a provision is to the shipper and how exceedingly advantageous it is to the carrier. In the amendment I have prepared this is cured.

NECESSARY TO REWRITE CARMACK AMENDMENT.

Ever since the disastrous effects of the operation of the Carmack amendment have been realized efforts have been made to prevent the continuance of the imposition. I introduced a bill some time ago designed to cure the evil, and other bills are pending in the House. Bills were introduced also in the Senate, particularly three by Senator CUMMINS, of Iowa. On these the Senate committee had hearings, and finally reported out Senator CUMMINS's last bill with amendments. Yesterday this bill was considered by the Senate and passed. The amendment which I now propose is the Senate bill, which is now before us for action.

The bill as reported by the House committee and which we are now considering contains the Carmack amendment in exactly its original form and would continue the rule and application of that unfortunate act with all its iniquities. I confess I am surprised that the committee should give its approval to a law so generally discredited. Certainly none but the transportation companies which unjustly profit by it can now approve of the Carmack amendment. And yet it is made verbatim et literatim a part of this bill, and unless amended will be considered not as an approval of the provision as it was probably intended, but as an approval of the provision as it has been interpreted. Certainly this can not be the desire of the committee or the House.

Mr. ESCH. Is the bill which you have had read by way of an amendment a bill that has passed the Senate?

Mr. TOWNER. It is. There were several amendments to the original bill adopted by the Senate yesterday.

Mr. ESCH. But they were not incorporated in the bill as it was read at the desk?

Mr. TOWNER. Oh, yes; they are. My amendment is the bill as it came from the Senate. All the amendments that were adopted by the Senate are incorporated in the amendment which I present. It is, in fact, the official bill.

Mr. ADAMSON. Will the gentleman permit an interruption?

Mr. TOWNER. I will; certainly.

Mr. ADAMSON. Does the gentleman think that when we have under consideration an important bill of this sort we ought to stop and dismiss its consideration and have it acted upon ad captandum just because the Senate has passed it?

Mr. TOWNER. As the chairman of the committee puts it, I would say no; I do not. But the committee must have considered it, for they present it here as part of the bill which they ask us to pass. They say to the House, here is the Carmack amendment in its original form; we approve of it and ask you to reenact it into law. We must act on the matter, for it is before us, and I hope we shall be able to act wisely. If we do act wisely, we certainly will not reenact the Carmack amendment in its present form.

Mr. ADAMSON. I will say to the gentleman—I do not want to consume his time unnecessarily—that our committee has a bill just like that, and we have promised hearings on it and it will have consideration in the near future, and it is too serious a matter for us to permit it to go off in this slipshod manner here. And I do hope he will not insist on its going on here, but will allow it to take its course and allow our committee to make amendments that ought to be made.

Mr. TOWNER. Can the gentleman promise the House that action will be taken on the Senate bill by his committee at this session?

Mr. ADAMSON. If the Congress will stay here and a quorum will stay here, we can pass a bill. I promise this: that it is in the mill, and we are going to put it through as rapidly as circumstances will permit.

Mr. TOWNER. I do not question the good faith of the chairman of the committee. But I am afraid of delay, and I know the people interested will not justify us in defeating this necessary legislation; neither will they justify us in delaying it for more than a year, as is probable if the matter is not acted on now.

Mr. ADAMSON. If the gentleman will permit me, the country will much more likely applaud me for preventing inconsiderate action, than for going ahead hastily and permitting inconsiderate action.

Mr. TOWNER. I think there is no danger of inconsiderate action. It should be understood that I am not bringing this matter up for consideration. The committee brings it before us by asking us to reenact the Carmack amendment. This I am unwilling to do. I should think the gentleman, the committee, and the House would be unwilling so to do. It is not a new question. It has been under discussion for over a year at least. It has been considered by farmers' and stock growers' and shippers' associations all over the country. It is not a complicated proposition. The evil is well known, and the remedy is simple and at hand. There is no benefit to be derived from delay. It is not an unknown proposition, and it has been well considered.

Mr. STEVENS of Minnesota. Will the gentleman allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. TOWNER. Certainly.

Mr. STEVENS of Minnesota. Who has considered it?

Mr. TOWNER. Everybody interested has considered it.

Mr. STEVENS of Minnesota. Has this House considered it or has this committee considered it?

Mr. TOWNER. I understand your committee has considered it.

Mr. STEVENS of Minnesota. We have had no hearings upon it.

Mr. TOWNER. Your chairman has said that you have had hearings.

Mr. ADAMSON. I said hearings have been promised. We were asked to have them, and we are going to grant them.

Mr. STEVENS of Minnesota. Simply because the Senate happens to pass some bill, and the gentleman approves it, does he advocate our abdicating our functions? We have had no opportunity to legislate upon it in a practical way.

Mr. TOWNER. I would not have the House abdicate its functions. But this matter is here already. I did not bring it here. It is in this bill we are now considering. We are asked here and now to reenact the Carmack amendment in its original form, and I would prevent this if I could, for it is a bad piece of legislation and ought not to receive our approval.

Mr. MANN. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. TOWNER. Certainly.

Mr. MANN. Does the gentleman know how the Carmack amendment got into the law?

Mr. TOWNER. I do not know just what the gentleman means.

Mr. MANN. It was a Senate amendment to a House bill, and it was never considered in the House; and, while wisely considered by the Senate, when the courts construed it they took all the meaning out of it. Now, does the gentleman think that it is essential, because the Senate has passed another amendment on the same subject, that we should agree to that without consideration for fear the courts will take all the meaning out of that?

Mr. ADAMSON. If the gentleman will permit, I want to add to what the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] has said, that they did it in such a bungling manner that they put it in the wrong section, where it was not germane at all.

Mr. TOWNER. I am not asking that this legislation be adopted without consideration. I am asking that we now consider it. It is before us in the old, bad form. I do not want to again sanction it in that form. I want it corrected so that it will work good and not evil. I do not want the people of the country to understand that we are approving that which they have condemned. I do not want them to believe we are refusing them the relief they claim and which they should have. I believe it is our duty to place this law in the form which we can approve and not reenact legislation which we can not approve. That is what I understand to be my duty and what I believe to be the duty of the House.

Mr. RAYBURN. Mr. Chairman, I suppose that I am about as much interested, from a local standpoint, in the propositions contained in the thoughts of those who are urging the amendment to the Carmack amendment, or a substitute, as anyone on the floor of this House, because I think my State is a bigger shipper, especially of live stock, than any other State in the Union.

As was suggested here before, there are several bills pending on this subject before the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce. They have not been considered. I, myself, have a bill pending before the committee on that subject. The gentleman from Missouri [Mr. BORLAND] has a bill pending on that subject, and several others have bills. We had hoped within the next few days or weeks to take up this question and thoroughly consider it. We have, as the chairman has said, promised hearings.

In my State lives the attorney for the National Live Stock Association of this country. He has requested that he be heard. Men from Kansas City and from St. Louis have requested that they be heard upon this question. And, following out what the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] has said, and what the chairman of the committee [Mr. ADAMSON] has said, about this ill-considered legislation, it is true that this legislation in a general sense has been considered from one end of the country to the other, and all of the people, I think, want some legislation upon it; but are we to get up here and add an amendment to this bill, or a substitute for that part of the bill which is the original Carmack amendment, without consideration in committee? It may be that we will find ourselves, the first time this question is carried into the courts of the country, in the same shape that we are in at this time, with the law construed by the courts to mean almost nothing, to the detriment of the shippers from one end of the country to the other.

I sincerely trust that the House will give the committee the chance to perform its functions and allow the committee to give the promised hearings; and I hope that we may consider this bill in the light of all the hearings and all the information that comes to us, and give to the country, when we do present it, a well-considered piece of legislation.

Mr. Chairman, I ask for a vote.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that I may proceed for three minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the genteman from Iowa?

Mr. ADAMSON. I understood the gentleman wanted three minutes?

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Yes; three minutes.

Mr. ADAMSON. The gentleman is such a clever fellow I shall not object.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Mr. Chairman, without attempting to criticize the committee, it seems to me that if the committee was not able to do anything at this time with the Carmack amendment, it at least ought to be stricken out of this bill. Every day, every week, almost every hour, it is inflicting a wrong upon some shipper. Numerous cases come up where, by reason of unfair, improper, and wrongful exemptions and limitations, men are prevented from obtaining the amount they ought to recover when their shipments are damaged or lost, or are entirely prohibited from obtaining anything whatever under the provisions of this Carmack amendment. If we can not do anything in the way of amending it, it seems to me the committee ought to have stricken it out entirely.

Mr. ADAMSON. Mr. Chairman, I ask for a vote. We ought to have time to consider that also.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The question was taken, and the Chairman announced that the noes seemed to have it.

Mr. TOWNER. Mr. Chairman, I ask for a division.

The CHAIRMAN. A division is demanded.

The committee divided; and there were—ayes 20, noes 50.

So the amendment was rejected.

Mr. HARRISON. Mr. Chairman, I desire to offer an amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Mississippi offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 14, line 23, after the word "proceeding," strike out the period and insert the following:

"Provided, Any such representations made to the Interstate Commerce Commission by any such railroad commission, public-utilities commission, or other appropriate authority of any State relating to any railroad chartered by such State and wholly within such State, shall be conclusive on the Interstate Commerce Commission in rendering its decision."

Mr. HARRISON. Mr. Chairman, I am not prone to offer amendments to bills reported out of committees after they have been considered by those committees, because I know that the committees of this House always give to every proposition coming before them the deliberation and consideration that they deserve; and while the purposes of this bill are excellent, and much good will come from its operation, it strikes me that the bill goes too far in interfering with the railroad and public-service commissions of the various States.

I voted for the Garner amendment; I voted for the Bartlett amendment; and I voted for the Hardy amendment, because I believe that where a railroad is wholly within a State the State, through its delegated authorities, ought to have the right to control and regulate it.

Evidently this committee in considering this question, by giving to the various States the right to come before the Interstate Commerce Commission and present their views, believed that those views would be along progressive lines and would be in the interest of the people that the public-service commissions represented. I state that fact because in your bill you say that before the issuance of the bonds or stocks the railroad or public-service commissions of the various States affected may appear before the Interstate Commerce Commission and present their views to that commission. Here is the language of your bill along that line:

The railroad commission, public service or utilities commission, or other appropriate State authority thus notified shall have the right to present before the commission such representations as they may deem just and proper for preserving and conserving the right and interests of their people and the States, respectively, as involved in such proceeding.

Why did you insert that in the bill? Because you did not want to override the wishes of the people of the various States, and you believed that the railroad and public service and utilities commissions of the various States knew best what their people wanted with respect to railroads. And why should they not? They are in practically all the States elected by the people. The Interstate Commerce Commission is far removed from the people and appointed by the President. Now, this amendment only changes the bill in so far that where a railroad is wholly within a State and chartered by that State, and when the duly authorized representatives of that State appear before the Interstate Commerce Commission and present their views to the commission as to what they deem best in the interest of the people of their State concerning their rights and interests, that their opinion shall be conclusive on the Interstate Commerce Commission.

The amendment goes no further than that. If a railroad is of an interstate-commerce character, then their views may be presented to the Interstate Commerce Commission, but shall not be conclusive upon the Interstate Commerce Commission in its findings. I submit to the gentlemen of this committee that drafted this bill, the Democratic members of which, at least, have always professed that the States ought to have certain rights, especially in the matter of the regulation of railroads and in the matter of saying what their railroad and public service and utilities commissions shall do and shall not do, that you should accept this amendment, which is not radical in form, but, in a conservative way, retains to the States those rights which they now have and ought to have.

Mr. MOORE. Mr. Chairman, I rise to oppose the amendment. Yesterday afternoon until nearly 6 o'clock we were discussing a bill known as the Rayburn bill "to amend section 20 of an act to regulate commerce," which bill provided for a complete reregulation and resupervision of all the common carriers of the United States, affecting their billions of capital and their hundreds of thousands of employees. The Rayburn bill, which is the last of the three antitrust bills which Congress must pass to please the President, was given long consideration by the 21 gentlemen who constitute the personnel of the Interstate and Foreign Commerce Committee, headed by the distinguished gentleman from Georgia [Mr. ADAMSON]. This morning, shortly after the House met, we were called upon to discard the carefully prepared and tremendously important Rayburn bill, and without any dicussion of a general nature to proceed at once to the consideration of a substitute for the entire bill, which substitute was scarcely dry from the printer's press. Thus the great deliberative body of the American people is expected to pass upon and settle the railroad problem of the Nation. If we succeed in doing it, it will be the greatest demonstration of confidence in the few leaders of the Interstate and Foreign Commerce Committee that has been witnessed in recent years, and it will demonstrate how easily the judgment of 100,000,000 people may be expressed by a few men in a few hours.

Mr. RAYBURN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MOORE. I can not yield in five minutes. Let me finish my remarks. Personally, I do not believe the country is going to be satisfied with this railroad bill, nor with the two other bills that Congress has been forced to consider under a special rule. There is ample evidence that much of the unrest which now prevails in business circles throughout the country is due to excessive legislative tinkering, in pretended compliance with the declarations of hazy political platforms.

In the five minutes I am able to obtain under the rules I hope briefly to make plain my reasons for voting against these three administration antitrust bills. The least objectionable of them all, perhaps, is the Covington or trade-commission bill, which carries over to a commission the machinery of the Bureau of Corporations and takes that bureau away from Executive domination. This bill, however, increases the power to investigate and inquire into and disturb the affairs of large and small industrial corporations and makes it almost impossible for a small business concern to comply with its drastic provisions. The larger concerns, like the Steel Corporation or the Harvester Trust, can better afford to do business under this bill than any of their smaller competitors. They have the money and the facilities in better array than independent business men, whose money and facilities under undue pressure would be the sooner exhausted. In passing such legislation we are not serving the people generally, because if we make investigation and supervision onerous to the independent business man, we promote monopoly and throttle competition.

Second. The antitrust bill, now known as the Webb bill, is an exceedingly objectionable measure, and has the earmarks of a sop to certain classes of our citizens who have a great voting power. It is so radical in terms, however, as to suggest the substitution of some other for our present form of government, which assumes to protect the rights of men and property. This bill makes it a crime for an industrious man to seek a market for his own products if he holds that market against the faker or the counterfeiter of commodities. It opens the way for the fraud to avail himself of the avenues of trade established by honest merchants and manufacturers. It establishes the dubious principle that a man can not own certain kinds of property if some one else wants it. It places a certain class of men in favor before the law as against a larger body of men who are not so favored. It minimizes the influence of the courts and compels certain men who are aggrieved and who fear the loss of life or property to make their appeal to those who, in some cases, might use their power to oppress them, rather than to the courts.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. MOORE. I ask unanimous consent to proceed for two minutes more.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Pennsylvania asks unanimous consent to proceed for two minutes. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. MOORE. Lawyers may differ as to what this bill means, but the spirit, if not the letter of it, proposes class legislation, in open defiance of the equality of the rights of man as stated in the Declaration of Independence. The spirit of this bill, so far as the exemption of farmers' organizations is concerned, is intended to convey to the farmer the impression that certain kinds of combinations to raise and fix the price of food supplies may be permitted, in defiance of persistent Democratic promises to reduce the cost of living to the consumer. The American doctrine of an equality of rights for all men before the law may be sadly shattered if this bill is passed.

Third. The Rayburn bill—few of us have had time to analyze the substitute upon which we are now acting—is objectionable, because, in attempting to further regulate the alleged mismanagement of railroads, it is subject to the same fault that underlies all this legislation born of hysteria. It punishes the innocent railroad managers and common carriers as well as the guilty, and, because the innocent far outnumber the guilty, does more harm than good. Furthermore, the bill is a curb upon new railroad construction, since it practically estops any new enterprise of an interstate character that requires money in its incipiency before the common carrying begins.

I shall vote against all these bills, because their tendency will be not to quiet the public mind, but to further disturb the business of the country. If these bills are passed, they may increase the number of big and little agitators, learned in the law and otherwise, who have fattened upon recent investigations; they may add to the large number of specialists, detectives, muckrakers, and others of the supereducated brood who have no useful occupations; but they will be more likely to vastly increase the nonemployment and depression of active, honest, and industrious men, who constitute the great mass of our people and who are the backbone of legitimate industry and enterprise. [Applause.]

Mr. CULLOP. Mr. Chairman, I will say to the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. HARRISON] in regard to this provision of the bill which he is attempting to amend, that it is exactly in the language that the utility commissions, public-service commissions, and railroad commissions of the different States desire. Last October——

Mr. HARRISON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CULLOP. Let me get through with this statement. Last October they had a national meeting here in the city of Washington, which unanimously passed a resolution requiring this provision to be put in this bill exactly as it is reported by the committee. Not only that, but a number of the commissions of the different States have written to the chairman of the Interstate and Foreign Commerce Committee, requesting that this provision be put into this bill in the exact language in which it is in the bill.

Mr. ADAMSON. It is just as they wanted it.

Mr. CULLOP. Just as they wanted it. Now, one thing about the amendment of the gentleman from Mississippi: He is trying to get inserted into this bill a provision that will emasculate the power which this bill confers for the regulation of the transportation companies of this country. The very provision that he is seeking to get adopted here would, if adopted, destroy the great benefits which will flow from this legislation. The gentleman, by offering his amendment, is opposing the consensus of opinion of the public-service commissions of the different States.

Mr. HARRISON. Will the gentleman yield now?

Mr. CULLOP. Yes.

Mr. HARRISON. The gentleman has made that statement. How many State railroad commissions or public-service commissions will the gentleman state have expressed themselves as favoring this provision?

Mr. CULLOP. Nearly every State in the Union that has a public-service law, a railroad-commission law, or a public-utility law was represented in that convention by one or more members.

Now, further than that, if the gentleman will take the pains to read the examination of Commissioner Clements, set out in the hearings—one of the ablest and most experienced members of the Interstate Commerce Commission—he will find that this provision is exactly as Commissioner Clements requested it to be. If the provision offered by the gentleman from Mississippi was adopted, it would do just what Commissioner Clements said—destroy the uniformity of the workings of this bill, because different States would adopt different rules and different methods of procedure and would eliminate the great vitality that is contained in this measure.

Now, let me say to the gentleman from Mississippi again, who is a supporter of the doctrine that he thinks this bill is infringing upon, but it is not as he thinks, that if his amendment should be adopted it would strike this bill the most deadly blow that could be dealt it. He would exempt from the provisions of this bill the terminal railroad systems of every great city in the United States, and instead of rendering a benefit to his constituents he would be imposing a hardship, by continuing the exploitation of these monopolies upon his constituents and the people of the United States. This amendment, if adopted, would destroy the purposes of this measure and enable the continuance of the present deplorable conditions, which have made every investor in railroad securities suspicious, because of the disgraceful exposures recently made in the manipulation of stocks and bonds. This measure is directed at all such operations, and if adopted as presented here by the committee will furnish the means for prohibiting their repetition. The honest investor needs the protection, the public requires it, and the best interests of the country demand it.

Railroad stocks and bonds ought to furnish a safe investment and one in which the public should have confidence. There is no good reason why, if honestly managed and intelligently handled, they should not be considered a safe investment, subject to little fluctuation, and they would be so if it were not for the dishonest manipulation of them by the controlling officials in charge of their corporate affairs.

The development of certain conduct recently in the management of the affairs of some of the best properties have caused the public to lose confidence in this class of securities. This measure, if adopted as reported to the House, will prevent a recurrence of these outrages upon innocent investors and restore public confidence, and give them in the markets of the country a stable value and make desirable investments. I hope the amendment of the gentleman from Mississippi will be voted down.

Mr. ADAMSON. Mr. Chairman, I ask for a vote.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. HARRISON].

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. HARRISON) there were 2 ayes and 49 noes.

So the amendment was rejected.

Mr. ADAMSON. Mr. Chairman, I would like to ask the gentleman now if we can not agree to some limitation of time for debate on the substitute and amendments?

Mr. CRAMTON. I have several amendments I want to offer.

Mr. LENROOT. I have an amendment I would like to discuss.

Mr. ADAMSON. How much more time do gentlemen on that side want?

Mr. STEVENS of Minnesota. The gentleman from Michigan has four amendments, and if they could be presented in order he would discuss them all together.

Mr. MANN. We would like 40 minutes on this side.

Mr. ADAMSON. Can not the gentleman get along with less?

Mr. MANN. If we can, we will. We are as anxious to get through as is the gentleman from Georgia.

Mr. ADAMSON. Suppose we say that debate shall not exceed one hour? That will give 30 minutes on a side.

Mr. MANN. If the gentleman will give us 40 minutes, I do not care how little time he takes.

Mr. ADAMSON. All right, we will say an hour. I ask unanimous consent that all debate on this substitute and amendments thereto be closed in 1 hour, 40 minutes to be controlled by the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. STEVENS] and 20 minutes by myself.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Georgia asks unanimous consent that all debate on the substitute and amendments thereto be closed in 1 hour, 40 minutes to be controlled by the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. STEVENS] and 20 minutes by himself. Is there objection?

Mr. LENROOT. Reserving the right to object, will not the gentleman include in that the request that the amendments be voted upon at the conclusion of the debate in the order presented?

Mr. MANN. The hour is for debate. The amendments will be voted upon as they are offered.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair hears no objection, and it is so ordered.

Mr. CULLOP. Mr. Chairman, I was going to ask if all the amendments could not be submitted and read and be pending, so that we would know just what the amendments were presented for consideration.

Mr. MANN. They would have to be reread each time.

Mr. CULLOP. Then, that would not conserve any time, and I will not ask it.

Mr. STEVENS of Minnesota. Mr. Chairman, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. CRAMTON].

Mr. CRAMTON. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amend, by inserting in line 26, page 15, after the words "twenty A," the following: "or any application of the proceedings thereof otherwise than for the purpose authorized by the commission in its approval of the issue thereof."

Mr. CRAMTON. Mr. Chairman, I offer this amendment in the hope that the committee may concede its value. I take it that the committee desires not only to legislate but to provide penalties that will make the legislation efficient. This amendment is designed to provide a penalty in case a corporation comes in and secures approval of the issue of securities for a certain purpose and then applies that issue to some other purpose. Under the provisions of the bill, when they come before the commission asking an approval of an issue of securities, they must state the purpose for which they propose to use it. The commission gives consideration to that fact, and having given consideration and found that it is a desirable purpose, they can approve the issue. Thereafter the officers of the carrier are compelled under this bill to report for what purpose they have used the money, but, as a matter of fact, there is no penalty provided in the bill to cover a case where they secure the issue for one purpose and use it for another, as, for instance, in case they should secure the money for an extension of the line and use it for building a terminal, or for refunding.

In the State of Michigan within the last two or three years a certain railroad company made application for an issue of $8,000,000 new securities. The commission granted the application with the express understanding that five and one-half millions should be used for refunding and two and one-half millions for certain betterments on the system. The company not only made false returns, but when the truth was finally ascertained it was discovered that instead of using two and one-half million dollars for betterments they had not used anywhere near that amount, but had broken faith with the commission. The money was spent, the securities were issued, they were in the hands of innocent purchasers, and there was no remedy. At any rate, you ought to have in this bill a penalty to cover cases where they break faith with the commission. In the best of faith I ask the committee to give that amendment consideration.

Mr. RAYBURN. Mr. Chairman, no one on this side wants to be heard, and I will ask for a vote.

Mr. CRAMTON. If the gentleman will pardon me, I will restate my amendment. In this paragraph, at the bottom of page 15, you have provided for certain penalties, for the issue of securities contrary to the provisions of the section, and that the issue thereof may be enjoined, and also that any director or officer who assents to or agrees to any issue of securities forbidden by this section shall be subject to a penalty. I only propose to add a provision that any director or officer who should assent to or agree to any application of the proceeds of any issue otherwise than for the purpose authorized by the commission in its approval of the issue, and so forth.

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. FOSTER). The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Michigan.

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. CRAMTON) there were—ayes 30, nays 53.

So the amendment was rejected.

Mr. CRAMTON. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amend by inserting in line 15, on page 14, after the word "notice," the following: "of said application and of all hearings thereon."

Mr. CRAMTON. Mr. Chairman, my purpose in offering this amendment is to perfect the bill. The committee provide in that for notice to the different State commissions, but there is no statement as to what the notice shall cover. I simply specify that the notice shall cover the application and all hearings thereon.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Michigan.

The amendment was rejected.

Mr. CRAMTON. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment, which I send to the desk and ask to have read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amend by inserting in line 7, on page 11, after the word "amended," the following "the valuation of which shall have been fixed by the Interstate Commerce Commission."

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Minnesota yield more time to the gentleman from Michigan?

Mr. STEVENS of Minnesota. Mr. Chairman, I yield five minutes more to the gentlemen from Michigan.

Mr. CRAMTON. Mr. Chairman, this amendment I do not offer with the same hope of adoption as in the previous cases, but to my mind it embraces the most important phase of this problem, and it has not been discussed heretofore in this debate. It is my judgment that this bill proposing to regulate the issuance of securities of railroad carriers is either 25 years too late or 5 years too soon. You are putting the cart before the horse. Regardless of what may be our views here as to whether the capitalization of carriers is to be considered in connection with the fixing of railroad rates, that is the settled policy of this Government.

We have already authorized and the commission is now engaged in a valuation of all of the railroad properties of the United States. For what purpose? As a matter of idle curiosity or in order to give the commission something to do? Absolutely no. Simply because we have come to realize that if we are ever going to really and effectively regulate freight rates in this country the commission which regulates them must have before them some standard of valuation for the properties in order to do it intelligently. And now, before that valuation is completed, we are apparently going to take a step which should not precede that valuation, but should follow it. Otherwise you run the risk of bringing about complications attending the capitalization of these corporations, which will make it at least difficult, if not impossible, to regulate them according to their valuation after you shall have secured the valuation. As a matter of practical working, we know this, that when a question of fixing a certain rate comes before the commission——

Mr. DECKER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CRAMTON. My time is too limited. As a matter of practical proof, when a complaint is made to the commission involving a certain rate, the railroad company comes in and says that it must have enough money out of the earnings from their rates on freight and passengers to permit them to pay interest on their liabilities and dividends upon their stock. That is the railroad position; and just as soon as the commission reduces the rates sufficiently to prevent the railroad from doing that thing, then there comes trouble in that corporation, and if the rate is sustained and continued at a figure which is too low to enable them to pay that interest and dividend, then there must be a reorganization of that corporation and some of that watered stock must be squeezed out. Anyone who heard the able discussion of the stock watering of the different railroads of the country as presented by the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. ESCH] on yesterday must realize that stock watering is not an isolated thing at all.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Michigan has expired.

Mr. STEVENS of Minnesota. Mr. Chairman, I yield five minutes more to the gentleman.

Mr. CRAMTON. Mr. Chairman, that is not an isolated case here and there, but it is apparently an ordinary practice wherever the banking interests have gotten into the railroad business. That means that there are quantities of railroad stocks and securities in this country that do not represent value. If you allow the law to remain as it is until we have completed our valuation and then have the Interstate Commerce Commission pass upon applications, with the knowledge of the value of the railroad property before them, they can act intelligently, and they can prevent any issue that is going to exceed the fair valuation of the property, and the Supreme Court has already pointed out the fair value of the property as the basis for rate regulation.

Mr. WILLIS. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CRAMTON. Briefly.

Mr. WILLIS. I simply want to ask the gentleman to again state his amendment in substance. There was so much noise that I did not hear it.

Mr. CRAMTON. It is to prevent the application of this law to any railroad until it shall have been valued by the Interstate Commerce Commission. If under the present law this question of rate regulation comes up, then stocks and bonds that have been issued must take their chances. But suppose under this law the Interstate Commerce Commission authorizes a further issuance of liabilities which in themselves may be necessary and legitimate? In order thereafter that the commission shall hold good and protect the securities which it itself has authorized and in a way approved, then it would have to protect likewise millions and millions of stock or securities previously issued. For instance, take a corporation with a valuation really of $50,000,000 and securities outstanding to the amount of $100,000,000.

If that carrier corporation should go before the commission under this act and ask for an expenditure of $10,000,000 for needed betterments, thereafter that $10,000,000, the last issued, would be the first to suffer in case the rates of that company were reduced to a point that did not permit it to pay interest and dividends on $110,000,000. We are putting the cart before the horse. Let the valuation of the roads first be determined; then we can logically regulate their issues of securities. In this amendment I am simply asking to insert the language I have proposed so that it will read:

That from and after the passage hereof it shall be unlawful for any common carrier subject to the act to regulate commerce, as amended, the valuation of which shall have been fixed by the Interstate Commerce Commission, to issue any capital stock—

And so forth.

I present the amendment and ask for its adoption, and yield back the remainder of my time.

Mr. ADAMSON. Mr. Chairman, I ask for a vote.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Michigan.

The amendment was rejected.

Mr. STEVENS of Minnesota. Mr. Chairman, I yield two minutes more to the gentleman from Michigan.

Mr. CRAMTON. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment, which I send to the desk and ask to have read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amend, by inserting at the end of the paragraph, in line 26 of page 14, the following:

"Such application shall not be approved in any case where an increase in the securities of the carrier is proposed, unless the valuation of said carrier as considered for purposes of rate regulation will not be exceeded by the increased total securities of such carrier."

Mr. CRAMTON. Mr. Chairman, I will not unduly take the time of the committee further than to call attention to the purpose of this amendment, which is similar to that just offered, and which, I am sorry to say, was not accepted.

This amendment would provide that when an application is made to the commission for approval of certain securities the commission shall not approve of such issuance if it appears to the commission that with such issuance the liabilities of the carrier corporation would be greater than the assets of the corporation. I submit that unless that policy is followed the Government is going to approve of the issuance of unsound securities.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is upon the amendment offered by the gentleman from Michigan.

The question was taken, and the amendment was rejected.

Mr. STEVENS of Minnesota. Mr. Chairman, I yield two minutes to the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. LINDBERGH].

Mr. LINDBERGH. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Minnesota offers the following amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amend by striking out the period in line 3, on page 15, and insert a comma, and add the following words: "and no act of the commission shall estop the United States from showing the actual value of any property, bonds, or stocks involved in any proceeding in which the United States shall become a party, nor shall the value fixed by the commission upon any property, bonds, or stocks in accordance with the provisions of this act be prima facie evidence of their value in any proceeding of condemnation or other proceeding in which a State or the United States shall be a party."

Mr. LINDBERGH. Mr. Chairman, the amendment I offer is self-explanatory and does not require any discussion to understand its meaning, and I therefore would ask for a vote.

Mr. RAYBURN. The amendment needs no explanation. The committee thinks it is hardly necessary, and I ask for a vote.

The question was taken, and the amendment was rejected.

Mr. STEVENS of Minnesota. I yield three minutes to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. THOMSON].

Mr. THOMSON of Illinois. Mr. Chairman, I would like to ask the chairman of the committee, if I may, the meaning of the last sentence in this bill. One would suppose after the divers and sundry editions we have had of this bill that when we got the last one, the sentences would at least mean something. I would take it from the reading of that sentence that it is proposed that a violation of the provisions of this paragraph, upon conviction, was to be punished.

Mr. MANN. That is what it says.

Mr. THOMSON of Illinois. Does not the committee feel that the punishment ought to be meted out to some person who was convicted of such violation?

Mr. ADAMSON. That is what it says.

Mr. THOMSON of Illinois. It does not say so.

Mr. RAYBURN. It says "shall be fined and imprisoned not exceeding three years in the discretion of the court."

Mr. THOMSON of Illinois. Then it proposes a fine or imprisonment of the violation.

Mr. ADAMSON. It would not be a violation unless some person violated it.

Mr. RAYBURN. It hardly could be a violation without a violator.

Mr. THOMSON of Illinois. The sentence says:

Any violation of these provisions shall be a misdemeanor, and on conviction in any United States court having jurisdiction shall be punished by a fine not exceeding $10,000 or imprisonment for a term not exceeding three years, or by both such fine and imprisonment, in the discretion of the court.

Is the violation to be fined or imprisoned? Is that what the committee meant?

Mr. RAYBURN. I think it is the usual language.

Mr. THOMSON of Illinois. Very well; I just wanted to know how the committee proposed to punish the violation—whether they really proposed putting the violation in jail.

Mr. ADAMSON. What we tried to do was to punish crime when we find the crime.

Mr. THOMSON of Illinois. The committee apparently has not bothered about the criminal. Why not punish him?

Mr. ADAMSON. Crime is punishable.

Mr. THOMSON of Illinois. I have not offered an amendment, as I realize from the experience of other Members of the House that no amendment has any hope of success unless it comes from the committee or that side of the House, but I thought I would at least call the attention of the committee to this.

Mr. ADAMSON. I congratulate the gentleman on having made a brilliant and witty speech instead of failing with a foolish amendment. [Laughter.]

Mr. STEVENS of Minnesota. Was the amendment of the gentleman from Illinois disposed of?

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman did not offer an amendment.

Mr. STEVENS of Minnesota. I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. LENROOT].

Mr. LENROOT. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Wisconsin offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amend, by adding at the end of line 3, page 15, the following as a new paragraph:

"Any issue or disposition of securities contrary to the terms and conditions stated in the application of the carrier and approved by the commission shall be unlawful."

Mr. LENROOT. Mr. Chairman, if I may have the attention of the committee——

Mr. ADAMSON. Mr. Chairman, I did not hear the amendment; my attention was distracted otherwise.

Mr. LENROOT. Mr. Chairman, I ask that the amendment be again reported.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, the amendment will be again reported.

There was no objection, and the amendment was again reported.

Mr. LENROOT. Mr. Chairman, notwithstanding what the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. THOMSON] has said, and the fate of prior amendments which have been offered, I sincerely trust that the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce will accept this amendment, for, in my judgment, if this bill, or this section, too, is to amount to anything more than a mere publicity agency, the adoption of this amendment is absolutely necessary.

Now, Mr. Chairman, four years ago this entire question of stock watering was discussed upon the floor of this House, but upon quite a different theory then than is presented now. At that time the foundation of the regulation of the issuance of stocks and bonds was the value of the property. Since that time we have provided for the valuation of railway property, and we all now see to make that the basis and to attempt to apply it at this time would mean that there could be no issue of railway securities for perhaps two or three years to come, so the committee, I think, has very wisely taken the position that they will not attempt to limit the issue of stocks and bonds based upon value of the property, but will only attempt to see that in future issues that there shall be value returned to the carrier and that the proceeds shall be used by it in the public interest, but unless my amendment be adopted, Mr. Chairman, I insist that the result is not accomplished. The approval of the commission required is that the issue is reasonably necessary or proper for the purposes stated.

No power is given the commission to prescribe the terms or conditions of the sale of the issue. No power is given the commission to see that the proceeds are actually used for the purpose for which the issue is made. There is no penalty prescribed in the bill for any misstatement or false statement made in the application of the carriers. The moment this issue is approved by the commission they may go and sell their securities for 25 cents on the dollar or 50 cents on the dollar, so far as this bill is concerned; they may violate every provision that is made in their application to the commission and upon which the commission has given their approval, and yet there is not one word in the bill that would either punish them for it or permit an injunction against them for it, or provide any relief whatever to the public.

So outside of the mere fact of publicity, as the bill now stands, instead of a bill that will tend to prevent stock watering in the future it might be a medium for any unscrupulous railroad financiers to use as a means for defrauding and deceiving the public. And so, Mr. Chairman, I feel certain that upon mature consideration the committee will see that it is necessary, if this bill is to accomplish what its authors intend, that any issue of stocks and bonds in violation or contrary to the terms and conditions stated in the application and approved by the commission shall be unlawful.

The last paragraph of the bill provides for punishment for the directors and officers for issuing securities in violation of the law, and on page 15 all issues of securities contrary to the provisions of the section may be enjoined; but I will ask the chairman when he concludes to point out a sentence in this bill that makes an issue of securities sold at a price different than that stated in the application contrary to the terms of this bill. I ask him to state what there is in the bill that will prevent a railroad company, after making application, after securing the approval of the Interstate Commerce Commission, from making any terms whatever, if they choose, with respect to it?

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Wisconsin has expired.

Mr. STEVENS of Minnesota. Mr. Chairman, I yield to the gentleman one minute more.

Mr. LENROOT. I ask the chairman to state, if they should not accept this amendment, what there is in this bill to prevent, after the approval by the Interstate Commerce Commission, the railroad company from selling those securities, those approved by the commission, at any price they choose? There is nothing in the bill as it stands now that permits the commission to fix the price. There is nothing in the bill now that permits the commission to fix the terms. But if my amendment be adopted, they may require all those things to be stated in the application, and then, when they finally approve the application, my amendment will make it unlawful to issue securities contrary to the application made by the carrier and approved by the commission. I sincerely hope my amendment will be accepted.

Mr. ADAMSON. Mr. Chairman, the words of the eloquent gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. LENROOT] are music in my ear. They are more musical than they commonly are, although his cadences are always musical to me. Sometimes he is logical, but music is not always logical nor reasonable. Among other things which I oppose is tautology. There is no use of loading a bill down with repetition of the English language. The reason, however, that his language is musical to me is that I have been the victim of rolling billows of execration, mountain high, from people who imagine that this bill is too drastic. He comes in and pours balm on my wounded soul and soothes my feelings by saying it is not drastic enough, and that there ought to be more pains and penalties, and more folks in jail. We have taken care, Mr. Chairman, to safeguard everything which it is necessary to safeguard. We have protected by writ of injunction and by criminal punishment any deviation from the course pointed out in the provisions of this bill. And I ask for a vote.

Mr. LENROOT. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ADAMSON. Yes.

Mr. LENROOT. I would like to ask the gentleman where an injunction will lie to prevent stock watering at all under the terms of the bill as it stands?

Mr. ADAMSON. It is expressly provided that injunction will lie against any violation of the plan laid down in this bill, and it is also expressly provided that there may be criminal punishment.

Mr. LENROOT. Will the gentleman yield for one more question? Will the gentleman point out any provision whatever in the bill that forbids in itself stock watering?

Mr. ADAMSON. It is certainly in here, plain and palpable. I do not admit that we have to put all the language in the bill the gentleman may imagine is necessary. There may be a great many things done without using all the extravagant ideas various gentlemen may wish to put in the bill. I say that this bill does safeguard the interests we seek to safeguard by the bill. I ask for a vote, Mr. Chairman.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. LENROOT].

The question was taken, and the Chairman announced that the noes seemed to have it.

Mr. LENROOT. Division, Mr. Chairman.

The committee divided; and there were—ayes 31, noes 57.

So the amendment was rejected.

Mr. MANN. Let us rise now.

Mr. ADAMSON. I would like to use a little time. I have not used all my time, and would like to use five minutes. I wish to yield that much to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. RAINEY].

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. RAINEY] is recognized for five minutes.

Mr. RAINEY. Mr. Chairman, I desire to offer an amendment at this time, which I am aware is not germane to this bill. At the conclusion of the five minutes allotted to me I shall withdraw the amendment, when I have called attention to the evils mentioned in it. I now send it to the Clerk's desk.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amend the substitute by adding a new paragraph to be known as section 20b, as follows:

"SEC. 20b. That the commission is hereby authorized to require the owners of all railroads engaged in interstate commerce as defined in this act to equip all crossings along the line of said railroads, where public highways cross the right of way of said railroads at grade, with gates which will close automatically when a train approaches and passes said crossing, or with electric bells which will ring continuously when a train is within one-half mile of said crossing. Said commission is authorized to require either or both of said devices at said crossings in the discretion of the commission, said devices to be such as meet with the approval of said commission, or said commission may require that the owners of said railroads shall station a flagman at any of said crossings, in which event said electric bells or automatic gates may, in the discretion of the commission, be not required at said crossings where said flagman is stationed. The owners of said railroads shall equip all such crossings as required in this section prior to January 1, 1915: Provided, That the commission, in its discretion, may make such reasonable extensions of the time to so equip said crossings as may to it seem advisable, and if the owners of any railroads subject to the provisions of this act shall fail to equip any grade crossing or crossings as provided in this section within the time specified, or within the time extended by the commission for so equipping the same, such owners shall forfeit to the United States the sum of $100 for each and every day they shall continue to be in default with respect to each of such crossings as shall not be so equipped."

Mr. ADAMSON. Mr. Chairman, I wish to claim the benefit of the gentleman's admission that it is not in order. I reserve it.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Georgia make a point of order?

Mr. ADAMSON. I reserve the point of order.

Mr. RAINEY. Mr. Chairman, while this amendment may not be germane to the bill we are considering, I am satisfied that legislation of this character is proper and ought to be considered by the Congress and adopted. The act that we are amending here—the act to regulate commerce—provides for regulation of switch connections, of water competition, for continuous carriage of freight, for continuous billing on through routes. Congress in other acts has already provided for safety appliances for trains engaged in interstate commerce. We have protected the lives of the men who operate the trains, which are the medium through which interstate commerce is transacted, but we have made no provision for protection so far for the lives of the people in the several States who are killed at these grade crossings by trains engaged in interstate commerce.

I have a compilation here, which I will not read, but I will print it as a part of my remarks, which I have made from the files of a single paper published in the United States for the month of May of this year of these grade-crossing accidents; and this compilation, made from the Chicago Daily Farmers and Drovers' Journal, a great newspaper published in the Middle West, shows that during the month of May, at grade crossings in the United States, 31 members of farmers' families were killed and 23 members of farmers' families were either fatally injured or maimed for life.

Now, these are all farmers and their families, nearly all of them riding in automobiles, except perhaps in one or two instances. If the fatalities in May at these grade crossings are a fair average for all the months of the year, then during the 12 months of the year at these grade crossings 648 members of farmers' families in the United States will be killed or maimed for life.

Trains move faster than they did a quarter of a century ago. Farmers are investing in automobiles. Country roads are better. Vehicles move faster over country roads. Automatic brakes, compressed-air brakes, improved roadbeds, improved methods of laying tracks, all have decreased the amount of noise that an approaching train makes; and trains move faster than they ever did before. The old methods of protecting grade crossings by requiring signs to be placed there reading, "Look out for the cars," "Stop, look, and listen," and all that sort of thing belong to that period when the country was not so thickly populated as now—when men traveled slowly over the country in prairie schooners and in oxcarts.

With but slight expense—only a few dollars—the crossings on these roads engaged in interstate commerce—and they are almost all engaged now, under the decisions, in interstate commerce—there can be installed a bell that rings at these grade crossings when a train is within half a mile of the crossing either way, and that would save the lives of hundreds of members of farmers' families every year.

I will print here the memoranda I have prepared of grade-crossing accidents for May:

GRADE-CROSSING ACCIDENTS IN MONTH OF MAY, 1914.

May 3, 1914. Two Hoffman children killed, grade crossing, Glenview, Ill. Mother, with skull fractured, in hospital.

May, 1914. Farmer Johnson, son, wife, and baby daughter killed at grade crossing, Merrill, Iowa. At same crossing a funeral carriage was run down and three persons killed prior to that time.

May 14, 1914. Absolom Meyers and wife killed at grade crossing, Olathe, Kans., going to church. Nine children survive.

May 15, 1914. Two farmers and farm woman killed, grade crossing, Kaufman, Ill., by Toledo, St. Louis & Western train, riding in automobile—John Stuckwissch and wife and Oscar Maurer.

May 17, 1914. R. E. Davis, son, Claude, and brother-in-law, J. C. Schaeffer, killed, grade crossing, Fort Benjamin Harrison, Ind. Four other members of family probably fatally injured. Automobile. Killed by Union Traction car.

May 19, 1914. Five persons narrowly escape death, Brookfield, Mo., when Burlington passenger train collided with car driven by Hugh Green.

May 20, 1914. Five persons killed when Sciota Valley Traction car struck automobile at grade crossing near Ashville, Ohio.

May 20, 1914. One man killed, five persons probably fatally injured, Crescent, Pa.; struck by Pennsylvania flyer; grade crossing.

May 19, 1914. Body of J. H. Swan, mayor, South Fulton, Tenn., found decapitated; grade crossing.

May 21, 1914. Missouri, Kansas & Texas and Frisco trains collided near Parsons, Kans.; grade crossing. Brakeman received serious injuries, and three passengers.

May 23, 1914. Nicholas Geison killed on grade crossing near Westville by fast Lake Shore & Michigan Southern train; body discovered on pilot of locomotive when train reached station in Chicago.

May 25, 1914. Clyde Guy killed; grade crossing near Granger, Ind.; passenger train.

May 24, 1914. Charles Altman, daughter Lillian, killed, Norfolk, Ohio; Lake Shore mail train; Sunday, May 24; in automobile; bodies carried quarter of a mile on pilot before train stopped; widow left, with 6-weeks-old baby.

May 24, 1914. John Klein and 3-year-old baby daughter killed. D. T. Hartwell, of Marion, Ill., State's attorney; Miss Lydia Aikam and Miss Francis Freeman, school-teachers; Mrs. Klein; severely injured, not expected to live. Teachers crippled for life. Grade crossing near Herrin Hill; Chicago, Burlington & Quincy freight train.

May 24, 1914. W. C. Dunn and wife killed, Parthersville road crossing, near Kansas City, Mo.; automobile; Excelsior express, electric line steel train.

May 24, 1914. Mrs. G. C. Sauers and daughter-in-law, Mrs. Bert Sauers, Dana, Ill., killed on grade crossing, Streator, Ill.; automobile; Santa Fe passenger train. Mrs. Bert Sauers, a bride, recently graduated from Knox College.

May 26, 1914. Five persons injured by freight train; grade crossing; riding in automobile near Burchard, Nebr. (Noted in papers of that date.)

May 27, 1914. Pauline Kalkerlilk, Morton Grove, Ill., killed on grade crossing; fast passenger train, Chicago, Milwaukee & St. Paul.

Total killed, 31; total maimed, 23.

Grade-crossing accidents are more frequent than they ever were before. The legislatures of States have not acted in the matter. In most of the States the railroads still furnish favors to members of the legislature. In many States, however, passes have been discontinued, but even those States have not acted. The amendment I have just had read from the Clerk's desk, I am aware, is not germane to this bill. It is a proper subject, however, of legislation by the Congress. We have, as I have just stated, provided safety devices to be used on trains engaged in interstate commerce for the purpose of protecting the lives of the men who operate the trains. Is it not perfectly proper also to provide for the safety of persons whose lives are in danger on grade crossings by trains engaged in interstate commerce? I have provided in this amendment for automatic gates or bells that will ring when a train is a half mile away from the grade crossing, or a flagman. There are no other known methods than these three of protecting lives at grade crossings. Under this amendment the Interstate Commerce Commission can require either a bell or automatic gate, or both, or a flagman and neither of the other devices, or one or both, in its discretion. The chances are that at nearly all grade crossings in rural districts the commission would find that a bell would be a sufficient warning. A bell could be installed for a few dollars, and the result would be the saving of the lives of hundreds of people every year. Railroads engaged in interstate commerce are generally equipped now with semaphores and block systems, requiring the frequent adjustment of electric wires and the constant patroling of tracks by electricians to keep these signals in order. Installation of bells or automatic gates would not require the employment of additional electricians. The cost to the railroads would be slight and these horrible grade-crossing accidents would end forever.

A great newspaper, the Chicago Daily Farmers and Drovers' Journal, devoted to the interest of farmers, has started the fight for proper signals at grade crossings. I can not hope to discuss the question as eloquently, as ably, and as forcefully as it has been discussed the past month in the columns of that paper, and I propose to print with my speech at this point the story of grade-crossing accidents for the month of May as it has appeared in that newspaper. The record for this one month alone is sufficient to show the absolute necessity of speedy legislation by the Congress on this great question.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Illinois has expired.

Mr. RAINEY. I withdraw the amendment, Mr. Chairman, because I know it is not germane.

The CHAIRMAN. The amendment offered by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. RAINEY] is withdrawn.

The articles referred to by Mr. RAINEY are as follows:

[From the Chicago Daily Farmers and Drovers' Journal, Thursday, May 7, 1914.]

RAILROADS SELL SPEED, NEGLECT CROSSINGS, AND KILL FARMERS.

"Evils of the grade crossing could be eliminated if the American people would slow down. There is too great a desire for speed, and the people have failed to exercise caution. Coupled with this there should be a little cooperation between the railroads and the municipalities where there are grade crossings." (W. H. Scribbins, general agent and superintendent of the Pennsylvania Railroad.)

This statement was made following the killing of the two little Hoffman children last Friday on the grade crossing at Glenview, Ill., when the farmers were stirred to drastic action in defense of their lives.

It isn't the American people who demand speed so much as it is the railroads, who sell and guarantee speed to those who will buy what they can get. Furthermore, the statement that the municipalities should cooperate with the railroads is a preposterous statement in face of the fact that the farmers in every municipality in the State of Illinois have endeavored to cooperate with the railroads year after year to fix up the dangerous crossings. The railroads have absolutely refused to listen to the farmers, who have almost begged them to spend a few dollars for signal lights, and every time a heavy passenger train shoots across any crossing, especially the one at Glenview, which is the scene of one of the bloodiest atrocities and an example of the gross neglect on the part of the railroads, farmers' lives are endangered. Farmers' lives are taken, their homes are darkened, their hearts are broken, poverty and deprivation follow in many instances, when it is a father or a grown son who handles the business of the farm. The wives and daughters can not work the farm. Does the American farmer demand the speed or does the Chicago, Milwaukee & St. Paul sell their speed to those who will buy what they can get?

The Chicago, Milwaukee & St. Paul was selling its speed to those who would buy, and could not stop for a mere farmer's wife and her babies.

Mrs. Bessie Hoffman gained consciousness again Wednesday and was able to recognize her husband. Her skull is fractured and her face and body smashed frightfully. When she saw her husband standing near the bed the first question that quivered weakly to her lips was, "How are the children, Louis?"

Louis Hoffman did not answer. He looked at his wife and smiled. She stared at him fearfully, and a horrible look of fear came to her eyes. To tell her meant death, and he had to allay her fear.

"They are all right," he replied, at length.

Mrs. Hoffman is one of those persons who is afraid of a train or a railroad crossing. Most women are especially afraid when children are along. This woman took all the caution anybody could take when she drove the buggy and its sacred load upon that grade crossing. There was not a sound. The train did not whistle, and there wasn't even a cloud of silent smoke to send the warning. Still the heavy passenger train hurtled from behind a clump of foliage just when Mrs. Hoffman had gained the middle of the track, but then it was too late. Hundreds of people are too late every year, and it will take all the fingers on both hands to count those who are killed throughout the United States every month.

"Evils of the grade crossing could be eliminated by the exercising of a little care on the part of the farmers when approaching crossings." (R. C. Richards, chairman of the central safety committee of the Chicago & North Western Railroad.)

Care! Why don't the railroads put flagmen at the crossings or pay a few of their dollars to fortify against taking human life. Are farmers no better than a lot of animals? If a railroad runs over a cow and kills it, why, they are usually sued and pay a small sum to the farmer. That is precisely what they do in case of taking a farmer's life. They are immediately sued, and, of course, they pay a certain amount, say they are awfully sorry, and let it go at that.

Farmer Louis Hoffman will sue the Chicago, Milwaukee & St. Paul and get damages. There is no doubt about it. The railroad will get real good and make a lot of promises. To show their good intentions and sorrow over the outrage they are responsible for they may even go so far as to place a flagman at the crossing—a week or more, as they did before.

Before this blows over and the killing grows stale there is one thing for the farmers to do, and the Farmers and Drovers' Journal will help: Get out that bill that Gov. Dunne so faithfully promised to aid in passing and which was sidetracked. Get it out and throw it into the teeth of the legislators at Springfield.

[From the Chicago Daily Farmers and Drovers' Journal, Friday, May 8, 1914.]

CLAIM AGENT WILL PAY FOR FARMER'S BABIES WITH GOLD.

"Louis Hoffman is satisfied, and we will fix the matter up with him. It's a wonder you people would not let this trouble rest a while. There is no use of stirring up a fuss." (A. D. Aettli, personal claim agent, Chicago, Milwaukee & St. Paul.)

Farmer Louis Hoffman can not be satisfied, when the railroad smashed and took the lives of his little daughters. What is more, the Farmers and Drovers' Journal knows he isn't satisfied to be compensated with filthy hush gold, when everything that he lived for has been taken from his life. Since the killing of his children last Sunday at the grade crossing in Glenview, Ill., he has been trying to pace out his anguish at St. Francis's Hospital in Evanston, Ill., where his wife, with a fractured skull and a badly hacked-up face, hovers between life and death. The railroad can not "fix the matter with him," because it has taken two lives that all the gold in the world could not pay for; it has mutilated his wife and injured her to such an extent that if she should live life will be a torment; and it plunged Louis Hoffman's life into an abyss of darkness and despair.

The Farmers and Drovers' Journal was asked to let the trouble rest a while. Why should it rest a while? The bill that was framed to protect the farmers from being brutally smashed to death at grade crossings was sidetracked by the worthy solons at Springfield, Ill. It was literally kicked into the drink. Who was responsible for this action in the legislature? Gov. Dunne and several other legislators, who went among the farmers and asked their support and who promised to support the bill, suddenly forgot. Everybody forgot except the farmers, and they were silent because their begging proved futile.

But the railroad men were there—the representatives of the grand officials. They were there for a purpose. Their effort to squelch the bill was highly successful. In squelching it they were instrumental in bringing about the death of Hoffman's children.

But these atrocities can not be hushed up any longer. This one is too bloody and grewsome. Its awfulness is appalling. It is a thing that won't be kicked back into the drink by a lot of unfaithful legislators, because it is a shriek of warning that the Chicago, Milwaukee & St. Paul gold can not wipe out. Bills come and go, and the one that came and went at the capital has a red smear across its printed face.

The farmers demand that it be washed off now, because it is getting dirtier every year. Killings take place every month. The time is ripe to issue a challenge and go to war with the men who connive with railroad officials. The railroads always pay for the lives they snuff out, but it is the legislators who allow the snuffing out.

Why was that bill requiring railroads to equip grade crossings with signals and flagmen killed? Every farmer in the State of Illinois should write to Gov. Dunne and ask the reason. Probably he would stir the valorous solons to action. But more than likely he would hire an extra secretary to carry the flood of mail out of his gilded office. Many suppositions are probable.

What the farmers demand right now worse than anything else is action. They demand action, because every time a farmer drives over a railroad grade crossing his life is endangered. The American farmer is the backbone of the Nation; he feeds its millions, and therefore he should be protected. The farmer has been humiliated long enough by railroads. The legislators have had their laugh, and now it is time to bring out that bill and do some honest legislating.

FAST TRAIN HURLS TWO MORE TO DEATH AT GRADE CROSSING.

Another farmer's home was plunged in sorrow when Absolom Meyers and his wife were smashed to death on a grade crossing near Olathe, Kans., by a Santa Fe Frisco limited. Their nine children were insane with grief when the unrecognizable remains were brought to the farmhouse. The children are of tender age and their screams attracted a score of farmers passing on their way to church.

The Meyers killing was precisely the same as that of Louis Hoffman's little daughters by a Chicago, Milwaukee & St. Paul train at the grade crossing in Glenview, Ill. The Santa Fe Frisco limited plunged along at a rate of 55 miles an hour toward the crossing, which is surrounded by trees. The whistle was not blown, and, unaware of the approaching express train, Farmer Meyers drove upon the track. The engine smashed the buggy to kindling wood, knocked the horse 30 feet into the air, smashed the farmer and his wife against the pilot of the engine, and carried them a quarter of a mile before the train could be stopped.

The pilot of the engine dripped with blood, spattered the tracks, and covered the overalls of the fireman and engineer and made them look like smeared butchers fresh from a killing. The bodies were so badly mutilated that Farmer Meyers's pockets had to be searched for letters to identify him.

Farmer Meyers and his wife were on their way to church. Near the crossing is an electric line which runs parallel at the place where the accident occurred. After crossing the electric line tracks an oncoming train can not be seen, and there are no bells to sound a warning. This grade crossing has worried the farmers for years, and they have protested and demanded that the railroad install signal lights and bells, but the railroad refused, just as the Chicago, Milwaukee & St. Paul refused to put a signalman at the grade crossing in Glenview, Ill. As a result, Farmer Hoffman's daughters were smashed to death and his wife was maimed for life. Farmer Meyers's life is the second horrible example. The killings are two weeks apart. Four bodies—smashed to pulp—two of them babies, and two adults, have smeared engines with blood. In both cases the bodies were so badly mangled that the men who dragged them from the engines had to cover their faces. It is not murder—it is butchery. Heinous blood spilling by great corporations, who endeavor to atone by offering filthy gold. These corporations will not spend one cent to protect the life of the farmer. They don't care.

They know that if they fix up one grade crossing that they will have to fix them all. The railroads would have to spend a few hundred dollars to fix every grade crossing in the States of Illinois, Kansas, Iowa, and the various other States where killings occur daily, weekly, monthly—always bloody, always casting farmers' homes in sorrow and despair, and bringing poverty and deprivation.

Isn't a farmer's life worth just as much as the man who lives in the city?

In the cities every railroad crossing is protected by automatic gates, signal lights, and flagmen. When a killing occurs every newspaper prints columns of seething criticism, city councils meet, mayors give orders, there is a general clamor for vengeance, and the railroad does not hesitate an instant to do anything that is demanded. But when the farmer is smashed to death, like Absolom Meyers and his wife and Hoffman's babies and wife, the railroads take their time about looking into the matter, give weak excuses, and blame the municipalities for neglecting to contribute funds to put up such appliances as will protect the lives of the farmers.

LITTLE RECOURSE FOR FARMERS.

The railroads give him very poor service, bribe the legislators whom the farmers elect to pass bills that will protect their lives, and then butcher at random and notify the personal-claim agent to pay out so much gold to the survivors of the victims. If the farmers protest the sum of money offered, the railroads pocket the money and tell the farmer to take the case to the courts. And the judge usually says the farmer has no business driving over sacred railway property, and it is on record where the court has ordered the railroads to pay less gold than the primary offer.

What does a farmer's life amount to?

It amounts to this: He is the hardest working, most honest, patriotic, law-abiding citizen in the United States. He can not be bribed. He supplies more than 100,000,000 Americans with food, and they would starve without him. His life is clean and wholesome, his progeny are red-blooded and sturdy, and are among the first to step forward in defense of their flag and those 100,000,000 who depend upon the farmer for the food they eat. When those loyal sons fall in battle they bleed to defend the United States and everything in it—including the railroads who murder him.

How many railroad officials—the big men who sit in their offices and control the dollars and cents and lament the farmer's death by tendering gold when his life is smashed out—would abandon this plush chair and fight? Railroad presidents have been found to be crooked. Recent investigations show it. They have been bribed, too. They manipulate shady political deals, and when men do these things they are undesirable citizens.

FAST-GROWING TOLL OF GRADE-CROSSING DEATHS STIR STATE TO ACTION.

Two farmers and a farm woman were smashed to death on a grade crossing Friday at Kaufman, Ill., when an automobile in which they were riding was struck by a Toledo, St. Louis & Western express train, which was plunging along at 50 miles an hour.

The dead, who lived near Marine, Ill., were:

John Stuckwisch.

Mrs. John Stuckwisch.

Oscar Maurer, brother of Mrs. Stuckwisch.

The grade crossing where the killing occurred is near an embankment and several persons who witnessed the killing assert that the automobile was stopped near the crossing and that the man who was driving looked for a train before he proceeded upon the track.

Harry Groot, the engineer, says that he did not see the automobile upon the tracks and that he was shooting his train along at a terrific rate. He says the foliage about the crossing obscured his view, or the accident could have been averted. Where the accident occurred the railroad crosses a wagon road at an angle of 45 degrees.

The automobile was smashed to pieces and carried many yards before the train could be stopped. Two of the bodies were crushed in the demolished automobile and the other was horribly smashed on the pilot. All of them were mangled beyond recognition.

Protection of the farmer's life campaign at rural grade crossings in behalf of the farmer by the Farmers and Drovers' Journal is having its effect on Illinois. Thursday the Illinois public utilities commission assigned experts from the engineering department to investigate grade crossings on the Indiana Harbor Belt Railroad at Arlington Heights, following deaths and complaints of dangerous conditions.

During the last five years many farmers have been killed at grade crossings on the Indiana Belt Line, and the demand has been made time and time again that the road install gates and other devices. A short time ago the farmers appealed to the Belt Line officials to place flagmen at the crossings where the farm traffic is heaviest. The railroad officials declared they would consider the matter, but too much time elapsed before an answer was returned, and so the matter was placed before the Illinois public utilities commission.

Thursday, when the investigation was started, the railroad officials protested that watchmen were not needed, and charged that the protests did not come from the farmers, but were filed by real estate agents seeking to increase the value of their property.

Invariably the railroads shy at a little expense and are never wanting when the time arrives to trump up excuses. It would cost them a large amount of money to install gates that would decrease the railroad killings at grade crossings. The Indiana Harbor Belt Railroad officials hold that real estate agents are responsible for the demand to install flagmen. Even if the real estate men are they should be commended. They value human life and are wise enough to see where a man's life is in constant danger he will not buy property.

It does not make any difference who made the demand for protection. The essential thing is that it is absolutely necessary. Think of the farmers who come and go across that grade crossing. They are not buying real estate, but they live near there. The railroad argument is preposterous, outrageous. Sooner or later it will smash the life out of some farmer and will offer to pay for the murder in gold. If there were more real estate men operating near railroad crossings in the country there would be more public utility commission investigations.

Within two weeks railroads have crushed the lives out of six persons, maimed one for life, killed horses, and smashed wagons and automobiles on grade crossings.

Every one of the killings occurred on grade crossings where the farmers have demanded that the railroads either install flagmen for a period of 12 hours each day or automatic gates. In each case the railroads frankly refused and coolly informed the farmers that they should keep their eyes open.

SIX KILLED IN TWO WEEKS.

The most notable killings within the last two weeks follow:

Farmer Louis Hoffman's baby daughters, smashed to death on the grade crossing at Glenview, Ill., by a Chicago, Milwaukee & St. Paul express train. Mrs. Bessie Hoffman, skull fractured, body badly maimed. She will be an invalid for life.

Farmer Absolom Meyers and wife, smashed to death on a grade crossing near Olathe, Kans. Meyers's clothes had to be searched for letters to identify him. He is survived by nine children.

W. H. Kenney, an insurance agent, driving his automobile over a grade crossing near Hammond, Ind., was struck by a Michigan Central passenger train traveling 50 miles an hour. Both the machine and Kenney were carried more than 600 feet on the pilot of the engine.

Dominick Dernardi died after being struck by a southbound Chicago & North Western express train on the grade crossing at Skokie Road, near Glencoe.

These are just a few of the killings that have been brought to the notice of the Farmers and Drovers' Journal. Farmers come every day and point them out as horrible examples of the negligence of legislators and the thrift of begrudging railroad officials who hate to see a few dollars squeezed out of their coffers to protect lives.

For a long time the farmers were the only ones to protest, but now cities, municipalities, and counties have entered in the fight. The residents of the cities are safe enough, because city ordinances compel railroads to install gates, flagmen, signal lamps, and other appliances. But the residents of the cities have become cognizant of the heinous murder of the men who feed them, who till the fields of golden grain to make the Nation prosperous.

It is incredulous to think that it takes the protests of the entire Nation to rouse the legislators from their seeming lethargy to the fact that the railroads are killing the farmers like flies at grade crossings. And it is awful the way the railroads protest against being forced not to continue to kill, and it is monstrous the way the railroads coldbloodly offer a fixed amount for the human harvest of souls they reap.

Killing farmers must stop. It is the blackest blotch on society. The laws do not allow the ruthless taking of life. The penalty for taking life is death. Railroads take life—scores of lives—every year. The only penalty they pay is in dollars and cents. The penalty is cheap—a mere pittance for these monster, money-grabbing corporations.

THREE MORE SMASHED TO DEATH—FOUR INJURED AT GRADE CROSSING.

HERE IS WHAT GOV. RALSTON, OF INDIANA, SAYS.

I favor reasonable legislation for protecting life and property.

HERE IS WHAT GOV. RALSTON, OF INDIANA, SHOULD SAY.

Laws should be made forcing every railroad to place electrically operated automatic gates, flagmen, and other devices to halt the numerous killings.

Railroads are killing farmers like flies.

Public-service utilities commissions must be given absolute power to force railroads to protect the farmer.

Every time a train plunges across an unprotected crossing lives are endangered.

Every day farmers are killed on grade crossings.

The railroads pay so much gold for the lives they smash out; but they go right on killing.

Gold is insignificant; life is invaluable.

Therefore the onward march of death must halt, and drastic legislation that gives no quarter, that does not consider expense, is necessary in every State in the Union.

Indiana farmers are being killed like flies on the unprotected railroad grade crossings. Sunday R. E. Davis, his son Claude, and his brother-in-law, J. C. Schaeffer, were smashed to death on a grade crossing at Fort Benjamin Harrison, and four other members of the family were injured, probably fatally, when an Indiana Union Traction car hurtled from behind a clump of trees that obscure the crossing and crashed into the automobile in which the family was riding. Mr. Davis was driving his automobile slowly at the time, and infinite caution was taken before he drove upon the track.

Coroner Durham said Monday:

"The crossing is dangerous. It is diagonal and prevents 'holding back' and closely parallels a railroad track."

There are hundreds of grade crossings as dangerous as this one, and hundreds of farmers have been slain every year on them. Conditions are awful; death stalks everywhere.

The killings in Indiana are appalling. The railroads have positively refused to install gates and the legislators only offer sympathy. Gov. Ralston sits in his gilded office and says that he is sorry. He even goes so far as to say that he is in favor of "reasonable legislation for protecting life and property." This is the statement he makes to the Farmers' and Drovers' Journal.

Gov. Ralston is "in favor of only reasonable legislation." How about some quick action, Gov. Ralston? You gave your promise to the farmers of Indiana to protect them when they put you in office. That is one of the reasons you are drawing a fine salary. The bulk of that salary comes out of the pockets of the farmers. You begged them with tears in your eyes for the job. Now, when the railroads are outcenering them at railroad crossings you sigh in a weak voice that you only favor stopping the blood spilling.

The farmers are tired of a man who allows railroads to kill them. They have begged the railroads to put up gates to protect them, but railroads are not in the habit of spending money when there is no return. The farmers have appealed to the legislators; the governor has heard their pleas. But nothing ever has been done. No bill demanding that railroads install electrically operated automatic gates, signals, or flagmen have ever been put through. The legislators have promised—so did the railroads promise.

Lives are being smashed out every day, week, month—hundreds every year. The gross negligence of the legislators has caused a storm of protest. At every meeting of farmers and cattlemen in the State grade-crossing death is the main topic of discussion. The howl of protest is being raised to get some immediate action on the part of Gov. Ralston, the man who favors saving life, but who does not raise a finger to put into black and white laws that will eradicate outrageous murder.

TOLL OF THE DEADLY GRADE CROSSINGS FOR TWO WEEKS ENDING SUNDAY, MAY 17.

THE DEAD.

Mrs. Polly Lindsey and Mrs. Suzan Lattman, Quincy, Mich., killed on a grade crossing by a Michigan United Traction train, near Albion.

Absolom Meyers and wife, Olathe, Kans., killed by a Frisco passenger train at Pleasant View crossing.

Dominick Dernardi, Glencoe, Ill., killed by a Chicago & North Western train on a crossing near Glencoe.

R. E. Davis, his son Claude, and his brother-in-law, J. C. Schaeffer, killed by an Indiana Union Traction car on a crossing near Fort Benjamin Harrison.

Louis Hoffman's two baby daughters, killed by a Chicago, Milwaukee & St. Paul train on the grade crossing at Glenview, Ill.

W. H. Kennedy, killed by a Michigan Central train on a grade crossing at Hammond, Ind.

Mr. and Mrs. John F. Stuckwisch and Oscar Maure, killed by a Toledo, St. Louis & Western express on a grade crossing at Kaufman, Ill.

THESE ARE FIGHTING FOR LIFE FROM INJURIES.

Mrs. George Lindsey, Quincy, Mich., badly smashed and maimed.

George Lindsey, Quincy, Mich., probably will be a cripple for life.

Ambrose Lattman, Quincy, Mich., badly cut.

Mrs. Bessie Hoffman, Glenview, Ill., skull fractured, near death.

R. E. Davis and wife, Nauvoo, Mich., both injured seriously; not expected to live.

Richard Boutel, Samuel Quick, and Frederick Boutel, South Bend, Ind., badly mutilated, are dying.

Three members of Thomas O. Stout's family injured; reported dying.

FIVE NEAR DEATH AS TRAIN SMASHES AUTO AT GRADE CROSSING.

Five men narrowly escaped death on an unprotected grade crossing Tuesday afternoon near Brookfield, Mo., when a Burlington passenger engine crashed into a car driven by Hugh Green. Green and his companions, Frank and William Guest and Gus and Edward Petska, were thrown from the car and injured seriously.

Hugh Green, the owner of the car, said that he could not hear the train coming and the grade crossing was obscured by trees. Just as he drove upon the crossing the express train shot out from behind the trees and smashed into the car, carrying it many yards before the engine could be stopped. Fortunately the car hung in an upright position on the pilot and the occupants were able to fling themselves off the automobile into the ditch.

GOV. M'GOVERN PRAISES GRADE-CROSSING WARFARE.

Farmers in the State of Wisconsin are not treated like so many flies. Railroads are no longer allowed to wipe them out on unprotected grade crossings, simply because the Wisconsin legislators, backed by Gov. McGovern, have put into force drastic laws that compel railroads to install automatic gates, signals, flagmen, or cut down the foliage that obstructs the view of the crossings. Promptly, in accordance with orders from the railroad commission, which is vested with absolute authority to protect the grade crossings—and Wisconsin's farmers.

There is no horrible red trail of blood from one boundary of the State to the other, and death does not stalk everywhere as it does in Illinois, Indiana, Iowa, and several other States. Farmers can drive on the grade crossings in perfect safety.

This was not always the case in Wisconsin, however. Wisconsin farmers were smashed to death on the crossings just the same as they are in Indiana until the Farmers and Drovers' Journal was appealed to. The Farmers and Drovers' Journal took the initiative and bore the brunt of the great campaign for legislation to protect the life of the farmer.

Whenever a Wisconsin farmer registers a complaint with the railroad commission advising the installation of gates, the railroads have to spend money on gates or whatever protection is ordered. It costs the railroads a vast amount of money each year. They do not like to pay that money, but Gov. McGovern and his legislators do not "dicker" with railroads—they demand of railroads, and point to the law that says: "Wisconsin farmers must not be smashed to death on grade crossings."

The Wisconsin commission is experimenting constantly with all sorts of new apparatus that will make the crossings more secure. Whenever some new device is considered worthy of experiment the commission orders the railroads to pay out so much money for the new apparatus and it is installed for a trial.

The newest device that the railroads have had to buy is an "automatic flagman," which is being installed under the direction of the railroad commission on a crossing of the North Western road in the town of Geneva, near Williams Bay. It is a device which raises a red flag, which it waves, shows a light, and rings a bell when a train is approaching. It also shows another light to the engineer, which shows him that it is in operation. The railroad commission ordered this trial at the expense of the North Western Railroad, and if it proves more effective other appliances will have to come down and go into the scrap heap, perhaps. It will not only cost the North Western Railroad a pretty penny, but every road in the State of Wisconsin will have to install this new appliance.

SEVEN LIVES ARE LOST.

S. C. Coatley, Graettinger, Iowa, says: "Seven lives were lost two years ago on the North Western grade crossing near Graettinger, Iowa. At some of the crossings the railway company has installed bells, but they are useless, because they are always out of order. I will aid in any way possible the Farmers and Drovers' Journal in its fight for decent legislation."

C. E. Hilton, Mills County, Iowa, says: "In recent years seven farmers were killed on the unprotected grade crossings near my farm in Mills County, Iowa. The Burlington and North Western roads run through the county and the farmers' lives always are in danger. I think a bill should be passed in the State of Iowa forcing railroads to install appliances on all grade crossings. The Farmers and Drovers' Journal is doing a great deal of good, and I think through its efforts proper legislation will be brought about."

F. I. Cannon, of Mitchell County, Iowa, says: "During the time I lived in Ames and Sheridan, Iowa, many farmers lost their lives and many were injured for life on the grade crossings. It was a shame the way the farmers were killed. This is a farmers' fight, but it is great the way the Farmers and Drovers' Journal is bearing the brunt of the battle for protection. I am in favor of legislation forcing railroads to install automatic gates."

H. W. Martin, of Maxwell, Iowa, says: "The only appliance that will do any good is the automatic gate. The Milwaukee line passes through Maxwell, and three farmers have been killed during the past two years. In the near-by towns several have been killed and maimed. I commend the Farmers and Drovers' Journal for the sincere fight it is waging for protection."

Fred Robinson, Rhodes, Iowa: "Automatic gates or elevation will save life. This is the only way out. I believe legislation is the only way to secure safety. The Farmers and Drovers' Journal is conducting the right sort of campaign—it is a grand fight."

J. P. Burkholder, Maple Hill, Iowa: "The Farmers and Drovers' Journal is making a brave fight for the life of the farmer. I hope it is successful. There is a grade crossing in a coulee near Maple Hill that is obscured from all sides. Two people were killed there a short time ago by a Rock Island passenger train. We need the legislation that the Farmers and Drovers' Journal is fighting for."

J. F. Wendling, Independence, Iowa: "The installation of automatic gates or track elevation is the only way to stop this constant killing. Several farmers have lost their lives on the grade crossing near Independence."

John Kriepen, Brooklyn, Iowa: "Automatic gates should be installed or flagmen stationed at the crossings. One man was run down on a grade crossing this year at Brooklyn. Something must be done right away. There is a curve in the track where this killing took place, and it is a death trap. I indorse the Farmers and Drovers' Journal campaign. I take the paper and am proud of it. The daily editorial demanding legislation is great. It bears an awful but truthful message."

J. E. Vaughn, Northwestern, Iowa: "The North Western and Rock Island lines have claimed seven farmers' lives within two years. I think the Farmers and Drovers' Journal is fighting a winning battle for the farmer. What is needed most are the automatic gates. Tunnels are the surest, however. Right now the farmers want anything that will even reduce the death rate."

P. A. McCreey, Rolfe, Iowa: "The Farmers and Drovers' Journal is fighting for us. I believe that the only solution is drastic legislation. There have been no killings near my home, but it is more good fortune than anything else that farmers have not been run down."

K. C. Rigger, Cameron, Iowa: "Public opinion will eventually force the railroads to protect the grade crossings by elevation or automatic gates. The Farmers and Drovers' Journal is a great instrument of assistance to the farmers. The paper has always fought for the farmer, and I feel sure that its campaign will be closed soon with a victory."

DAY FAILS TO PASS WITHOUT FATALITIES AT GRADE CROSSINGS.

Five persons were smashed to death and one injured seriously late Wednesday, when a Scioto Valley Traction car struck an automobile on an unprotected grade crossing near Ashville, Ohio.

The dead are:

William Miller, cashier of the Ashville Bank.

Mrs. Miller.

Mrs. Agnes Staiger (Miller's sister).

Mrs. C. H. Hill and her 6-year-old daughter.

Miss Viola Bond, a sixth member of the party was burned severely. She was rushed to a hospital at Chillicothe, Ohio.

Mrs. Staiger and Mrs. C. H. Hill and her little daughter were burned to death in the flaming wreckage of the automobile.

Miller and his wife were thrown from the car and killed instantly.

Scioto Valley Traction cars are operated by the third-rail system. Immediately following the accident the wrecked automobile and the interurban car were enveloped in flames.

Bodies of the victims were saved from the flames by rescuers. The wreckage was consumed by the flames. It is thought the occupants who were only smashed so they could not escape were electrocuted.

MISSOURI LAWS SAVE FARMERS FROM DEATH AT GRADE CROSSINGS.

The hideous death specter, that gorges itself with farmers' lives and blood in Indiana, Illinois, and Iowa on the railway-grade crossings, does not cause a reign of terror among Missouri farmers any longer. Gov. Elliott W. Major and his legislators put a stop to the grewsome killings. They had precisely the same proposition to cope with as the other States, where the farmers are now being slain daily, and there are no laws that demand grade-crossing protection.

The railroads in Missouri killed the farmers at random, played politics, coerced or bought off dishonorable lawmakers, laughed at the municipal ordinances, and literally tore them up and threw the bits into the faces of the men who framed them.

Conditions went from bad to worse. Farmers died by scores at the grade crossings; homes were plunged in darkness and hearts filled with pain and anguish. This was followed by a mighty wave of protest for justice from the farmers that shocked the capital. Immediately a bill was framed forcing railroads to install automatic gates, flagmen, and any other devices demanded by the public-service commission, which is vested with absolute power to demand any protection of grade crossings to protect the farmer.

Just as soon as the bill was approved and passed by the Missouri legislators the grade-crossing deaths decreased from a score of killings every six months to none. Where hundreds of death-trap crossings formerly took an enormous toll of life all now are protected by automatic gates and other devices, and hundreds of others have been eliminated entirely by tunneling and elevation. The Missouri commission now has under consideration the elimination of 45 other grade crossings. Every one of these crossings which are to be eliminated is protected by gates, but in a majority of cases they still are considered dangerous, and Missouri legislators will not tolerate another killing if it can be averted, and it can be.

[From the Chicago Daily Farmers and Drovers' Journal, Thursday, May 21, 1914.]

HEAVIEST DEATH TOLL AT GRADE CROSSINGS TAKEN ON SUNDAYS.

WHAT GOV. A. O. EBERHART, OF MINNESOTA, SAYS.

"I am heartily in favor of all legislation that will reduce accidents and protect human life."

Gov. Eberhart sent this reply in response to a telegram from the Farmers and Drovers' Journal, asking his views on the campaign now being waged for legislation forcing the railroads to protect the grade crossings.

With sickening fear in their hearts, the farmers of Indiana, Iowa, Illinois, Kansas, and many other States where the grade crossings are grossly neglected, drive across the dangerous death traps daily. The killings in these States are not so frequent during the week days, but on Sunday—a day set aside as holy; a day of prayer, peace, and rest—the greatest toll is taken by the grade crossings, and often as many as 10 farmers' lives are sacrificed. When the killings have been most numerous the days always have been beautiful and sunny.

Far across the wooded vales and fields of golden grain that feed the Nation's millions the church bell summons. Hundreds of carriages filled with happy farmer folk on their way to church drive over the unprotected grade crossings, and many of the grade crossings are obscured by heavy foliage. Express trains plunge across these unprotected crossings with impatient passengers anxious to arrive at some eastern or western metropolis. The railway companies have guaranteed to carry the passengers to their destinations on scheduled time, and these trains are not very often behind time.

They travel at a rate of from 40 to 50 miles an hour. Even the local trains make exceptionally fast time, and all of them clear these unprotected grade crossings at high speed. The engineers can not see the approaching farm carriages on account of the growths that hedge the tracks. Consequently, during the summer hundreds of farmers, their mothers, fathers, sisters, sons, and daughters are killed—whole families at a time are wiped out.

In almost every instance the appalling killings that have stirred the farmers and people of Indiana, Kansas, and Illinois recently have happened on beautiful, sunny Sundays, and of the 15 persons killed 10 of them were on their way to church.

GOV. EBERHART ACTS.

It is horrible—awful—the way these farmer lives are smashed out. Almost invariably on a holy day, the day of rest and prayer.

This is why Gov. Eberhart, of Minnesota, is heartily in favor of drastic legislation to eliminate killings of this sort—to wipe out the trail of blood that has reddened the American Continent from sea to sea. Gov. Eberhart does not "favor reasonable legislation"; he favors and advocates "absolute legislation," whether the cost to the railroads is reasonable or not. Gov. Ralston, of Indiana, only favors "reasonable legislation," and Indiana is the scene of many horrible killings. There is no protection on the grade crossings there, and no attempt has been made to force the railroads to install electrically operated automatic gates. At least not on the part of the governor or the legislature. If the Indiana legislators decide to stop the railroads from jeopardizing the lives of whole families, they will have to abandon the "reasonable" attitude and make laws that are "unreasonable." It is better to have unreasonable laws that place the railroads under heavy expense than to sacrifice the farmer and let that money go into the idle gold heap of the corporations.

Why should Gov. Ralston, of Indiana, put "reasonable" in his declaration for legislation?

Not another governor has done this. Gov. Eberhart did not simply because he is aware of the fact that the railroads have been and are astoundingly unreasonable with the farmers and everybody else when money is concerned, and particularly when the farmers have literally begged them for protection. They are unreasonable because railroad representatives coerce and buy off legislators who would otherwise frame and pass bills that would instantly stop the railroads from killing farmers and cost the railroads thousands of dollars a year. After killing a farmer, the railroads will take the matter to court if the survivors of the dead demand too much gold. The roads laugh at the ordinances made by municipalities demanding protection.

[From the Chicago Daily Farmers and Drovers' Journal, Saturday, May 23, 1914.]

BODY OF SLAIN FARMER CARRIED ON PILOT OF ENGINE FOR 40 MILES.

In a tangle of harness, the horribly mangled body of Nicholas Geison, 50, a Westville, Ind., farmer, was found on the pilot of a fast Lake Shore & Michigan Southern train in the La Salle Street Station in Chicago Saturday.

Geison was smashed to death when struck on a grade crossing near Westville and the body not found until Chicago was reached.

When the train stopped in the La Salle Street Station Edward Bailey, the engineer, found the lifeless bundle amid the pieces of harness and bits of smashed buggy. He immediately notified the South Clark Street police, and the bloody body was removed to Ball's undertaking rooms at 500 South Dearborn Street.

The identification was made from a notebook found in one of the pockets of the torn clothing, which gave his address as Rural Free Delivery No. 1, Westville, Ind.

The belief is that Geison was struck and killed while driving over one of the unguarded grade crossings near Westville, but Engineer Bailey asserts that neither he nor the firemen knew that the train smashed into a buggy during the night.

Immediately after the mangled body was taken from the pilot, Chicago police sent a telegram to the Westville police in an endeavor to positively identify the victim.

The train runs between Boston and Chicago, and it is believed that at the time of the killing it was traveling faster than 55 miles an hour.

This is the third bloody accident of the kind that has occurred inside of three weeks, and it is said that it could have been prevented had the grade crossing been protected by gates, which would have fallen and kept the farmer from driving upon the tracks. The killing occurred during the night, when it was too dark for the engineer to see the tracks far in advance of the engine.

During the past two years the Lake Shore trains have been forced by legislation of the city councils of South Bend and Laporte, Ind., to cut down the speed from 85 miles an hour, owing to the fact that life is jeopardized at every grade crossing. When there are no gates to fall and give warning before the approach of a train, and especially in the dead of the night, where there is a turn in the tracks or the track is obscured by trees, death is imminent at all times.

Simultaneously with the police investigation for positive identification, officials of the railroad started an investigation to learn where the killing happened. From the great amount of blood on the pilot, it is thought that the horse was carried some distance also.

The inquest was held in Ball's undertaking parlors by Coroner Peter M. Hoffman at 3 o'clock Saturday afternoon.

UNGUARDED CROSSINGS TAKE APPALLING TOLL OF LIFE; MANY MAIMED.

Clyde Guy, 36, was struck and killed Monday afternoon near Granger, Ind., by a fast passenger train when he drove his horse and buggy upon a dangerous grade crossing a short distance from that city.

When in the middle of the track, which is obscured by shrubbery, the train swept from behind, smashed the buggy to kindling wood, and carried his lifeless body many yards on the pilot before the train could be stopped.

Two more farmers were killed instantly Sunday near Norfolk, Ohio, when Charles Altman, 42, and his baby daughter, Lillian, 7, were smashed to death on an unprotected grade crossing by a fast Lake Shore mail train traveling at a rate of 70 miles an hour.

The automobile in which they rode was demolished. The bodies were carried a quarter of a mile on pilot before the train could be stopped, and both were terribly mutilated.

Altman's widow, who is left with a 6-weeks-old baby, is prostrated and not expected to live.

When a Chicago, Burlington & Quincy freight train crashed into an automobile on another unprotected grade crossing near Herrin Hill, Ill., Sunday John Kline and his 3-year-old baby daughter were smashed to death, and D. T. Hartwell, Marion, State's attorney; Miss Ludia Aikman and Miss Frances Freeman, school-teachers; and Mrs. Kline were severely injured.

Mrs. Kline was horribly maimed and is not expected to live. The two school-teachers were injured so badly that it is thought they will be crippled for life.

Baby Kline was killed instantly.

Two other victims were claimed on an unprotected grade crossing near Kansas City, Mo., Sunday, on the Parthersville road crossing, when the Excelsior Springs Electric Line steel train crashed into an automobile driven by W. C. Dunn, instantly killing him and his wife. Their 4-year-old son was hurled 90 feet through the air and had a miraculous escape.

Mr. and Mrs. Dunn were hurled 20 feet into the air over the shelter station, and the bodies were badly battered and torn.

The Parthersville crossing is used every day by farmers and hundreds of automobiles going and coming between Kansas City and Excelsior Springs. No protection of any kind has ever been installed, and hundreds of lives are constantly endangered.

When a Santa Fe passenger train hurtled over the unprotected grade crossing at Ancona, near Streator, Ill., Sunday, Mrs. C. G. Sauers and her daughter-in-law, Mrs. Bert Sauers, of Dana, Ill., were smashed to death and their automobile was wrecked.

Mrs. Koengsen, a family friend, and Bert Sauers, who were sitting in the front seat, escaped sudden death by jumping.

Mrs. C. G. Sauers was frightfully mangled, but lived an hour.

The husbands of the dead women are in the grain business. Mrs. Bert Sauers was a bride, and recently graduated from Knox College, and was a daughter of Dr. Ensign, of Rutland.

INDIANA FARMERS BLAME LAWMAKERS FOR GEISON DEATH.

The gruesome Indiana grade-crossing tragedy at Otis Saturday, when Nicholas Geison, 40, a prosperous farmer, was smashed to death by a fast Lake Shore & Michigan Southern mail train, which carried his mangled body, unnoticed on the pilot of the engine, out of the State of Indiana to the La Salle Street Station in Chicago, has stirred the smoldering enmity of every farmer in the Nation.

The scene of this death—an unguarded grade crossing—was visited by a staff reporter and a staff photographer of the Farmers and Drovers' Journal Sunday. Their pictures, one drawn with words and the other an actual photograph, are given in the Farmers and Drovers' Journal.

In a tangle of harness, horribly mangled, the head cut open and the brains spilled over the pilot, the body was found by Edward Bailey, the engineer, upon alighting from the cab of his engine in Chicago. Bailey was attracted first by the wild exclamations of a horror-stricken crowd which congregated on the other side of the station gates and gazed at the ghastly spectacle. The body was covered by a horse blanket as it lay on the pilot. This same blanket was used to convey it to the undertaking parlors. The inquest was held by Deputy Coroner C. F. Kennedy, and a jury returned a verdict of "death through accident."

Following the inquest over the body in Chicago it was taken to Otis for a second investigation, on demand of Coroner Osborn, of Laporte, who conducted the second inquest Monday.

The killing occurred in the dead of the night, on one of the most dangerous grade crossings in Indiana. Farmer Geison, whose farm is 2 miles from Otis, had been visiting his brother, Emil Geison. They parted at midnight. According to Emil Geison, shortly after his brother got into his buggy and rode away the midnight express thundered through the village and cleared the crossing at a rate of 55 miles an hour.

The buggy was exactly in the middle of the tracks when the engine swept down upon it. The horse was found browsing near the railroad station, 300 yards above the crossing, the following morning. The fact that the horse was not injured, nor even knocked off its feet, shows that the train was traveling at a terrific rate. The buggy was knocked into 1-foot lengths and strewn along the tracks many feet from the crossing. The shafts, that still clung to the horse, were clipped as cleanly as though a cannon ball had struck them.

ENGINEER ADMITS SPEED.

Bailey, the engineer, asserted that the night was foggy and he was not even aware that his engine had hit anything. He said there was no jar, which usually records a collision, and admitted his train was traveling from 55 to 60 miles an hour at the time he passed Otis until he drew his train into the suburbs of Chicago.

The express trains always travel at more than 55 miles an hour over the Otis crossing. Hundreds of farmers pass over it every day, and many during the night. Very seldom the trains blow a warning when crossing this "chasm of death."

Hundreds of infuriated farmers swarmed into Otis Sunday. They did not blame the railroad so much as they did the lawmakers, who should have forced the railroad to install electrically operated automatic gates. This is the second killing on the Otis grade crossing. John Shannon, a farmer near Otis, was smashed to death a short time ago. His body was so badly mangled that his clothing had to be searched for identification, as was Geison's when taken from the pilot in Chicago.

Fortunately, Nicholas Geison had no wife or children, but his brother is prostrate with grief. The dead man was at the prime of his life, and his life was too precious to have been sacrificed. He died when death seemed furthermost from him, and he never had a chance to get out of the way of the steel monster that plunged with his body to its terminal in another State.

The railroad blamed the killing on the darkness of the night. The farmers near Otis blamed the killing on the railroad and the legislators. Both are guilty. One did the killing and the other allowed it. If the legislators in the State of Indiana had made laws forcing the railroads to protect the grade crossings, where hundreds of farmers are killed, and particularly this one, Geison would have arisen with the sun on Monday morning and gone whistling to his farm work. Instead, another bloody slaying exemplified Indiana's legislative negligence.

Sunday hundreds of farmers visited the grade crossing, and the sentiment was that Gov. Ralston and his legislators "would get the surprise of their lives if they were to take a look."

Felix Maraski, a wealthy farmer near Otis, said: "Many would have been killed in this 'death chasm' had the farmers relaxed their watchfulness for one minute. Everybody is exceedingly careful, because the crossing is a damnable thing. Geison was careful, because he realized the danger to which his life was constantly exposed. It was the same thing in the killing of George Shannon, who was horribly smashed. It is high time that the State government took action. A bill should be passed forcing the railroads of Indiana to protect the 'death traps.' If a man is to comply with the 'safety first' signs that are plastered over the State, he might as well quit traversing the country highways. Everybody is shouting 'safety first,' and the legislators, who have the power to make the slogan mean something, are idle. I am willing to start a fight for legislation in this community, such as the Farmers and Drovers' Journal is waging in behalf of the farmer. The railroads are making their money from the people and should do something to safeguard them."

FIVE INJURED AT GRADE CROSSING IN NEBRASKA.

When a fast freight crashed into an automobile driven by Frederick C. Casey at an unprotected grade crossing near Burchard, Nebr., his collar bone was broken and he was badly bruised and cut. Marie, his baby daughter, is lying in a hospital with concussion of the brain, and Mrs. Casey and two other children were severely slashed and bruised.

Heavy foliage, that obscured the crossing and shut off a view of the tracks, is responsible. Casey avers that he slowed down his car and took every precaution before driving upon the tracks.

JURIES BLAME ST. PAUL RAILROAD FOR DEATHS AT GRADE CROSSINGS.

The Chicago, Milwaukee & St. Paul still continues to slaughter persons at its unprotected grade crossings. The railroad has taken more than its share of human life. Almost every time it has taken a life coroner's juries have returned a verdict of death due to the gross negligence of this road to guard its "death traps" with automatic gates.

Mrs. Pauline Kalkelik, of Morton Grove, Ill., was smashed to death on a Morton Grove grade crossing by a fast passenger train last Thursday. She was killed instantly. A jury was empaneled by Coroner Peter M. Hoffman, who investigated the death. The investigation proved conclusively that the killing was caused by the negligence of this railroad. But there was only one brave, honest man on that jury who dared express his own candid opinion. Milton Jones was the man. He could not agree with the others that Mrs. Kalkelik's death came through accident. He held tenaciously that the Chicago, Milwaukee & St. Paul was guilty of taking a human life when it could have been avoided.

Other members of that jury acted like some of the legislators in those States where the grade crossings are claiming a great number of lives—they were dubious as to whether the railroad should protect its own crossings. Perhaps the railroad was too fearful a power for them to render a verdict against.

Coroner Peter Hoffman was of the same opinion as Milton Jones. He is convinced that the Chicago, Milwaukee & St. Paul is guilty of killing a human being, and at heart he commended the stand taken by Milton. The jury was out exactly one hour and a half and could not return a verdict of "death through accident" because Milton disagreed. Coroner Hoffman apparently became disgusted and discharged the "bickering five" who would mask "a murder as an accident."

Three weeks ago this road smashed out the lives of Louis Hoffman's babies at the Glenview, Ill., grade crossing. Coroner Peter Hoffman made the investigation and a jury returned a verdict of gross negligence. At this crossing the Chicago, Milwaukee & St. Paul had taken two lives prior to the killing of the Hoffman children and the maiming of their mother. In both cases the railroad was warned that unless it stationed a flagman at the crossing for a period of 12 hours each day a charge of murder would be lodged with the grand jury. The railroad complied with the verdict. But at the end of three weeks the flagman suddenly vanished. Then came another killing. This time the Chicago, Milwaukee & St. Paul was ordered to install automatic gates to protect the farmers' lives. The road promised. This was followed by the Hoffman killing. It took three killings to convince the railroad that it was high time to protect the Glenview grade crossing.

Coroner Hoffman did not forget about the killing of his cousin's children and the brutal maiming of Mrs. Bessie Hoffman. He kept after the railroad, and they treated him with a great amount of consideration. They put a flagman at the Glenview crossing and have sent Coroner Hoffman a blue print of the gates that are being installed.

The coroner says that the killing should stop. He is indignant at the way the railroads have been allowed to kill—take human life—and then go right on taking it, because no one is strong enough to make them give a thought to the protection of human beings. The sacrifice is awful. The Chicago, Milwaukee & St. Paul probably will pay the beneficiaries of Mrs. Kalkelik a certain amount of gold. It is the same old thing over and over again.

The Milwaukee kills people and then sends them to the personal-claim agent—he pays for all killings.

TWO HURLED TO DEATH, TWO SEVERELY HURT AT GRADE CROSSINGS.

A man believed to be W. D. Patton, a veterinarian of Siloam Springs, Ark., was killed early Thursday at a grade crossing near St. Joseph, Mo., when a fast Rock Island train struck and demolished the automobile which he was driving

The body was terribly mutilated and the papers in his pocket did not confirm the identification.

A high embankment shuts off the view of the crossing, and it was impossible for Patton to see or hear the approaching train. His car was hit near the front end and hurled many feet from the track.

Patton's shoulder was caught in the wreckage and ground to pieces.

MISSOURI TAKES ACTION.

The public-utilities commission of Missouri has started to eradicate the reign of death and terror on the unprotected railroad grade crossings in Missouri. The first real action was taken Thursday, when Judge John Kennish, of the supreme court, sitting at the Baltimore Hotel, as representative of the State-utilities commission, considered the advisability of altering the Fifteenth Street unprotected grade crossing over the Rock Island tracks.

The hearing is the outcome of a request filed with the State board by Frank Rozzelle, county counsellor, acting under instructions from the county court.

This hearing is expected to bring out evidence of the number of people maimed and injured at this dangerous crossing. The extent of the railroad's share in remedying the condition, should a viaduct be decreed necessary, also will be determined. The hearing is expected to bare the whole situation concerning the danger or lack of danger at this grade crossing where people have been hurt.

James Cox was instantly killed and Mrs. Cox, Mrs. Edward Borchard, and Miss Tillie Olson, all of Beloit, Wis., were injured severely when a Chicago & North Western train crashed into their automobile on an unprotected grade crossing near Janesville Thursday.

Mr. ADAMSON. Mr. Chairman, I ask for a vote on the substitute.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the substitute offered by the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. CULLOP].

The substitute was agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN. The question now recurs on the original bill as amended by the substitute.

Mr. ADAMSON. Mr. Chairman, I move that the committee do now rise.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair was putting the motion on the passage of the original bill as amended by the substitute.

Mr. ADAMSON. There is only one committee amendment, Mr. Chairman, and I move that the committee rise and report the bill as amended by the substitute, with a favorable recommendation.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair is under the impression that the proper motion is to agree to the original bill as amended by the substitute.

Mr. MANN. That comes after the motion to rise.

Mr. ADAMSON. I would not mislead the Chair. Just follow me. [Laughter.]

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I take it that the motion that the gentleman from Georgia makes is to rise and report this bill favorably, and also the other bills that have been laid aside with a favorable recommendation.

Mr. ADAMSON. We have amended the bill we were considering by adopting a substitute for it.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Georgia [Mr. ADAMSON] moves that the committee do now rise and report the substitute——

Mr. MANN. And the other bills that have been laid aside with a favorable recommendation.

Mr. ADAMSON. That is right. I move, Mr. Chairman, that all bills under consideration embraced within the special order be reported to the House with favorable recommendation that they pass as amended.

Mr. MANN. There are just three that have been laid aside.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Georgia moves that the committee rise and report the bill H. R. 15613, the bill H. R. 15657, and the bill H. R. 16586, with sundry amendments, with the recommendation that the amendments be agreed to and that the bills as amended do pass.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the committee rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. HULL, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that committee, having had under consideration the bill (H. R. 15613) creating an interstate trade commission, to define its powers and duties, and for other purposes; the bill (H. R. 15657) to supplement existing laws against unlawful restraints and monopolies, and for other purposes; and the bill (H. R. 16586) to amend section 20 of an act to regulate commerce, and for other purposes, had directed him to report each bill with amendments, with the recommendation that the amendments be agreed to, and that the bills as amended do pass.

The SPEAKER. The Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union reports that that committee, under the special rule, having had under consideration House bill 15613, House bill 15657, and House bill 16586, had directed him to report the same back with sundry amendments, with the recommendation that the amendments be agreed to and that the bills as amended do pass.

Mr. ADAMSON. I believe, Mr. Speaker, the rule provides that the previous question is ordered.

The SPEAKER. Yes; it is already ordered.

Mr. ADAMSON. The first bill is the trade commission bill.

The SPEAKER. The first bill is House bill 15613. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, were there any amendments?

The SPEAKER. The Clerk advises the Chair that there is one amendment. The Clerk will report it.

The Clerk read as follows:

On page 12, line 7, strike out the word "thirteenth" and insert the word "thirtieth."

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the engrossment and third reading of the bill.

The bill as amended was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, and was read the third time.

Mr. MURDOCK. Mr. Speaker, I make the following motion to recommit.

The SPEAKER. Is the gentleman opposed to the bill?

Mr. MURDOCK. I am not.

The SPEAKER. Is anybody in the House opposed to it, and wants to offer a motion to recommit? If not, the Chair will entertain the motion of the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. MURDOCK], which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

By Mr. MURDOCK: I move to recommit the bill (H. R. 15613) to the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce, with directions to that committee to report said bill back to the House forthwith, with the following amendment, viz: Strike out all after the enacting clause and insert in lieu thereof the following:

"That there is hereby created and established an interstate trade commission, which shall consist of seven members. On January 1, 1914, the Bureau of Corporations shall cease to exist, and all the employees, officials, funds, and records of said bureau, and all the powers and duties thereof and of the Commissioner of Corporations shall be transferred to and conferred upon the interstate trade commission. The Commissioner of Corporations holding such office on said date shall be ex officio a member of the commission for the first year of its existence. The remaining six members of the commission shall be appointed by the President, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, and the terms of office of such commissioners so first appointed shall be for two, three, four, five, six, and seven years, respectively, from January 1, 1914, as designated in each case by the President and thereafter all the commissioners shall hold office for seven years and be appointed by the President, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate. Any commissioner may be removed by the President for inefficiency, neglect of duty, or malfeasance in office. The commission shall choose a chairman from its own membership, and appoint a secretary, who shall receive a salary of $5,000 a year. The commissioners shall each receive a salary of $10,000 a year. A majority of the commission shall constitute a quorum for the transaction of business; but any one of the members of the commission may administer oaths and affirmations and sign subpœnas. The commission may, by one or more of the commissioners, prosecute any inquiry necessary to its duties in any part of the United States into any matter or question of fact pertaining to the business of any corporation or association subject to the provisions of this act. All orders adjudicating matters in controversy before the commission shall be approved by a majority of the commissioners.

"SEC. 2. That every corporation or association shall be subject to the jurisdiction of the commission which is engaged in commerce among the several States or with foreign nations, and which, by itself or with one or more other corporations or associations owned, operated, controlled, or organized in conjunction with it so as to constitute substantially a business unit, has annual gross receipts exceeding $3,000,000 from business within the United States, excepting corporations or associations subject to the act entitled 'An act to regulate commerce,' approved February 4, 1887, as amended, but including pipe-line companies.

"SEC. 3. That the term corporation or association, as used in this act, shall include all incorporated associations of two or more persons organized to carry on business as coowners with a view to profit and all unincorporated associations of two or more persons organized to carry on business as coowners with a view to profit.

"SEC. 4. That it shall be the duty of the commission and the commission shall have the power—

"(a) To determine whether any corporation or association engaged in commerce among the several States or with foreign nations, excepting corporations and associations, subject to the act entitled 'An act to regulate commerce,' approved February 4, 1887, as amended, but including pipe-line companies, is subject to the jurisdiction of the commission, and to determine whether any particular number or group of such corporations or associations are so owned, operated, controlled, or organized as to constitute substantially a business unit, having annual gross receipts exceeding $3,000,000 from business in the United States and are therefore subject to the jurisdiction of the commission. The determination of such questions of jurisdiction by the commission shall be final.

"(b) To require from all corporations or associations, subject to the jurisdiction of the commission, information as to their organization, conduct, management, security holders, financial condition, and business transactions to such a degree and extent and in such form as the commission may require, and to require from such corporations or associations complete access at all reasonable times to their records, books, accounts, minutes, papers, and all other documents, including the records of any of their executive or other committees.

"(c) To make, alter, enforce, and repeal regulations proper and necessary to enforce the provisions of this act.

"(d) To require, by regulations duly made, uniform or comparable methods of accounting by the corporations or associations subject to the jurisdiction of the commission, and to prescribe the forms of accounting necessary to that end.

"(e) To make public, from time to time, the information received by it in such form and to such extent as the commission shall by regulations prescribe.

"(f) To point out and make public, from time to time, specifically and separately, in such form and to such extent as in the discretion of the commission will best advance fair, honest, and efficient business, all cases of material overcapitalization, unfair competition, misrepresentation, or oppressive use of credit of which any corporation or association subject to the jurisdiction of the commission may have been guilty, and whenever any action of such corporation or association shall, in the opinion of the commission, constitute a violation of the laws of the United States, to present such case to the Attorney General for prosecution.

"(g) To make an annual report which shall be transmitted to Congress, setting forth data obtained by the commission relevant to the general question of the regulation of interstate commerce, together with any recommendations for further legislation which the commission may desire to present.

"(h) To make an investigation and report as to the methods best adapted to the carrying out of a final decree of dissolution under the act entitled "An act to protect trade and commerce against unlawful restraints and monopolies," approved July 2, 1890, when such a decree shall have been entered against any corporation subject to the jurisdiction of the commission and when the court having jurisdiction of the enforcement of such decree shall refer the case to the commission for its action as herein provided.

"SEC. 5. That for the purposes of this act and in aid of its powers herein granted the commission shall have power to compel the attendance and testimony of witnesses and the production of documentary evidence equivalent so far as applicable within its jurisdiction to the power conferred upon the Interstate Commerce Commission in the act entitled 'An act to regulate commerce,' approved February 4, 1887, as amended, and specifically the commission shall have power to require by subpœna the attendance and testimony of witnesses and the production of all books, papers, contracts, agreements, documents, or other things of every kind and nature whatsoever relating to any matter under investigation by the commission. Such attendance of witnesses and the production of such documentary evidence may be required from any place in the United States at any designated place of hearing, and in case of disobedience to such subpœna the commission, or any party to a proceeding before the commission, may, with the aid of the commission, invoke the aid of any court of the United States in requiring the attendance and testimony of witnesses and the production of books, papers, and documents under the provisions of this section.

"And any of the district courts of the United States within the jurisdiction of which such inquiry is carried on may, in case of contumacy or refusal to obey a subpœna issued by the commission to any corporation or association, subject to the provisions of this act, or other person, issue an order requiring such corporation or association, or other person, to appear before said commission (and produce books, documents, and papers, if so ordered) and give evidence touching the the matter in question, and any failure to obey such order of the court may be punished by such court as a contempt thereof. The claim that any such testimony or evidence may tend to criminate the person giving such evidence shall not excuse such witness from testifying.

"The testimony of any witness may, with the consent of the commission, be taken at the instance of a party in any proceeding or investigation pending before the commission by deposition at any time after the inquiry is instituted. The commission may also order testimony to be taken by deposition in any proceeding or investigation pending before it at any stage of such proceeding or investigation. Such deposition may be taken before any person authorized so to do by the commission and who has power to administer oaths.

"Any person may be compelled so to appear and depose and to produce documentary evidence in the same manner as witnesses may be compelled to appear and testify and produce documentary evidence before the commission as hereinbefore provided. Such testimony shall be reduced to writing.

"Witnesses whose testimony is taken under the provisions of this act shall severally be entitled to the same fees as are paid for like service in the courts of the United States.

"No person shall be excused from attending and testifying, or from producing books, papers, documents, or other things before this commission, or in obedience to the subpœna of the commission, whether such subpœna be signed or issued by one or more of the commissioners on the ground, or for the reason, that the testimony or evidence, documentary or otherwise, required of him may tend to criminate him or subject him to a penalty or forfeiture. But no natural person shall be prosecuted or subjected to any penalty or forfeiture for or on account of any transaction, matter, or thing concerning which he may testify under oath or produce evidence, documentary or otherwise, before said commission in obedience to a subpœna issued by said commission: Provided, That no person so testifying shall be exempt from prosecution and punishment for perjury committed in so testifying. The purpose of this provision is to give immunity only to natural persons who under oath testify in response to a subpœna of the commission or produce evidence, documentary or otherwise, under oath, in an inquiry instituted by the commission, in response to such subpœna.

"And to carry out and give effect to the provisions of this act, the commission is hereby authorized to designate and employ special agents or examiners, who shall have the power to administer oaths, examine witnesses and documentary evidence, and receive evidence.

"SEC. 6. That it shall be the duty of every corporation or association subject to the provisions of this act to comply with the terms hereof, and to comply with the orders and subpœnas of the commission issued pursuant to the authority herein granted, and it shall be the duty of every corporation, association, or person to furnish to the commission such information as the commission may deem necessary and proper to determine whether any corporation or association is subject to the jurisdiction of the commission.

"SEC. 7. That it shall be the duty of every corporation or association subject to the jurisdiction of the commission, within four months after January 1, 1914, or, if becoming subject thereto after said date, then within two months after so becoming subject thereto, to file with the commission written statements under oath showing such facts as to its organization, conduct, financial condition, management, security holders, operations, and business transactions as may be prescribed by the commission, and it shall be the duty of every corporation or association subject to the jurisdiction of the commission to furnish to the commission from time to time such information as to its organization, conduct, financial condition, management, security holders, operations, and business transactions, and to such degree and extent and in such form as may be prescribed by the commission, and to afford to the commission or its duly authorized agents complete access to all its records, books, accounts, minutes, and papers, and all other documents, including the records of any of its executive or other committees.

"SEC. 8. That neglect or failure by any corporation or association or by the officers or agents of any such corporation or association, subject to any of the provisions of this act, to comply with the terms hereof or failure or refusal to furnish information required by the commission within 60 days after written demand for such information, shall constitute a misdemeanor and shall be punished by fine of not more than $100 for each and every day of the continuance of such neglect or failure. Any person who shall willfully make or give to said commission any false or deceptive return or statement required by this act, knowing the same to be false or calculated to deceive in any material particular, shall be deemed to be guilty of a misdemeanor and upon conviction shall be punished by fine of not more than $5,000 or by imprisonment for not more than two years, or by both fine and imprisonment.

"SEC. 9. That if any provision or requirement of this act shall for any reason be held unconstitutional the validity of the remaining provisions or requirements of this act shall not be affected thereby."

Mr. ADAMSON. I move the previous question on the motion to recommit.

The previous question was ordered.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the motion to recommit.

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. MURDOCK) there were—ayes 19, noes 151.

Accordingly the motion to recommit was rejected.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the passage of the bill.

The bill was passed.

On motion of Mr. ADAMSON, a motion to reconsider the last vote was laid on the table.

The SPEAKER. The next bill reported from the Committee of the Whole is the bill (H. R. 15657) to supplement existing laws against unlawful restraints and monopolies, and for other purposes. Is a separate vote demanded on any amendment?

Mr. MANN. There is but one amendment.
Mr. GARDNER. There were other amendments.
Mr. MANN. They were amendments to the amendment.
Mr. GARDNER. Mr. Speaker, a parliamentary inquiry.
The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.
Mr. GARDNER. I rise to ask whether it is true that when a bill is reported back from the Committee of the Whole with a perfected amendment it is impossible to get a record vote on an amendment to that amendment adopted in committee?
The SPEAKER. It comes back to the House in the form of one amendment.
Mr. GARDNER. The reason I asked the question was that when the rule was introduced it was specifically stated that it would be possible to get a separate vote on certain amendments.
Mr. GARNER. That was in Committee of the Whole.
Mr. GARDNER. A record vote.
The SPEAKER. Who made that statement? The Chair did not.
Mr. GARDNER. The Chair did not state it.
The SPEAKER. There is only one amendment to this bill. The question is on the amendment.
The amendment was agreed to.
The bill as amended was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, and was accordingly read the third time.
The SPEAKER. The question is on the passage of the bill.
Mr. WEBB. Mr. Speaker, I demand the yeas and nays.
Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, I ask for the yeas and nays.
Mr. MURDOCK. I ask for the yeas and nays, too, Mr. Speaker, if everybody is making the demand.
The SPEAKER. The gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. WEBB], the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN], and the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. MURDOCK] demand the yeas and nays.
The yeas and nays were ordered.
The question was taken; and there were—yeas 277, nays 54, answered "present" 3, not voting 99, as follows:

Mr. DALE (for the bill) with Mr. LEVY (against).
Mr. DONOHOE (for the bill) with Mr. MERRITT (against).
Mr. MONTAGUE (for the bill) with Mr. GREENE of Massachusetts (against).
Mr. GERRY. Mr. Speaker, I am paired with the gentleman from Missouri, Mr. RUBEY. I wish to withdraw my vote of "no" and answer "present."

The Clerk called the name of Mr. GERRY, and he answered "Present," as above recorded.

Mr. FORDNEY. Mr. Speaker, I voted "no." I find I am paired with the gentleman from Tennessee, Mr. GARRETT. I wish to withdraw my vote and answer "present."

The Clerk called the name of Mr. FORDNEY, and he answered "Present," as above recorded.

Mr. MOON. Mr. Speaker, I desire to vote "aye" on this bill. I do not know whether I am entitled to vote or not. I was in the committee room in the preparation of a matter that is to be presented to the House before adjournment. I did not hear the bell for roll call until a few moments ago.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman does not bring himself within the rule.

Mr. TOWNSEND. Mr. Speaker, can I be recorded on this vote?

The SPEAKER. What is the gentleman's request?

Mr. TOWNSEND. I wish to vote "aye" on this bill.

The SPEAKER. Was the gentleman in the Hall and listening when his name should have been called?

Mr. TOWNSEND. I was not, Mr. Speaker. I thought it was a call of the House.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman does not bring himself within the rule.

The result of the vote was then announced as above recorded.

On motion of Mr. WEBB, a motion to reconsider the vote whereby the bill was passed was laid on the table.

REGULATION OF RAILWAY STOCKS AND BONDS.

The SPEAKER. The next bill reported from the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union is the bill 16586, to amend section 20 of an act to regulate commerce to prevent overissues of securities by carriers, and for other purposes, and the question is on the amendment.

The question was taken, and the amendment was agreed to.

The SPEAKER. The question now is on the engrossment and third reading of the bill.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, and was read the third time.

Mr. BARTLETT. Mr. Speaker, I desire to submit a motion to recommit.

The SPEAKER. Is the gentleman from Georgia opposed to the bill?

Mr. BARTLETT. I am.

The SPEAKER. Does any gentleman on the minority of the committee that reported the bill desire to offer a motion to recommit? [After a pause.] Apparently not. The Clerk will report the motion to recommit.

The Clerk read as follows:

Mr. BARTLETT moves to recommit the bill to the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce, with instructions to report the bill back to the House with the following amendment: Add, on page 16, after the word "court," in line 26, the following: "Provided, That nothing contained in this act shall deprive the railroad commissions or public service or utilities commissions of the various States from exercising all the powers now conferred upon them by the various States."

Mr. ADAMSON. Mr. Chairman, I move the previous question on the motion to recommit.

The previous question was ordered.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the motion to recommit.

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. BARTLETT) there were 39 ayes and 228 noes.

So the motion to recommit was rejected.

The SPEAKER. The question now is on the passage of the bill.

Mr. RAYBURN and Mr. MANN demanded the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 325, nays 12, answered "present" 2, not voting 94, as follows:

So the bill was passed.

The Clerk announced the following additional pairs:

On the vote:

Mr. DALE (for the bill) with Mr. LEVY (against).

Mr. STEPHENS of Mississippi with Mr. AINEY.

The result of the vote was announced as above recorded.

Mr. ADAMSON. Mr. Speaker, I think it is necessary to amend the title.

The SPEAKER. Without objection, the title will be amended in accordance with the text.

There was no objection.

On motion of Mr. ADAMSON, a motion to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed was laid on the table.

GILL AGAINST DYER.

The SPEAKER. The Chair desires to make this announcement. By agreement of those concerned the contested-election case of Gill against Dyer will be called after the reading of the Journal on the morning of Thursday, June 18, and continued on the 19th if necessary.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

By unanimous consent, leave of absence was granted as follows:

To Mr. NEELEY of Kansas, indefinitely, on account of important business.

To Mr. GORDON, indefinitely, on account of illness in his family.

To Mr. BRODBECK, for five days, on account of death and burial of his brother-in-law.

ENROLLED BILLS SIGNED.

Mr. ASHBROOK, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that they had examined and found truly enrolled bills of the following title, when the Speaker signed the same:

H. R. 3334. An act authorizing the quitclaiming of the interest of the United States in certain land situated in Hampden County, Mass.

The SPEAKER announced his signature to enrolled bills of the following title:

S. 4168. An act granting pensions and increase of pensions to certain soldiers and sailors of the Civil War and certain widows and dependent relatives of such soldiers and sailors;

S. 4552. An act granting pensions and increase of pensions to certain soldiers and sailors of the Civil War and certain widows and dependent relatives of such soldiers and sailors; and

S. 4352. An act granting pensions and increase of pensions to certain soldiers and sailors of the Civil War and certain widows and dependent relatives of such soldiers and sailors.

ENROLLED BILL PRESENTED TO THE PRESIDENT FOR HIS APPROVAL.

Mr. ASHBROOK, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that this day they had presented to the President of the United States for his approval the following bill:

H. R. 15190. An act to amend section 103 of the act entitled "An act to codify, revise, and amend the laws relating to the judiciary," approved March 3, 1911, as amended by the act of Congress approved March 3, 1913.

HOUR OF MEETING TO-MORROW.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that when the House adjourns to-night it adjourn to meet at 11 o'clock to-morrow morning.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New York asks unanimous consent that when the House adjourns to-night it adjourn to meet at 11 a. m. to-morrow. Is there objection?

Mr. MANN. Oh, I object.

SUNDRY CIVIL APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of the bill H. R. 17041, the sundry civil appropriation bill.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New York moves that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of the bill H. R. 17041.

Mr. FITZGERALD. And pending that motion, Mr. Speaker, I desire to inquire of the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. GILLETT] if we can agree upon the time for general debate?

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, I do not think the gentleman from Massachusetts needs to bother himself about that to-night. The gentleman intends to rise as soon as he dispenses with the first reading of the bill?

Mr. FITZGERALD. Yes; I am going to move to rise, but I desire to see if we could not fix some time for general debate. I ask unanimous consent that the time for general debate be equally divided, one-half to be controlled by the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. GILLETT] and one-half by myself.

Mr. MANN. I object. It is not a proper request to be made to-night; make it to-morrow.

The SPEAKER. The question is on going into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the House resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of the bill H. R. 17041, with Mr. HARDWICK in the chair.

The CHAIRMAN. The House is in Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of the bill H. R. 17041, the sundry civil appropriation bill, which the Clerk will report by title.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (H. R. 17041) making appropriations for sundry civil expenses of the Government for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1915, and for other purposes.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to dispense with the first reading of the bill.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from New York asks unanimous consent to dispense with the first reading of the bill. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Chairman, I move that the committee do now rise.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the committee rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. HARDWICK, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that committee had had under consideration the bill H. R. 17041, the sundry civil appropriation bill, and had come to no resolution thereon.

ADJOURNMENT.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House do now adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; accordingly (at 5 o'clock and 36 minutes p. m.) the House adjourned to meet to-morrow, Saturday, June 6, 1914, at 12 o'clock noon.

SENATE.

SATURDAY, June 6, 1914.

(Continuation of the legislative day of Friday, June 5, 1914.)

The Senate reassembled at 11 o'clock a. m. on the expiration of the recess.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senate resumes the consideration of House bill 14385, the unfinished business.

PANAMA CANAL TOLLS.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill H. R. 14385) to amend section 5 of an act to provide for the opening, maintenance, protection, and operation of the Panama Canal, and the sanitation of the Canal Zone, approved August 24, 1912.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary will call the roll.

The Secretary called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Ashurst	Gallinger	Martine, N. J.	Smith, S. C.
Borah	Goff	Nelson	Smoot
Brady	Gronna	Norris	Sterling
Bristow	Jones	O'Gorman	Sutherland
Bryan	Kenyon	Overman	Swanson
Burton	Kern	Owen	Thornton
Catron	Lane	Page	Townsend
Chamberlain	Lea, Tenn.	Perkins	Vardaman
Chilton	Lee, Md.	Root	Walsh
Clark, Wyo.	Lodge	Sheppard	West
Colt	McCumber	Sherman	White
Culberson	McLean	Simmons	Williams
Cummins	Martin, Va.	Smith, Ga.	Works

Mr. CHILTON. I wish to announce that the Senator from New Mexico [Mr. FALL] is necessarily absent from the Chamber.

Mr. WHITE. I wish to announce that the Senator from Alabama [Mr. BANKHEAD] is necessarily absent, and that he is paired with the Senator from West Virginia [Mr. GOFF]. I will allow this announcement to stand for the day.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Fifty-two Senators have answered to the roll call. There is a quorum present.

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President, a longer time has elapsed than was expected since I suspended the discussion of the subject I was considering on Thursday. I do not regret the delay. When I yielded to the Senator from Indiana [Mr. KERN] to move an adjournment in order that Senators might witness the noble and inspiring ceremonies about to occur at Arlington I had in mind the character of the occasion. I knew that the lofty and patriotic sentiments which would fall upon the ears of that audience must in some measure awaken the American spirit which I desire so much to invoke. The scene of the men of 1861, of the North and the South, standing in a sacred place, united by common sentiment and by common brotherhood, could not have an effect other than to intensify the patriotism and devotion we feel for the country of which we are all citizens. And when yesterday Senators desired to recall the services of the men of 1861 of the Union Army I could make no objection, for I knew, as you all knew, that to revive the memories of those immortal days was to increase the great debt of gratitude which every loyal heart feels toward the men of that heroic time, and the discussion could but awaken the spirit of Americanism and devotion to American interests in the light of which the problem before us ought to be solved.

When I think of those days and speak of the men of the Union Army—I am not disparaging the men of the southern army, inspired with like courage, led, I believe, by a like sense of duty—I must pause to pay these veterans of the Army of the North the tribute which rises instinctively to my lips. I have seen many a badge, many a decoration. I have seen the cross of the Legion of Honor, sometimes beautiful with its color and flashing with its jewels, which France bestows upon the men whom she delights to honor. I have seen the Iron Cross of Germany that that stalwart nation pins upon the bosom of men who have done great deeds for her. I have seen the badge which England gives to the men who have written chapters of glory for her. But I have never seen any badge or any decoration that so stirs every emotion of the patriotic soul as the little bronze button that rises and falls with the heartbeats of the member of the Grand Army of the Republic. And whenever those days of 1861 are recalled, no matter from what point of view, whether from the standpoint of the sons of the South or the standpoint of the sons of the North, I know that those who hear will be moved by a livelier sense of the duty that we of this generation owe to the country which they so much loved and which they still are willing to serve.

What little I have to say this morning in concluding my remarks of Thursday I hope will be heard in that spirit. I call upon that new flood of light to illuminate the duty, the judgment, the mind, the heart of every patriotic American citizen.

It will be remembered that in my discussion of Thursday I did not attempt to express my opinion with regard to the proper interpretation of the treaty of 1901. I will do that before the debate has closed in connection with an amendment that I shall offer to the pending bill. I devoted myself rigidly to the task of showing what Great Britain thought of this treaty, and in what respects that nation believed we had violated it in passing the act of 1912.

I had expressed extreme wonder and amazement that there could be found an American citizen who was willing to put upon the treaty an interpretation far more unfavorable to the American Nation than had been put upon it by Great Britain herself, whose commerce is said to be involved and whose profits are said to be at peril. I can not yet understand why an American is not willing to assume that the keen self-interest of Great Britain will not carry the interpretation as far as it can be carried, even from a selfish standpoint, against the United States.

I restate very briefly the British view—and there is no doubt about the British view; it is not collected in vague and fugitive opinions which may have been set afloat by irresponsible persons who may be subjects of Great Britain. The British view is set down accurately with reasons in the form of an argument by the authorized representative of that Government. I had recalled to the attention of the Senate the letter written by Lord Grey, the final word upon this subject by the British foreign office, and expressive of the final conclusions of that Government. I had shown that in Lord Grey's letter the statute of 1912 was assailed, first, because we had given to the President of the United States the power to discriminate in favor of American shipping engaged in business between nations. That objection raises the whole dispute with regard to the construction of the treaty, and unquestionably England does take the position that we are bound by the rules of the Hay-Pauncefote treaty, and are bound to give to the ships of all nations the same advantages and to impose upon them the same rates of charge that are made against our ships engaged in foreign trade. That is a controversy which must be settled in some way. I think, as I will show hereafter, that it ought to be settled, first, by exhausting all the resources of diplomacy, fellowship, good feeling; and that failing, it ought to be settled by arbitration, not, however, in The Hague tribunal, all the members of which would be chosen from nations interested adversely to the United States, but settled by a tribunal created for the occasion composed of an equal number of Americans and Englishmen and an arbiter between them if they can agree upon one.

I pass that and come to the second objection which England makes, and it is in the nature of a forecast rather than in the nature of a present protest. England says, practically, that we have no right to allow the ships of Panama to pass through the canal without charge. I am sorry the Senator from New York [Mr. ROOT] is not here. He has a decided view with regard to the interpretation of this treaty; he has expressed it with great fullness, with great argumentative force, and I should like to know from him, or from any other Senator who so highly values the good will of Great Britain and the esteem of the world—I should like to know from some Senator who takes the view that we have no other rights in the canal save those which are shared by all the nations of the world, whether we ought to yield to this suggestion on the part of Great Britain in order to hold her esteem and to recognize in a broad, magnanimous way her insistence in that respect. In all this debate, in all this evident attempt to court the good opinion and the favor of the nations of the world, we have never heard the suggestion that in this respect we ought to change the construction that we have already put upon this agreement.

Third, England says—I use that name synonomously with Great Britain, of course—if our provision touching railroad-owned ships or ships in which railroad companies have an interest comprises the railroads of Canada—she does not use the name "Canada," but the inference is so plain that no one can avoid it—that if our provision with regard to railroad-owned ships affects the interest of Canada, then she stands ready to protest against that part of our act.

Now, let us inquire of these advocates of extreme and servile, as I look at it, desire to stand well with the rest of the world, why do they not ask that we repeal that provision in the act of 1912? I should like some one to answer that question before this debate has concluded. The President of the United States does not ask Congress to repeal that provision in our law. Why does he not? England's attitude toward that phase of the matter is more decided, more positive, as we can gather from inference, than is her attitude toward our provision with regard to the coastwise trade. That, however, leads me to inquire—for the argument would not be complete unless I did—whether Canadian railroads are affected by our provision prohibiting railroad owned or controlled ships from the use of the canal? Let us see. The Panama Canal act provides:

> From and after the 1st day of July, 1914, it shall be unlawful for any railroad company or other common carrier subject to the act to regulate commerce to own, lease, operate, control, or have any interest whatsoever—by stock ownership or otherwise, either directly, indirectly, through any holding company, or by stockholders or directors in common, or in any other manner—in any common carrier by water operated through the Panama Canal or elsewhere with which said railroad or other carrier aforesaid does or may compete for traffic or any vessel carrying freight or passengers upon said water route or elsewhere with which said railroad or other carrier aforesaid does or may compete for traffic.

The sole question, then, in order to settle the inquiry I have just made, is this: Are the Canadian railroads, or any of them, subject to the provisions of the act of 1887, being an act to regulate commerce? I do not believe there will be any controversy about that. They are subject to that act; they are subject to the jurisdiction of the Interstate Commerce Commission, in so far as they do business in the United States, and there are at least two of the Canadian railroads that have recognized the jurisdiction of the Interstate Commerce Commission, as I have been informed and as I believe. They are the Grand Trunk Railroad and the Canadian Pacific.

Let me read just a paragraph from the act of 1887, in order to show that these Canadian railroads will either be compelled to quit doing business in the United States and with the United States or they will fall within the provisions of the canal act, as they have fallen heretofore within the provisions of the act of 1887. That act, after reciting certain other corporations that are within the act, says that it shall apply—> to any common carrier or carriers engaged in the transportation of passengers or property wholly by railroad (or partly by railroad and partly by water when both are used under a common control, management, or arrangement for a continuous carriage or shipment) from one State or Territory of the United States or the District of Columbia to any other State or Territory of the United States or the District of Columbia, or from one place in a Territory to another place in the same Territory, or from any place in the United States to an adjacent foreign country, or from any place in the United States through a foreign country to any other place in the United States.

This quotation from the interstate-commerce act suffices to show how well founded is the fear of Great Britain, expressed in the letter of Lord Grey, that some of her railroads would fall within the prohibition of the act of 1912, and that a Canadian railroad can no more own ships or control ships passing through the Panama Canal when the commerce of the United States is affected than can an American railroad, and it ought to be so. We ought to protect the interests of the people of the United States; and if a Canadian railroad doing business in the United States threatens the welfare of our people by owning or controlling ships passing through the Panama Canal, this act applies. I should like to know from the advocates of the British construction of the treaty in that regard what they propose to do when England reasserts that we have violated the Hay-Pauncefote treaty because we have forbidden railroad-owned ships that may be under the Canadian sovereignty from passing through the canal.

I suppose that when that contingency arises, as my friend from Idaho [Mr. BORAH] said a day or two ago, we will be called upon to take another bitter dose of humiliation; but the President has not asked us to repeal the law in that regard, although Great Britain has expressed an opinion about it, and I assume that it is a cause of irritation that in the foreign policy of the administration ought to be allayed.

The Senator from Georgia [Mr. SMITH] and the Senator from North Carolina [Mr. SIMMONS] did not ask us to repeal our law in that respect, although from some standpoints it is more obviously a violation of the treaty than is the exemption of our coastwise trade from tolls. But I pass from that to the next objection.

The next objection that England makes is that if the provision in the law of 1912 relating to trust-controlled ships is applicable to her, then she desires to make further representations. I assume that she will never be vexed in that respect, because it is very clear that this provision of the act of 1912 does not apply to Great Britain and can not apply to Great Britain. The reason is that our act limits the operation of this provision of the statute to coastwise traffic; and, inasmuch as Great Britain can not engage in that traffic, it is not to be presumed that she will ever claim that there is a violation of the treaty in that regard. In order that it may be in the minds of Senators, I will read the provision of the canal act as to this subject:

No vessel permitted to engage in the coastwise or foreign trade of the United States—

I think I will have to recall what I have just said. My recollection was that it was limited to the coastwise trade, but it is not—

No vessel permitted to engage in the coastwise or foreign trade of the United States shall be permitted to enter or pass through said canal if such ship is owned, chartered, operated, or controlled by any person or company which is doing business in violation of the provisions of the act of Congress approved July 2, 1890, entitled "An act to protect trade and commerce against unlawful restraints and monopolies."

This, it is seen, is confined not to the coastwise trade but to our coastwise trade and to our foreign trade. That, I take it, however, could never affect England or Great Britain, because ships engaged in foreign trade, flying a foreign flag and under foreign register, can not come within the provisions of that part of the act.

The fifth and last objection made by Great Britain with regard to the act of 1912 relates to coastwise ships, and I reassert that England has never suggested that coastwise trade was within the scope or the meaning of the Hay-Pauncefote treaty. On the contrary, in the most pointed way, diplomatically, she has agreed that our coastwise trade is not within the purview of the treaty. She says, however, that from her standpoint it is impossible to restrict the coastwise trade within its proper limits, and that we will find it impossible to carry on coastwise traffic without at the same time carrying on foreign traffic. That is an admission with regard to the meaning of the treaty as applied to coastwise trade, but a reservation with regard to the regulations under which the trade is actually conducted.

Lord Grey says, in the letter to which I have referred, first, that he objects because by the exemption of our coastwise trade in the computation a greater burden is put upon foreign ships with regard to the cost of maintenance and operation and original investment, and that therefore a charge so computed is not just and equitable. Now, we all agree that these charges made to all the foreign ships must be just and equitable. That particular claim was immediately answered by the Secretary of State, Mr. Knox, in which he pointed out that Lord Grey's letter was probably written in ignorance of the proclamation that had been issued by President Taft, which showed that in ascertaining what the charge should be upon foreign ships the entire tonnage of the canal had been taken into account. That entirely disposed of the first objection.

The second objection which Lord Grey makes is that if the ships engaged in the coastwise trade are permitted to enter any foreign port upon their passage from one coast to the other and do a business from a foreign port to a port in the United States, then, under the guise of coastwise trade, we shall be actually carrying on foreign business. Granting the British construction of the treaty that we are bound by these rules to equality of tolls, the claim of Great Britain in that respect would be true; but if we so frame our regulations, if we so exercise and execute this exemption, that a coastwise ship shall not do an international business, then we have answered the extreme claim of Great Britain.

Further, Lord Grey says that the traffic carried in coastwise ships, when landed at a port on one coast or the other of the country, might be taken up and loaded in a ship destined to a foreign port, and in that way the commerce might receive the benefit of the exemption against the British construction of the treaty. I grant that if that were done, under the British view it would be a violation of our agreement. Great Britain says there is danger that it would be done; but it is not necessary that it shall be done, and that has nothing to do with the principle for which we are contending, namely, that we have an absolute right to deal with our internal shipping and our internal affairs as we think best; that we have a right to exercise all the sovereignty which a nation inherently possesses with regard to our internal affairs and our internal interests to promote the welfare of our own people and to enhance the common good of all our citizens.

This, Senators, is the view of Great Britain.

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Iowa yield to the Senator from North Carolina?

Mr. CUMMINS. I yield.

Mr. SIMMONS. I desire to say, in interrupting the Senator, that I am not doing so in a controversial spirit; and I would not interrupt him at all but for the fact that I think, as a result of the failure to quote the whole of Mr. Innes's and Lord Grey's statements with reference to the effect upon British shipping of the exemption of our coastwise trade, an erroneous impression has been created, and I have risen simply to make that correction.

Before I do that, however, I wish to say to the Senator that I think probably he is correct in the statement that the British note to our Secretary of State would seem to indicate three objections, which the Senator has mentioned. The first is that the exemption of our coastwise trade probably would throw an additional burden upon the ships of other countries, because our ships would not participate in paying their pro rata part of the cost of maintaining the canal. The Senator said that inasmuch as the proclamation of the President fixing the rates bases those rates upon the assumption that all American coastwise trade shall pay tolls, that eliminates the difficulty.

Possibly that might be true if that were a part of the permanent law of the land; but I wish to call the Senator's attention to the fact that this is done merely in a proclamation of the President fixing present rates, and the basis of rates for the present time. Those rates can be changed in any respect or in all respects in six months. I think the provision is that after giving six months' notice they can be changed.

That expedient, therefore, is one that is not permanent. It is subject to change by the present Executive, or by the next Executive, or at any time the United States might see fit to base the tolls upon some other arrangement than the assumption that the American coastwise trade paid tolls.

I do not know whether I make myself clear or not. I hope I do.

Mr. CUMMINS. Perfectly so.

Mr. O'GORMAN rose.

Mr. CUMMINS. I will yield in a moment to the Senator from New York.

Mr. SIMMONS. Will the Senator from New York permit me to finish my several statements? I am just directing the attention of the Senator from Iowa to——

Mr. CUMMINS. May I reply to one statement made by the Senator from North Carolina, in order that we may get together as nearly as possible?

Mr. SIMMONS. Yes.

Mr. CUMMINS. I recognize the truth of the statement just made by the Senator from North Carolina, and I recognize its force. There ought to be in the canal law a provision that would make it compulsory upon the President to take into account the entire tonnage of the canal in fixing the rates on foreign ships.

That, however, is one thing, and the repeal of the exemption is quite another; and to put a construction on the treaty by a repeal under the recommendation of the President so that we are bound for all time, save at the risk of great offense, to accept an interpretation which compels us to put the same charge upon our coastwise trade that we impose upon our foreign trade is a very different thing.

If the Senator from North Carolina will propose a substitute for this bill taking away that discretion from the President, and making it mandatory that all the tonnage of the canal shall be considered in fixing the tolls upon foreign ships, so that the United States alone will bear whatever burden may be created by the exemption of coastwise ships, I will support it with very great pleasure.

Mr. O'GORMAN rose.

Mr. SIMMONS. If the Senator from New York will pardon me just a minute, I simply meant to say that so far as that particular objection on the part of Great Britain is concerned—and I want to be entirely frank in the discussion of this question—I thought that objection would be removed if the basis upon which tolls are fixed in the President's proclamation were a part of the law, and permanent, instead of being subject to change at the will of the administration. That was the only point I wished to make about that.

Mr. O'GORMAN. Mr. President——

Mr. SIMMONS. I should be glad if the Senator would let me finish my statement.

Mr. O'GORMAN. I desire to say a word——

Mr. CUMMINS. Perhaps the Senator from New York wishes to make a suggestion on this point?

Mr. O'GORMAN. I do; on this point.

Mr. CUMMINS. I am glad to yield to him.

Mr. O'GORMAN. I am surprised that the Senator from North Carolina views the suggestion contained in the second note of protest——

Mr. SIMMONS. I have not reached that.

Mr. O'GORMAN. I beg the Senator's pardon.

Mr. SIMMONS. The Senator is anticipating what I was about to say.

Mr. O'GORMAN. The Senator has referred to the claim made by the British Government that the exemption of American coastwise vessels might result in imposing upon foreign vessels an undue share of the cost of the maintenance and upkeep of the canal.

Mr. SIMMONS. Yes.

Mr. O'GORMAN. I am surprised that the Senator from North Carolina, who at various times has viewed this subject from different angles, and at various times has adopted various views of this controversy, in all his investigation of it has not been impressed with the fact that the fixing of these rates has not been upon the basis of securing an adequate or a reasonable return to the Government that built the canal; that these rates never can be self-sustaining; that these rates are fixed as low as they are now because of the commercial necessity of having the Panama Canal compete with the Suez Canal, a canal that cost but one-quarter as much as the Panama Canal, and in which canal the present rate is the equivalent of practically $1.20 per ton, the same figure fixed in the proclamation of President Taft.

The generally recognized opinion as to the cost of maintenance of this canal fixes the amount at $27,000,000 a year—$5,000,000 for actual cost of maintenance, $10,000,000 being the minimum amount that will be required for the military defense of the canal and for the necessity of preserving its neutrality, and $12,000,000 more representing a 3 per cent return on the initial cost of $400,000,000. From abundant evidence presented to the committee, of which the Senator from North Carolina is a member, it is estimated that for a number of years there will pass through the Panama Canal but 10,000,000 tons a year. If the total cost imposed upon this Government in the maintenance of the canal is $27,000,000 a year, and the traffic passing through will be but 10,000,000 tons, that would place upon each ton, on a fair and equitable basis, a charge of $2.70 instead of $1.20.

In no instance can any foreign Government—Great Britain or any other nation—complain that our rates are unjust, discriminatory, or inequitable unless the charge per ton should exceed $2.70 instead of being placed, as it is, at the low and inadequate rate of $1.20. I say "inadequate" in view of the cost of the canal and the cost of maintenance; but the charge is necessarily made inadequate because if we charged more we could not divert business from the Suez Canal, in which Great Britain to-day has the largest commercial interest of any nation on earth.

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. President——

Mr. CUMMINS. I yield further to the Senator from North Carolina.

Mr. SIMMONS. Undoubtedly in fixing rates below the $1.25 limit prescribed in the act the President did have in view the fact that this canal would compete with the Suez Canal. There is no question about that. The President himself, however, in his Ottawa speech to which I have heretofore alluded, and which, if I can find, I shall be glad——

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President, may I make a suggestion to the Senator from North Carolina? I wish he would pursue his debate with me, leaving to some other time a reply to the Senator from New York.

Mr. SIMMONS. I will say just a word in reply to the Senator. The President, in his Ottawa speech, said that he had fixed the toll rate upon the canal upon the basis of assuming that American coastwise trade was to pay tolls, and because of that he said that neither England nor any other foreign country had any right to complain of that exemption. Now, it is true, as the Senator says, that the canal is not going to pay expenses right away. The Suez Canal did not in the beginning. It soon did. This canal also, paralleling the history of the Suez Canal, will soon be paying all the expenses of operation, and more. I have no question in the world about the fact that in the course of a very few years this canal will be making a profit, and in the course of 30 or 40 years, a very small time in the history and life of a nation, the canal, like the Suez Canal, will become a great profit-bearing property. The President was seeking to fix a basis not for the present but for the future. That was the theory of the President, and that was the theory that is advanced in all the subsequent declarations with regard to this matter. I should like to have answered the Senator very fully, but I appreciate the situation, and I do not wish to trespass unnecessarily upon the time of the Senator from Iowa.

I was going to say, when the Senator interrupted me, if this were a permanent arrangement; if it were a part of the law of the land that the rates should be based upon the theory that coastwise trade did pay tolls, then that part of the British protest might lose its force. I say that in frankness.

The Senator says that the British Government has protested also upon the ground that our coastwise vessels do now actually engage in foreign trade. That, I believe, was established in the hearings before the committee from the testimony of the Commissioner of Navigation. They do now actually engage to some extent, and a very considerable extent, I think, in foreign trade. The British Government protests with reference to that. That also might be adjusted. That might be arranged. As the Commissioner of Navigation said, and as is perfectly apparent, this Government could prescribe such rigid regulations that our coastwise vessels would not be permitted hereafter to engage to any extent whatever in foreign trade, and that part of the British protest would lose its force.

Mr. O'GORMAN. Mr. President——

Mr. SIMMONS. I do not understand, however——

Mr. O'GORMAN. Just one question.

Mr. SIMMONS. I hope the Senator will let me state my position.

Mr. O'GORMAN. I wish to ask just a simple question at this point. Of course, when the Senator speaks of our coastwise shipping engaging in foreign trade he does not mean that our coastwise ships engage in over-seas trade. They do occasionally engage in Cuban and Mexican trade adjacent to our southern border.

Mr. SIMMONS. With South America or Central America. I do not mean to say that they go to Europe or to Asia, but I mean to say that they do engage in foreign trade as a matter of fact, in our trade with all the countries of this hemisphere. There is no dispute about that.

Mr. CUMMINS. We are discussing a principle. Of course it does not apply to Europe and Asia, but it does apply to the coasts of Central America and Mexico and possibly some other South American ports; but the principle remains the same.

Mr. SIMMONS. I say that could be avoided by restricting by legislation more rigidly the rights of vessels enrolled for the coastwise trade. But I do not understand that that is the gravamen of the contention of Great Britain with reference to the exemption of our coastwise trade from tolls. My understanding is that the contention is that under the stipulations of the treaty this Government has entered into an agreement with Great Britain, of which the balance of the world become the beneficiaries, that we will not impose any charges upon the canal that will, in effect, discriminate against the shipping, the traffic, of other countries. It is not a question of vessels at all, but a question whether the effect of the imposition of tolls upon one class of vessels and the exemption of another class of vessels results in a discrimination against the traffic of the citizens or the subjects of another country. That is the gravamen. Now——

Mr. CUMMINS. Does the Senator desire to do more than to call that to my attention?

Mr. SIMMONS. Yes; I do.

Mr. CUMMINS. I can not, of course, yield to allow a full and complete argument.

Mr. SIMMONS. If the Senator will permit me just a minute——

Mr. CUMMINS. Very well.

Mr. SIMMONS. I was simply going to read from the notes and correspondence that the Senator has just referred to, stating his contention, to show that the Senator had not, in my judgment, read the correspondence correctly, or rather had not stated it correctly, as I understand it.

Mr. CUMMINS. I have read a part of it, and I am about to read more of it.

Mr. SIMMONS. That is the very point. I thought the Senator had not read the whole of it. I know the Senator from New York read only a part of it. I think the part he read left an interpretation which was directly the reverse of that which the full context imports. Now, if the Senator will permit me——

Mr. CUMMINS. I will be very glad to hear the Senator read that part of it which he thinks bears some other construction.

Mr. SIMMONS. In the first note of Mr. Innes he said:

> If the trade should be so regulated—

Meaning the coastwise trade—

> If the trade should be so regulated as to make it certain that only bona fide coastwise traffic which is reserved for United States vessels would be benefited by this exemption, it may be that no objection could be taken.

Several Senators in discussing it have read that and stopped there. The Senator from New York did that in his speech. The next sentence, however, shows exactly what he did mean, and it shows he meant exactly what I said a minute ago, that the contention of their Government was that there should be absolute equality, and anything that interfered with absolute equality was in contravention of the treaty.

He then adds:

But it appears to my Government that it would be impossible to frame regulations which would prevent the exemption from resulting, in fact, in a preference to United States shipping, and consequently in an infraction of the treaty.

Earl Grey, secretary of the British foreign office, writing upon the same subject, said:

Coastwise trade can not be circumscribed so completely that benefits conferred upon it will not affect vessels engaged in the foreign trade.

Mr. O'GORMAN. Mr. President——

Mr. SIMMONS. I understand the meaning of those statements on the part of Earl Grey and Mr. Innes to be that they insist that Great Britain and all the beneficiaries are entitled to absolute equality with respect to their traffic passing through the canal, and that any exemption or any regulation which will place their traffic at a disadvantage in passing through the canal, whether it affects a coastwise vessel or an over-seas vessel, would be a violation of the agreement, and that any such discrimination in the charges upon the canal against the ships of other countries in favor of the ships of this country would be inadmissible under the treaty.

Mr. O'GORMAN. Mr. President——

Mr. SIMMONS. I could elaborate that argument, but I simply wanted to state it to the Senator from Iowa.

Mr. CUMMINS. I yield to the Senator from New York.

Mr. O'GORMAN. I dislike to trespass further upon the time of the Senator from Iowa, but on account of the personal allusion made by the Senator from North Carolina I ask to say a word. The Senator stated that in quoting the first note of protest from Great Britain I did not refer in detail to the entire statement.

Mr. SIMMONS. That he did not quote the entire statement.

Mr. O'GORMAN. That I did not quote the entire statement. The Senator is in error in his recollection.

Mr. SIMMONS. If I am, I withdraw that statement.

Mr. O'GORMAN. I called attention to the fact that in that note of protest the British Government recognized the propriety of the American Government exempting American coastwise vessels from the payment of tolls going through the canal. I then added that the British Government pointed out the difficulty, as they viewed it, in the way of restricting coastwise vessels to local trade, and in that connection I stated that the British Government probably knew less than our own officials as to the ease with which coastwise vessels could be confined to local trade, because the Commissioner of Navigation, Mr. Chamberlain, who testified before us, said there would be no difficulty in so regulating our navigation as to confine our coastwise vessels to strictly coastwise trade, and I prefer to take the judgment of our own Commissioner of Navigation as to how our own navigation laws can be enforced rather than the judgment of a member of some foreign Government.

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. President, I hope the Senator from Iowa will permit me.

Mr. CUMMINS. I will have to exact a promise from the Senator from North Carolina that he will not consume very much time. I desire to proceed.

Mr. SIMMONS. I will not take much time. I want simply to say in reply to the Senator from New York that I notice in his speech he quoted the first sentence in the paragraph of Mr. Innes's letter and did not quote the remainder.

Mr. O'GORMAN. But I referred to it.

Mr. SIMMONS. I notice the Senator from Louisiana [Mr. RANSDELL] did the same thing. I think the first sentence separated from the second sentence conveys just the reverse of the impression that was intended by the writer. Now, Mr. President, if the Senator will permit me just one word——

Mr. CUMMINS. Just one word.

Mr. SIMMONS. In further reply to the Senator from New York, the Senator has said that we can and that the Commissioner of Navigation said we could confine our coastwise vessels strictly to trade between the two coasts of this country. We can; I have no doubt about that. I think that is a clear proposition. But when you do that, Mr. President, as I think I could show if I had the time, and I think I have shown in the speech I made, you still have the fact that our coastwise shipping is in competition with the vessels of every other nation in the world that trade in American ports upon either one ocean or the other ocean, and it is against the discrimination that results from imposing a burden upon these vessels actually competing with our coastwise vessels that Great Britain makes the protest, as I understand it. I thank the Senator.

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President, it is in the last sentence of the Senator from North Carolina that his whole error lies. He seems so desirous to construe this treaty against the American interest—I do not mean that he is an enemy of the public welfare, but he has intellectually in some fashion or other reached the conclusion that we have no rights in this canal that are not held by all the other nations of the world, and he seems so determined to square all the applications of that theory to American affairs that he sacrifices the American good and destroys American sovereignty.

Now, I will point it out to him in a minute. Whatever he may say of the Senator from New York—I was not present when that former colloquy occurred—he can not assert that I did not read the entire note of Mr. Innes, so far as that paragraph is concerned. I read it on Thursday, and I commented upon that part of it which the Senator from North Carolina now seems to think he brings for the first time to the attention of the Senate.

Mr. SIMMONS. Oh, not at all.

Mr. CUMMINS. Not only so, Mr. President, but I read the other sentence which he has quoted from Earl Grey's letter, and I am about to read it again. If it is true that England has protested against the act of 1912 simply because in some way or another the exemption of coastwise ships from tolls will help American trade and will make them more effective in competition against English trade, then that is some ground for his conclusion. I deny that. I assert with all the emphasis that I can command that England has never suggested to the United States or to the world that our coastwise trade could not be exempted because it might affect injuriously British commerce. Of course it may affect British commerce. I hope it will. I hope that the eastern part of this country may be able to supply our western coast with the products of our mills and our factories against the competition of Great Britain or of France or of Belgium.

If the Senator from New York or any Senator does not desire that we shall be able to supply our western country with the commodities which have been produced in the manufacturing parts of the United States, and wants that trade turned over to Great Britain or to France or Germany, then I think he can very well reason that we not only ought to attach the same tolls to our own shipping that we attach to foreign shipping, but we ought to make our shipping bear a greater burden than is borne by foreign countries. I assume that England would not complain, nor would any other country complain, nor could complaint well be made possible under the treaty, that instead of putting $1.20 a ton upon our trade we should put $2.40 a ton upon that and $1.20 upon the English, German, French, and Belgium trade. But, of course, no one contemplates anything of that kind.

There is the vital mistake. You Senators upon the other side of this controversy are proceeding upon the theory that England has claimed that if exemption from tolls of coastwise shipping makes it easier for us to compete with England in the markets of San Francisco, Los Angeles, Portland, or Seattle, then we have violated the treaty. England has not the assurance to make any such complaint. She never has made it, and I think she would lose her standing in the minds of all honorable men if she did assert so absurd and so unjust a claim against the United States. She has asserted all that she dare assert. You can not find in the history of England in her diplomatic career a single instance in which she has not claimed all that under any possible circumstances she was entitled to receive, and she has claimed it all here in a most carefully worded instrument, in a communication that evidently has received the most deliberate thought of the best minds of Great Britain, minds that were determined to put a construction upon this treaty that would give to that great country the advantage she has always sought in the commerce of the world.

Now, I intend to read the paragraph out of which the Senator from North Carolina extracted a sentence. I read part of it the other day. I was just on the point of reading it when he interrupted me, and I am very glad of the interruption, because he has very frankly stated his position. It is a position that I think does great credit to him. I want you to remember what he said. He said that so far as the inclusion of our commerce in order to reach a basis for the fixing of tolls for our foreign ships was concerned, that could be easily taken care of, if it has not already been adjusted, and that there is nothing in that that would demand a repeal of this law. He said, further, that if England's objection involved only the claim that we could not confine our coastwise trade within its true limits, then that could be very easily adjusted, and that there would be no reason for the repeal of the law which is now under consideration.

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. President, will the Senator pardon an interruption?

Mr. CUMMINS. I intend to read a further extract, if the Senator from North Carolina will bear with me a moment, and then I will yield to him to make another statement, if he desires to do so.

Mr. SIMMONS. I simply want to correct the Senator's statement about what I had said; that is all.

Mr. CUMMINS. Wait until I finish this particular subject, and then I shall be glad to yield to the Senator. Now, mark the language of Lord Grey:

It has been argued that as the coastwise trade of the United States is confined by law to United States vessels, the exemption of vessels engaged in it from the payment of tolls can not injure the interests of foreign nations. It is clear, however—that the interests of foreign nations will be seriously injured in two material respects.

Does the Senator from North Carolina think that the comprehension of this great statesman would not have gathered in any other respects in which it would materially injure foreign shipping, if there were any other such respects?

We proceed, bearing in mind now that he has stated that there are two respects in which the exemption of our coastwise trade will materially injure foreign nations:

In the first place, the exemption will result in the cost of the working of the canal being borne wholly by foreign-going vessels, and on such vessels, therefore, will fall the whole burden of raising the revenue necessary to cover the cost of working and maintaining the canal. The possibility, therefore, of fixing the toll on such vessels at a lower figure than $1.25 per ton, or of reducing the rate below that figure at some future time, will be considerably lessened by the exemption.

That is the first respect in which it is claimed that our law exempting coastwise traffic will injure foreign interests. The Senator from North Carolina, if I did not misunderstand him, has said that this objection could be removed—possibly it has been removed; that all he desires is that its removal shall be in the form of a permanent law instead of in the form of a proclamation by the President; and he has said, substantially—this is a conclusion; I am not quoting from him now—but the effect of that which he has just said is that, so far as this respect is concerned, there is no reason for the repeal, of which he is one of the distinguished champions.

Mr. SIMMONS rose.

Mr. CUMMINS. Now, one moment further.

In the second place—

We are now dealing with the second respect in which it is said that exemption will injure foreign nations, and I assume he uses that as the equivalent of saying it would be a violation of the treaty—

In the second place, the exemption will, in the opinion of His Majesty's Government, be a violation of the equal treatment secured by the treaty, as it will put the "coastwise trade" in a preferential position as regards other shipping.

Why? Lord Grey answers that question in a manner that admits of no possible difference of opinion. He continues:

Coastwise trade can not be circumscribed so completely that benefits conferred upon it will not affect vessels engaged in the foreign trade. To take an example, if cargo intended for a United States port beyond the canal, either from east or west, and shipped on board a foreign ship could be sent to its destination more cheaply, through the operation of the proposed exemption, by being landed at a United States port before reaching the canal, and then sent on as coastwise trade, shippers would benefit by adopting this course in preference to sending the goods direct to their destination through the canal on board the foreign ship.

Again, although certain privileges are granted to vessels engaged in an exclusively coastwise trade, His Majesty's Government are given to understand that there is nothing in the laws of the United States which prevents any United States ship from combining foreign commerce with coastwise trade, and consequently from entering into direct competition with foreign vessels while remaining "prima facie" entitled to the privilege of free passage through the canal. Moreover, any restriction which may be deemed to be now applicable might at any time be removed by legislation, or even, perhaps, by mere changes in the regulations.

These are the two respects in which he says we shall injure foreign nations, and the Senator from North Carolina has now admitted—and I do not see how he could well avoid the admission; every candid man must join in the admission—that the first is easily removable and constitutes no reason for this repeal. He has admitted that the second is likewise removable by Congress without difficulty, namely, by either such law or such regulation as will confine the traffic of a coastwise ship to the traffic belonging to the people of the United States.

I now assert again that Great Britain has put before us the full extent of her objections to this law, and there is not within that objection, there is not within the correspondence anywhere, the suggestion that we ought to repeal our coastwise-exemption law, or that we would violate the treaty by allowing a ship departing from the port of New York laden with commodities to be used by the people of California to pass through the Panama Canal without any charge whatsoever. The American who finds in this correspondence any suggestion of that kind, it seems to me, has begun his inquiry with a prejudiced mind. I now yield to the Senator from North Carolina.

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. President, the Senator, I think, misrepresents my position, especially with reference to the conclusion to be drawn from my position.

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President——

Mr. SIMMONS. If I am going to be allowed to interrupt the Senator, I hope he will permit me to do so to the extent of stating my position with some degree of clearness. I was a little hurried in doing so a little while ago, because the Senator showed some little impatience.

Mr. CUMMINS. The Senator from North Carolina understands the office of an interruption just as well as I do. I want to yield to a proper interruption, but I do not want to yield to a reply to my speech.

Mr. SIMMONS. I am not going to attempt to reply to the Senator's speech; I am simply going to state my position, which I think the Senator has, unintentionally, of course, misrepresented.

Mr. President, as I understand this correspondence—and I have studied it very closely, and nothing which the Senator has said has changed my opinion about the meaning of it—Great Britain made the point, first, that by exempting our coastwise vessels we threw a greater burden upon the shipping of the balance of the world in order to maintain the canal. President Taft responded to that by saying, "I have avoided that, temporarily at least, by the basis upon which I have fixed rates for ships passing through the canal." I stated that, so long as that act of the President remained in force, possibly it might remove that objection; but I also stated that that was not a permanent regulation, and that it would require legislation in order to make it permanent in its effect upon the shipping of the balance of the world. In other words, that to me this objection of Great Britain, providing that objection was found to be valid, might be removed through legislation.

The next objection of Great Britain with reference to this matter was that at present our coastwise vessels engage in foreign trade. That is admitted to be a fact. Great Britain was speaking about an actual condition when she said that our coastwise vessels do now, as a matter of fact, engage in foreign trade. I do not know whether or not they are being permitted to engage in foreign trade as a result of a proper and correct interpretation of the present navigation laws, but I assume that they are. I assume that the authority now granted them under their enrollment to engage in foreign trade is sanctioned by the law. It would require legislation in order to adjust that, if Great Britain's contention is sound, just as it requires legislation to remove the discrimination produced by the act of 1912.

But Great Britain, after saying, "Here are two particulars in which we would be affected; first, as to the rate of tolls being extended, because American coastwise ships will not participate in paying the expenses of the canal, and, second, because your coastwise vessels engage, like your over-sea vessels, in foreign trade," in answer to the argument made on the part of this Government that we can circumscribe our coastwise trade so that it will not be permitted to engage in foreign trade, Great Britain says:

It appears to our Government that it is impossible for you to so circumscribe your coastwise trade that you will not by this exemption give a preference to the traffic carried in your coastwise vessels over the traffic carried in the over-sea vessels of other countries, and you can not, therefore, by circumscribing it, you can not by confining it absolutely to local trade, you can not by prohibiting your coastwise vessels from engaging to any extent in foreign trade, remove the fundamental objection that exemption from tolls gives your vessels going through the canal a preference in the competition which our vessels going through the canal have to meet in every American port where the cargoes of the coastwise vessels and the cargoes of foreign vessels are sold in competition.

That I understand to be the situation.

I can not understand what is meant when Mr. Innes says:

But it appears to my Government that it would be impossible to frame regulations—

That is in reply to the suggestion that regulations might be framed by which we could circumscribe our coastwise vessels to local trade and prohibit them from engaging in foreign trade—

But it appears to my Government that it would be impossible to frame regulations—

Regulations controlling the coastwise trade, regulations limiting the coastwise trade to strictly coastwise traffic—which would prevent the exemption—

Exemption of what? Exemption of the strictly coastwise trade carried through the canal and sold in competition with the cargoes of British vessels in every port of the United States in which the vessels would meet—which would prevent the exemption from resulting, in fact, in a preference to United States shipping and consequently an infraction of the treaty.

That is my construction of it.

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President, I am glad the Senator from North Carolina has restated his position.

Mr. SIMMONS. Now, if the Senator will permit me, as he gave an illustration, I should like to give an illustration——

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President——

Mr. SIMMONS. I will not interrupt the Senator's speech further.

Mr. CUMMINS. The Senator from North Carolina has stated his position, and I would prefer that he would elaborate his reply at another time. I am only sorry that there are not other Senators in the Chamber who are joining and cooperating with the Senator from North Carolina in endeavoring to secure the passage of this bill, that I might ask them whether they concur in the view now expressed by the Senator from North Carolina. I should like to know whether the Senator from Georgia [Mr. SMITH] is willing to adopt the argument just made by the Senator from North Carolina. I should like to know whether the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE] and the Senator from New York [Mr. ROOT] are willing to adopt the view which the Senator from North Carolina has just so clearly and, as I might well say, so eloquently stated, because if we can bring this controversy to the issue just stated by the Senator from North Carolina and make the outcome of the vote about to be had depend upon the validity of the position just assumed by the Senator from North Carolina, it is a foregone conclusion.

The Senator has, in substance, departed from everything that has been heretofore said in support of the bill to repeal the exemption clause in the canal act of 1912. He says it is true Great Britain has not insisted that to carry our coastwise trade or traffic through the Panama Canal is a violation of the treaty; he admits it. He proposes broadly and comprehensively——

Mr. SIMMONS. I made no such admission as that.

Mr. CUMMINS. To abandon for the time a right which he now says England has not insisted that we shall surrender. He says that we ought to repeal the exemption, and that we ought to say to the world that we surrender our right to deal in the future with our coastwise shipping, because England has suggested that there are difficulties, grave difficulties, in the way of confining the trade within its true limits, because it is the opinion of the British Foreign Office that when we come to frame a law or issue regulations which shall govern this trade from coast to coast, we will not be successful in limiting to our own people the favor that we are trying to extend to our own people and to our own trade. That is the most marvelous, the most extraordinary assertion and admission I have ever heard in all the debate upon this subject.

Now, Mr. President, I intended to go forward and see to what extent the colleagues of the Senator from North Carolina agree with him.

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. President——

Mr. CUMMINS. I intend to inquire what the President's view is with regard to that matter, because my mind is bent on just one thing: It is to find out how much further the advocates of repeal insist on going than Great Britain has demanded that we shall go. I want to know how much of our sovereignty we are called upon to surrender because England wants it, and how much we are called upon to surrender by these philosophical altruists who seem to fear that in some fashion or other our honor is in danger in the civilized world.

Mr. SIMMONS. Will the Senator permit me an interruption now?

Mr. CUMMINS. I think the Senator has had an opportunity to explain his view fully, and I should prefer to go on just a little further before he interrupts me.

Mr. SIMMONS. The Senator misrepresented me a little while ago, and I desire to state in what particular he misrepresented me.

Mr. CUMMINS. I may have done so, Mr. President. Of course I have not quoted anything the Senator has said. I have drawn my conclusions from what he has said, and all who have heard the debate are at liberty to draw their conclusions. I have not imputed to the Senator from North Carolina any specific words, and I am very desirous of making the argument somewhat continuous.

Mr. SIMMONS. But I say the Senator misrepresented me, and I think the Senator ought to permit me in a few words to state the respect in which he has misrepresented me.

Mr. CUMMINS. Well, Mr. President, I yield.

Mr. SIMMONS. If the Senator does not want to be interrupted——

Mr. CUMMINS. I think I am probably an exception in this great debate. Every other Senator notified the Senate in advance that interruptions would not be allowed. I presume, however, the matter can be reached in this way better than in any other, and I yield to the Senator.

Mr. SIMMONS. I shall be exceedingly brief.

The Senator said that I had admitted that these difficulties could be removed by legislation. I did, Mr. President. I said that the first difficulty could be removed by legislation, the second could be removed by legislation, and the last could be removed by legislation, so far as that is concerned. When, however, the Senator states that I am basing my contention in favor of a repeal simply upon the fact that Great Britain contends that the exemption of our coastwise trade would be giving a preference to our shipping and prejudicial to hers, when he puts me in the attitude of taking that position simply and solely for the purpose of meeting the protest of Great Britain, whether that protest addresses itself to my judgment as correct or not, he puts me in a position that I will not occupy.

Not only to-day, but elaborately in the speech which I made a few days ago, I undertook to show that to permit our coastwise ships to pass through the canal without the payment of tolls, even if they were circumscribed to purely coastwise trade, would be a discrimination against the over-seas ships of the balance of the world. If the Senator will read my speech, he will see that I made that contention as my contention. If Great Britain makes that protest, I believe that protest is just, because I believe it is capable of demonstration, and I believe I demonstrated it in my speech, as I think others have demonstrated in this argument, that however closely you may circumscribe coastwise trade in this country, if you permit it to go through the canal free there will be a necessary and inevitable discrimination against the over-seas ships of the balance of the world using the canal to reach the ports of our coasts where their cargoes will be sold in competition with those of our coastwise vessels; and therefore I said that in my judgment the protest was properly made.

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President, the Senator has risen to answer an accusation which, if made, has been made by his own conscience. I did not make it. I do not know how the thought which he has just expressed came into his mind. I did not say that the Senator from North Carolina was yielding or surrendering to the demand or view of Great Britain. I said that we were going far beyond the demand of Great Britain. The very thing that he protests against is the very thing that I admit.

The Senator from North Carolina is not trying to carry out the views of Great Britain, as erroneous as those views are, as selfish as those views are. Great Britain has not insisted that we should surrender our right to allow our coastwise trade to pass through the canal free. It is the Senator from North Carolina who has insisted upon that.

When we come before the great forum of the people you will not hear the Senator from Iowa claiming that the Senator from North Carolina yielded under the duress of a foreign pressure. You will hear him claiming that the Senator from North Carolina and all other Senators who join with him have yielded to some other influence—the influence, I will assume, of their own convictions. All that I have said is that it is marvelous to me, inexplicable to me, that any American is willing to put on this treaty a construction so much more unfavorable to his own people than has been put upon it by the great nation whose history convinces every impartial man that she claims everything to which she is entitled.

But, Mr. President, I was about calling the attention of the Senate very briefly to the origin of this controversy in the Senate so far as this legislation is concerned. I have shown, I think, what Great Britain asks, and if I have not shown that Great Britain does not ask us to abandon or surrender our right to deal with our real coastwise trade as we think it ought to be dealt with, then I am unable to understand the force of the English tongue.

This is what the President said, and this is the way in which he initiated the movement which we are now carrying forward:

> I have come to ask you for the repeal of that provision of the Panama Canal act of August 24, 1912, which exempts vessels engaged in the coastwise trade of the United States from payment of tolls, and to urge upon you the justice, the wisdom, and the large policy of such a repeal with the utmost earnestness of which I am capable.

Mark, Senators, the very thing that Great Britain has really protested against is not mentioned by the President at all. The protest or objection of Great Britain against that part of the canal act which gave to the President the power to discriminate in favor of our foreign ships is not brought to the attention of Congress. It was not in the mind of the President. He declares that he comes before Congress simply to ask it to repeal the exemption of coastwise ships.

I should like some Senator who is in the confidence of the President or in the confidence of the Democratic councils to tell the country why it is that when the President comes before the legislative body seeking a repeal or seeking legislative action he confines his request to coastwise trade, without ever a suggestion relating to that part of the canal act against which England did positively, emphatically, argumentatively launch her objection, namely, the discretion that we gave to the President to discriminate in favor of our ships doing a foreign trade. If anyone can answer that, it will explain a great mystery that has enveloped my mind ever since I heard this message.

Our Executive then proceeds to give his reason for the recommendation he makes or the request that he prefers. He says:

> In my own judgment, very fully considered and maturely formed, that exemption constitutes a mistaken economic policy from every point of view, and is, moreover, in plain contravention of the treaty with Great Britain concerning the canal concluded on November 18, 1901.

I have no reason to doubt the sincerity of his conclusion with regard to the matter. I never enter a man's inner consciousness and endeavor to ascertain whether or not he sincerely thinks what he says. The President says that in his opinion it is in plain contravention of the treaty of 1901, although England has never so declared, England has never so suggested, and, so far as I know, not a nation on earth has made the suggestion.

I limit that statement to my own knowledge, of course. I do not know what may be in the archives of the State Department; but if there is a protest there from England, or if there is a protest there from any other nation, we have a right to know what it is and from whence it comes. We must deal with this subject upon the hypothesis that there is nothing in the diplomatic records of this country upon this subject of which we have not been advised.

The President, however, gives another reason for the repeal of this exemption. He says:

> But I have not come to urge upon you my personal views. I have come to state to you a fact and a situation. Whatever may be our own differences of opinion concerning this much debated measure, its meaning is not debated outside the United States. Everywhere else the language of the treaty is given but one interpretation, and that interpretation precludes the exemption I am asking you to repeal.

Has a President of the United States a right to ask this legislation upon this ground without submitting the proof to Congress? When did Great Britain put upon the treaty the interpretation stated by the President? In what communication? When did France or Germany or Belgium or Norway or Sweden or Austria or Spain or Italy or Russia or Turkey put upon the treaty the interpretation that is asserted in the message of the President?

I challenge any advocate of repeal to furnish any evidence of an official representation upon the part of any nation insisting that we have no right to deal with our coastwise trade as our interests may require. Great Britain has not done it. I have shown that, as I think, so conclusively that it must satisfy any reasonable mind.

This message is brought to us recommending a repeal, first, because in the opinion of the President an exemption of our coastwise trade is in violation of the treaty. With that I have no quarrel. I do not believe his conclusion is correct, but I grant him the right to hold that opinion. When, however, he says: I ask you to repeal this statute because Great Britain holds another interpretation of the treaty, or because any other nation holds a different interpretation of the treaty, then I demand the proof. It is vain, with a serious subject, for the President to ask us to exercise our legislative power upon evidence of which we are entirely ignorant, and which many of us—and I have no hesitation in enrolling myself among that number—believe does not exist.

If the President puts upon the communications from Great Britain the same interpretation that has been put upon them by the Senator from North Carolina, then he could say that Great Britain has demanded this repeal, but I do not know whether he does or not. Under the admissions of those who have treated the subject here, especially the statements of the Senator from North Carolina—and I look upon him as the leader of this movement so far as Congress is concerned—I can not believe that there is any evidence whatever that Great Britain has ever demanded a repeal of the exemption for coastwise trade.

Great Britain has said you must confine it to coastwise trade, and if we do confine the exemption to coastwise trade then we will not have violated the treaty. But until that time comes it seems to me not only in the highest degree unwise but utterly indefensible for Congress to proceed as it is now proposed to proceed.

But I take one step further in order to compare Great Britain's view with the views in this Chamber. The first Senator, as I remember it, who made a speech upon this subject was the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE]. Mr. LODGE said he had no doubt about the construction of this treaty, that it gave us the right to deal with our foreign shipping as we might see fit, and much the more, that it gave us the right to deal with our coastwise shipping as the good of our people might require. He declared himself in favor of the repeal. Why? Because he did not want to flaunt an American right in the face of the public opinion of Europe. I may not quote him with exactness, but that was the substance of what he said. He wanted the repeal, because he accepted the declaration of the President that all the nations of the earth had declared against our sovereignty in this respect, and that we ought to yield to that foreign opinion and reach the same result by subsidizing our ships that might pass through the canal, and in that way give them the favor which we have attempted to give them through the exemption.

Such is the opinion of the Senator from Massachusetts, and I reply to him as I have said so many times. He is wrong when he says that Great Britain has insisted that we could not exempt our coastwise trade, and therefore even if I wanted to be so submissive as to be unwilling to flout my American right in the face of foreign opinion—and I do not want to be offensive, of course, to the other nations of the world—but if that were so, the basis is wrong; there is no such foreign opinion. Great Britain has made no such demand, and the American who proceeds upon that hypothesis is making a fundamental mistake.

I now refer to the Senator from Georgia [Mr. SMITH]. I ask you to remember what his opinion is and see how that corresponds with the judgment of the President or the judgment of the Senator from Massachusetts. The Senator from Georgia is of the opinion that the exemption of the coastwise ships is a violation of the treaty, because the treaty commands equality of treatment as between the citizens of the United States and the citizens of Canada and the citizens of Mexico and the citizens of any other country that might use the canal in coastwise trade. I shall not stop here to discuss the validity of that position. I am endeavoring only to point out how far you are asking us to go beyond the claim made by Great Britain out of which all this dispute arises. Great Britain has not asked us to repeal the exemption clause on any such ground as that. Great Britain has not claimed that the citizens of Canada are entitled to an equality of treatment with the citizens of the United States in so far as our coastwise trade is concerned. That is a theory of the Senator from Georgia. I understand its origin; he has explained it upon more than one occasion; but I am simply pointing out that he is projecting an argument against the entire coastwise trade, and that Great Britain has only insisted that the coastwise trade must be limited and confined to that trade so that the exemption shall not be enjoyed by international trade.

I pass from the Senator from Georgia to the Senator from New York [Mr. ROOT]. He wants the exemption clause repealed. Why? Not because he has any doubt the coastwise trade may be properly exempted—real coastwise trade, as he terms it—but he does not agree with the Senator from Massachusetts; he does not agree with the Senator from Georgia, or the Senator from North Carolina. He also takes a ground never before occupied by anyone who has debated this topic. He says we can not exempt the coastwise trade because traffic from the one coast of this country to the other through the Panama Canal is not coastwise trade, inasmuch as the ships that carry it on must be large ships, and they must venture into the open sea before reaching the canal. This is his reason for believing that we can not exempt coastwise trade. Again I say that he is building up a barrier between the people of his own country and their welfare and prosperity never dreamed of by Great Britain, the other party to this contract.

In view, Senators, of these things, if I have recited them correctly, if I have correlated them so that they are understandable, will you not agree with me that I stated the truth in my first sentence when I declared that the spectacle now presented in the Senate of the United States is without precedent in the history of mankind? You may search the records of humanity and organized governments in vain for such an instance as we are now witnessing, when one nation, party to a treaty, has asked one thing, has objected to an assumption of power on the part of the other, and that then the other not only rushes to accept everything that is demanded but insists upon pouring out, through pure magnanimity, through pure generosity, a great volume of the sovereignty of the country.

You may put it down that it is a spectacle that will never be repeated. It has no predecessor, and it will have no successor. I am not willing to do that; but if we are willing to do it, we ought at least to be content with granting to Great Britain all that she demands. When we go further and entangle future generations in the meshes of this interpretation, we may well reflect upon the consequences of our act. You are about to put that interpretation upon this treaty, I care not how you phrase the qualifying provision. The President has said that this repeal is demanded because it is in violation of our agreement. He has said that it is demanded because all the nations of the world insist that it is a violation of our agreement, and that to stand four square before the peoples of the world we must accept that interpretation and agree that we have no right under the treaty to discriminate in favor of our own trade, our coastwise trade being the subject just at this moment under consideration.

When that interpretation is insisted upon by the President of the United States, when you eminent, distinguished, and learned Senators and patriots arise and declare that it is the proper interpretation of the treaty and that we did violate our solemn obligation when we exempted our coastwise ships, then action following these declarations and under these circumstances must be an admission to the world that we have parted forever with this vital right.

What can you know of the development of the United States in the next half century? What can you foretell with respect to the currents of her trade? What can you say with regard to the magnitude of our interests? How can you declare what ties will bind the two coasts of America together in the next century? How can you manacle and shackle unborn generations? How can you part with our right to deal with our own affairs according to the interests of our own people? How do you know that within the next quarter of a century it may not be demanded—that the life of the country, the life of business, may not demand—that the United States itself shall carry on the trade between our eastern and our western coasts in her own ships, manned by her own officers; and yet the moment you put the interpretation for which you stand so earnestly apparently on this treaty, you have denied to the United States the chance to serve her people in that way. I do not suggest that there is any exterior or pernicious influence exercising itself here or elsewhere; but I know—I believe I know—why there are interests in the United States so deeply intent in attaching to this treaty the construction that the President asks.

If we do it, then, when the United States shall enter this traffic in an attempt to serve the people of the country by carrying on the trade in her own ships, Great Britain will say, "No, no; you have already assented to a construction of the Hay-Pauncefote agreement which forbids that activity on the part of your Government." The United States can not pay itself. It can not receive money from its own ships. Its own ships can not pay it money in the way of tolls. Whenever you declare that it is not within our right to pass an American ship engaged in the coastwise trade through the canal without charge, you have declared that the United States can not pass one of its own ships through engaged in commerce.

I should like to know whether the people of this generation are willing to accept the responsibility of binding the next generation against the exercise of that right which may be essential to the life of our institutions. I can not conceive a situation more crowded with grave consequences than the one in which we are now placed. I can not conceive of a question more important than the one we are now discussing. I am not asking for the free passage of our ships. I myself do not believe that they should pass free. I have a view upon that subject which I will present at a later time in connection with an amendment I shall propose. I am not pleading for free ships. At this time I am pleading for the integrity of the Union, the preservation of the strength of our mighty Nation. I am begging that we will not make the mistake that was made in 1850 when we entangled ourselves with Great Britain in the Clayton-Bulwer treaty. I am begging that we will not perpetuate what I regard to be a mistake made in 1901 when we recognized the right of Great Britain to interpose between us and the construction of a canal across the Isthmus at Panama. Let us not write another chapter in this book of blunders. Let us stand firm and fast and true to our plighted word; but let us not yield what we believe to be our unquestioned rights. In such fashion we will not only perpetuate our Nation's honor, but we will serve the interests of the greatest people on earth.

Mr. O'GORMAN. Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. VARDAMAN in the chair). The Senator from New York suggests the absence of a quorum. The Secretary will call the roll.

The Secretary called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Ashurst	Bristow	Crawford	Hitchcock
Borah	Burton	Cummins	Johnson
Brady	Catron	Gallinger	Kenyon
Brandegee	Chamberlain	Gronna	La Follette
Lane	Page	Smith, Ga.	Thompson
Lea, Tenn.	Perkins	Smith, Md.	Tillman
Lewis	Poindexter	Smith, S. C.	Townsend
Lodge	Ransdell	Smoot	Vardaman
McCumber	Reed	Stephenson	Walsh
Martine, N. J.	Shafroth	Sterling	Warren
Newlands	Sheppard	Stone	Weeks
Norris	Sherman	Sutherland
O'Gorman	Shively	Swanson
Overman	Simmons	Thomas

Mr. TOWNSEND. The senior Senator from Michigan [Mr. SMITH] is absent on important business.

Mr. MARTINE of New Jersey. I desire to state that the Senator from Mississippi [Mr. WILLIAMS] is absent on official business, and that he is paired with the Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. PENROSE].

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Fifty-three Senators have answered to their names. There is a quorum present.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Mr. President, I favor the amendment offered by my colleague, Senator NORRIS, and I shall favor any other amendment of like import which will attach to this bill a declaration that its passage shall not be construed as a surrender of the American right to discriminate in favor of American vessels in the use of the Panama Canal.

I should be willing to go even further, Mr. President, and favor a pecific declaration, reaffirming and asserting that right, because that would express my own convictions in the matter.

I favor the repeal bill not because I think the exemption of American coastwise vessels is a violation of the treaty but because I think the exemption was bad policy and against public interest. I think that the great investment made by the people of the United States in the Panama Canal should not be thrown open to the free use of any vessels operated for pleasure or profit, but that all should be required to pay the very moderate, I may say the very low, charge provided in the original canal act and carried into effect by the President's proclamation. I am opposed to the free passage of such vessels now, and I have always been opposed to their free passage.

Ordinarily, Mr. President, to meet my views, it would be sufficient to pass this repeal measure as originally drafted had the movement originated in the Congress and been based upon domestic or economic considerations. When, however, the President of the United States took the initiative and pressed the repeal upon Congress for the chief reason, as stated by him, that the canal act was a violation of our treaty, the situation is changed, and to act upon his suggestion without qualification may perhaps put Congress in the light of indorsing his reasons and might put the United States on record as abandoning its former interpretation of the treaty and assenting to the interpretation placed upon it by Great Britain. I am not willing to do that, if it is possible to attach to this bill a declaration to prevent it. I believe the United States should stand by the position it has taken and continue to maintain and to insist upon its interpretation of the treaty which was made officially by both branches of Congress and by the President in the passage of the canal act of 1912. That is the dignified attitude, the correct attitude, and it is an honorable attitude, providing at the same time this country stands ready, as it should, if Great Britain insists upon its interpretation as we insist upon ours, to submit the matter to an impartial tribunal for arbitration, as provided for in our existing arbitration treaty with Great Britain.

This course, Mr. President, is, in my opinion, the only one which is fair to both countries, and it is the only course which is fair to the opposing views of people in our own country. We can not shut our eyes to the fact that sentiment in the United States is widely divided on this subject. Very many distinguished public men contend for the interpretation placed upon the treaty by the President, but probably an equal number contend for what I feel justified in calling the American interpretation. Both of these elements can be properly recognized by the passage of the bill with this amendment. Those who agree with the President will have amended the canal act so as to conform to his recommendations, while the other class will have reserved and reasserted the American interpretation of the treaty, leaving the final decision ultimately to the arbitration which we are solemnly bound to accept. Thus the change in the law would not operate to alter the attitude of the United States on the interpretation of the treaty.

Those, in brief, Mr. President, are my reasons for favoring the amendment offered by my colleague. Those will be my reasons for supporting other amendments which have already been drafted, and which may possibly come before the Senate, having the same purport, intending to save the country what rights it may possess, and to avoid giving away those rights without at least having our day in court to assert them.

My own views, Mr. President, after studying the history of these unfortunate treaties with Great Britain, beginning with the Clayton-Bulwer treaty and ending with the second Hay-Pauncefote treaty, are that the history of those treaties and the letter of those treaties argue in favor of the contention that we have the right to discriminate in favor of American vessels in the use of the canal.

The eighth article of the Clayton-Bulwer treaty has been often referred to on the other side in this argument; but, to my mind, the eighth article of the Clayton-Bulwer treaty can bear no other interpretation, read in the light of the subsequent Hay-Pauncefote treaty, than that the power which constructs and agrees to defend the canal reserves to itself the right to the best treatment on the subject of tolls, and that any power not constructing and not defending the canal has no special right, but only the right to equal tolls with other nations not constructing or defending the canal. Listen to the concluding words of the eighth article:

> And that the same canals or railways, being open to the citizens and subjects of the United States and Great Britain on equal terms, shall also be open on like terms to the citizens and subjects of every other State which is willing to grant thereto such protection as the United States and Great Britain engage to afford.

Mr. President, suppose under that eighth article we, in partnership with Great Britain, had constructed the canal, will anyone contend that any other country would have had the right for its citizens or its subjects to equal treatment with our citizens, except in such case as it should become a constructor and defender of the canal? I put a question to the Senator from Georgia [Mr. SMITH] a day or two ago which he answered fairly and which I think settles this matter. I said to him, "Suppose the canal had been constructed jointly by the United States and Great Britain, would it not follow that the United States and Great Britain, the constructors and the defenders of the canal, would have had the right to charge higher tolls to other countries participating neither in the construction nor in the defense of the canal?" and the Senator from Georgia answered "Yes." Great Britain has stepped aside, has stepped out of the class of the United States, has ceased to be either a constructor or a defender of the canal, and does it not follow as a natural consequence that the United States now has what the United States and Great Britain formerly had jointly—the right to discriminate in favor of its own citizens?

It is written in this eighth article of the old Clayton-Bulwer treaty that the condition of equal treatment is participation in the protection of the canal. If it was intended to extend this right to citizens and subjects of countries not so participating, why was the correct language not used in the second Hay-Pauncefote treaty? Why did those negotiators not put in plain English the statement that the citizens and subjects of any nation observing the rules of the canal should have the same rates or tolls as citizens of the United States? That would have settled it; that would have been language easily secured, easily inserted in the treaty if both sides were willing to agree to it. In fact, that language was considered; and to my mind the very fact that it was considered and rejected is the strongest possible circumstantial evidence that it was not intended to put it in the treaty. Let me read a proposed and rejected section of that treaty. On August 20, 1901, while the treaty was under negotiation, our ambassador to Great Britain, Mr. Choate, wrote Mr. Hay a review of the situation as it then existed in London, and proposed an article to our Secretary of State which reads as follows:

> In view of the permanent character of this treaty, whereby the general principle established by article 8 of the Clayton-Bulwer treaty is reaffirmed, the United States hereby declares (and agrees) that it will impose no other charges or conditions of traffic upon any other canal that may be built across the Isthmus (or between the Atlantic and Pacific Oceans) than such as are just and equitable, and that such canals shall be open to the subjects and citizens of the United States and of all other nations on equal terms.

So the very language which would have rendered unquestionable the right claimed by Great Britain was not only considered by Mr. Choate but was presented to Mr. Hay. Why was it not accepted? We all know why it was not accepted. It was because of the attitude of the Senate of the United States. I have no doubt that Ambassador Choate and Secretary Hay would have been willing to incorporate that generous proposition in the treaty, and that the only reason it was not put into the treaty was the realization that it would result in the rejection of the treaty by the Senate or in the amendment of the treaty, as the former treaty had been already amended by the Senate, in standing up for American rights and American interests.

Mr. President, these are some of the considerations which lead me to feel that the correct interpretation of the treaty gives to the United States, as the power which not only builds but protects the canal for the use of the world, the right to discriminate in favor of its own vessels.

While I hold this belief, I also cling with equal firmness to two other beliefs. One is that it is contrary to public policy for us to give the free use of the canal to ships owned and operated for pleasure or for profit. I believe that the taxpayers of the United States, having built this great waterway and being expected to pay the annual losses which its operation will involve, are entitled to demand of every ship which goes through the waterway a reasonable charge for the service rendered. I do not believe that those companies owning such vessels should have the free use of that waterway any more than that those companies should have the free use of the United States mail. They should pay a reasonable charge for the use of the canal.

I also cling to the other belief that while we maintain the American construction of this treaty, while we insist upon it and reassert the doctrine that we are entitled to exempt our coastwise vessels from the payment of tolls under the treaty, I also think that we should carry out in good faith our agreement with Great Britain, and if she insists upon her interpretation should submit the matter to the arbitration of a fair and impartial tribunal.

Mr. THOMPSON obtained the floor.

Mr. POINDEXTER. Mr. President, will the Senator from Kansas yield to me for a moment?

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. KENYON in the chair). Does the Senator from Kansas yield to the Senator from Washington?

Mr. THOMPSON. I yield.

Mr. POINDEXTER. I desire to give notice, Mr. President, that, unless it conflicts with some previous notice, immediately after the routine morning business on Monday next I will submit some observations upon the Panama Canal tolls question, the pending bill.

Mr. THOMPSON. I will say, for the benefit of the Senator from Washington, that I will only occupy a short time, if he desires to go on to-day.

Mr. POINDEXTER. I do not desire to go on to-day.

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Kansas yield to the Senator from North Carolina?

Mr. THOMPSON. I do.

Mr. SIMMONS. I wish to say to the Senator from Washington that, while I do not think it altogether probable that we can reach a vote upon this question to-day, I think it possible that if we should stay here some time to-night we might reach a conclusion, unless some Senator makes a very long speech; and I hope the Senator from Washington will go on to-day, if it is not inconvenient for him to do so, and not foreclose the possibility—I admit it is a mere possibilty—of our reaching a vote to-night.

Mr. POINDEXTER. Mr. President, if the Senator from Kansas will pardon me, I am willing to agree to anything reasonable to facilitate the disposition of this business. I do not think, however, that the final disposition of it will be hastened in any way by holding night sessions or pressing the matter through unreasonable hours at this time. It seems to me, if we go on in the usual way, that it will ultimately hasten a conclusion of the business. I scarcely think that it is possible to dispose of it to-day.

Mr. SIMMONS. The Senator realizes the fact that Senators on both sides of the Chamber are exceedingly anxious to get through with this matter at the earliest possible moment.

Mr. POINDEXTER. I do.

Mr. SIMMONS. And I myself know of only two or three Senators who desire to speak now upon the main question. The Senator from Washington [Mr. POINDEXTER] is one, the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. LA FOLLETTE] another, and the Senator from Kansas [Mr. THOMPSON], who, I understand, will only occupy a short time, is the third; and we might get through——

Mr. MARTINE of New Jersey. Mr. President——

Mr. SIMMONS. Just a moment, if the Senator please. We might get through the general discussion this evening by 6 o'clock if the Senator from Washington is not going to make a very long speech and if the Senator from Wisconsin does not make a very long speech. That would bring us to a vote on the amendments and make it possible to dispose of the matter to-night. The opinion has been expressed to me by quite a number of Senators that if it is possible to get through by staying here until 10 or 11 o'clock to-night, they would be very glad to subject themselves to that inconvenience. Some Senators want to leave here early next week.

Mr. MARTINE of New Jersey. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Kansas yield to the Senator from New Jersey?

Mr. THOMPSON. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. MARTINE of New Jersey. I do not want to interfere with the Senator, but I do trust in all reason that we may not have a session to-night.

Mr. SIMMONS. I want to say to the Senator that I do not think anybody contemplated a session to-night, unless we saw at the usual hour of adjournment some possibility of getting through with this matter to-night.

Mr. MARTINE of New Jersey. I desire to say that I feel an intense interest in this matter, and while I can not add to the enlightenment of the Senate in any degree I feel that my constituency have a right to know, at least, where I stand and why I take the position which I do take. It is not convenient just now for me to give expression to my views as I should like to do, and I trust that the bill may go over until Monday. I do not think there is any prime necessity for passing it to-night. The heavens are not going to fall, whether the exemption clause of the Panama Canal tolls act is repealed or not. It has stood reasonably quiet since we adopted it in 1912, and I think the world will go on if we do not adopt this measure until Monday or Tuesday, or even later next week. I am as anxious to get home and to get through with the business of the session as any man can possibly be, but it is a big subject; it is a matter that affects every man, woman, and child in our land, and in the name of all that is good and fair do not try to stifle debate.

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. President, the Senator knows that I have said nothing that indicated that I wanted to stifle debate or cut off debate. I have no such desire.

Mr. MARTINE of New Jersey. I do not believe the Senator has any such desire, but if you insist——

Mr. O'GORMAN. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Kansas has the floor. To whom does he yield?

Mr. THOMPSON. I yield to the Senator from New Jersey until he concludes.

Mr. MARTINE of New Jersey. I do not believe the Senator from North Carolina does want to stifle debate, but if you insist upon staying here until midnight and securing action to-night the result would be to stifle debate.

Mr. SIMMONS. I have not said that we are to do it; I have not said that I would unduly press the matter at all. I said if, when we reached the usual hour of adjournment this evening, 6 o'clock, the conditions were such as to make it possible that we could finish up this work to-night, I knew of a number of Senators who are exceedingly eager that we should conclude the matter in order that they may go home. A number of Senators have made that statement to me, and I know that there is a feeling and a desire here that this matter shall be disposed of as soon as possible. Of course the Senator is right in saying that there is no great necessity of passing the bill to-night, except to serve the convenience of Senators who want it disposed of.

Mr. MARTINE of New Jersey. Of course we want to finish the business of the Nation.

Mr. SIMMONS. I shall not, however, to the point of excluding anybody who wants to speak, ask that the matter be acted upon to-day.

Mr. O'GORMAN and Mr. POINDEXTER addressed the Chair.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. To whom does the Senator from Kansas yield?

Mr. THOMPSON. I yield to the Senator from New York, who wants to say a word and who requested recognition a while ago.

Mr. O'GORMAN. Mr. President, I simply desire to say that, with the very best of intentions on the part of some of my colleagues, we are just now wasting time, as we did waste all of yesterday, so far as this particular legislation is concerned. I do not wish to be understood in that connection as saying that the time was lost, because I think the topics that were discussed yesterday were of great public interest and a day might very well be devoted to them, although some of us who are interested in expediting the consideration of and in reaching a vote on the tolls bill might have preferred that some other time should have been selected for that purpose.

As I understand, the Senator from Washington, who, within the knowledge of Senators, has been detained from the Senate for a few days by public duties, desires to speak, but is not desirous of speaking to-day, and has given notice that he will speak on Monday. I tell him, with all the desire on the part of the entire Senate to expedite the disposition of this legislation, he will have ample time on Monday to address the Senate, because no vote will be reached on the amendments before Monday.

I think the only thing now in order, Mr. President, is to allow the Senator from Kansas, who desires to address himself to this subject, to proceed with his remarks.

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Kansas yield further to the Senator from North Carolina?

Mr. THOMPSON. I yield.

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. President, I do not know, of course, what is in the mind of the Senator from New York. He may know of speeches to be made that would make it utterly impossible to finish this matter to-day. I do not myself know of such speeches, and I have merely suggested to the Senator from Washington that if it were not too inconvenient for him he might go on to-day; but if it is inconvenient to the Senator, I withdraw that suggestion. I simply threw it out to him, and that was all.

Mr. POINDEXTER. Mr. President, I desire to say that of course I did not intend in anything that I said to intimate that the Senator from North Carolina had been endeavoring to unduly limit debate. I think, on the contrary, that he has been very reasonable about the matter; but it will be impossible to reach a vote this afternoon. I would be very glad to see Senators have an opportunity to dispose of this business in order to go away; I should like to take a holiday myself; but I think the Senator from Indiana [Mr. KERN] is going to insist on the Senate remaining in session for the consideration of trust legislation, and we are likely to reach a vote on trust legislation immediately after the disposition of the Panama tolls question, so that it would be dangerous for Senators to leave even after we dispose of the pending measure.

Mr. THOMPSON. Mr. President, for reasons very apparent to the Senate in this preliminary discussion, I would prefer not to be interrupted during the course of my few remarks. If any Senator wishes to ask any question, when I am through I will be glad to answer him as best I can.

I do not want to tax the patience of those Senators who desire to vote instead of talk or listen to further talk, but before voting I wish to make a few remarks in explanation of my vote and in behalf of the pending measure.

In my judgment there has been much more excitement and anxiety raised over the subject involved than the true situation really justified. There has been a great deal of exaggeration, misrepresentation, and some misunderstanding of the necessary consequences of the legislation. Some severe criticisms have been made against the President and his purpose in recommending the repeal. The President was clearly within his constitutional rights in suggesting the legislation, and from his viewpoint could not have honestly evaded the responsibility. Although it is a subject which was perhaps somewhat unpopular at the particular time the legislation was initiated, yet its recommendation took all the more courage and demonstrated with greater certainty the absolute sincerity and conscientious belief of the President in the wisdom of the legislation.

Regardless of the rant and fustian of the opposition the people of the United States fully understand that there is not going to be any un-American or unpatriotic act committed by the administration, and they also know there will be no surrender of any American rights or privileges to Great Britain under any treaty, as has been so often charged. To make this plain, so that our action in the matter can not be misunderstood by anyone now or at any future time, I introduced an amendment to the repeal bill providing, as follows:

> That by the passage of this act it shall neither be regarded as a construction of any treaty between the United States and any foreign country, nor a waiver, surrender, or abandonment of any rights or privileges of the United States thereunder, nor the waiver of any rights by the United States in the maintenance and control of the Panama Canal.

The committee, however, reported an amendment which has for its purpose the same thing I had in mind, but expressed in a little different language, as follows:

> Provided, That neither the passage of this act nor anything herein ontained shall be construed or held as waiving, impairing, or affecting any treaty or other right possessed by the United States.

I also understand the committee will make further amendments to cover every question even more specifically than embodied in my amendment. I shall therefore not press my amendment, but will vote for the bill as amended by the committee.

I have never believed that the Panama Canal act violated the Hay-Pauncefote treaty. It is true that lawyers are greatly divided in opinion on this question. It is generally conceded to be a doubtful question. Being doubtful, I would prefer to resolve the doubt in favor of the act, and thereby uphold the good faith of the people of the United States in passing it than to resolve such doubt against the law. When the legality or constitutionality of an act is involved, it is the universal rule of law to resolve all doubts in favor of sustaining the act, and I think the same rule should apply here.

The term "all nations" in rule 1, article 3, of the Hay-Pauncefote treaty, being one of the six rules prescribed by the United States as a basis of the neutralization of the canal in its use by other nations, wherein it is stated "all nations observing these rules," necessarily excludes the United States. Five of the six rules prescribed clearly apply to other nations than the United States, hence they can not possibly be said to include the United States. Furthermore, by reason of the changed conditions since its ratification, the Panama Canal can not possibly be burdened with the provisions of the treaty. The treaty was made in 1901, and the United States did not acquire the territory through which the canal was built until 1903.

When the treaty was negotiated the representatives of both Governments expected and assumed that the canal would be constructed on alien territory. At that time the contemplated route was through the Republic of Nicaragua, and Panama was not even thought of or suggested. Hence the important and controlling surrounding conditions have completely changed and we have had no treaty regarding the canal with Great Britain under the new and present existing conditions. There is no rule of international law better established than that a treaty ceases to be binding when the conditions upon which it was executed are essentially altered.

The proposition, as I view it, is therefore reduced to a purely economic question. It is estimated that the total cost of maintaining and operating the canal, including military protection and the interest on the indebtedness, will amount, in round numbers, to about $25,000,000 annually, and that the income from reasonable charges on all "over-sea" vessels will amount to only about $10,000,000. According to the report of Prof. Emory Johnson, of the University of Pennsylvania, whom President Taft intrusted with the task of ascertaining what the toll rate at Panama should be, based on actual world shipping in 1910, there were 8,328,029 tons of water freight which would have naturally passed through the Panama Canal had it been in existence. At $1.20 per ton the tolls collected would have been $9,993,634, or approximately $10,000,000. He also estimated the 1914 and 1915 tonnage at 10,500,000 tons, which, if all paid tolls, would produce $12,600,000. It is estimated of this amount approximately 800,000 tons, or about 8 per cent, would have been American coast-to-coast shipping. Exemption from tolls would therefore deprive the United States Treasury, in which all the people of the Nation are interested, of about $960,000 tolls on this traffic, or practically $1,000,000 annually. On the basis of $25,000,000 actual cost of maintenance and operation of the canal, the tolls for 1914 and 1915 would yield only 50 per cent of the charge if made against all vessels using the canal, which would necessitate drawing upon the Treasury of the United States for the balance.

The American people would, therefore, have to contribute about $12,500,000 by congressional appropriation for the maintenance and operation of the canal for the first year. Including the proportion of this expense on the 800,000 tons of American coastwise shipping free tolls would result in a total gratuity to the coastwise shipping corporations of $1,960,000, or practically $2,000,000, annually. This donation would go to relatively a very few corporations, which now, under the law, are permitted to operate as a complete monopoly as against any foreign competition in the coastwise trade. If the proposition was to pay them $2,000,000 annually direct from the Treasury, it would not receive a single vote in the Senate.

At the hearings recently held before the Senate committee it was clearly demonstrated that about 92 per cent of the coastwise vessels were owned by the railroads and that one-half of the remaining 8 per cent constituted a shipping monopoly. For the present, therefore, there would seem to be no good reason why vessels of any character should pass through the canal free of charge outside of war vessels and other vessels owned by the United States Government itself, which it is generally conceded will pass through free under every reasonable construction of the treaty. There is certainly no reason why such a great special privilege should be granted any shipping monopoly. Therefore, instead of the people receiving any benefit by free tolls, the only benefit would go to a monopoly. Monopolies are not usually formed for humanitarian purposes. Instead of filling the pockets of the people they usually empty them and fill their own pockets. So, under these conditions, it would certainly not cause a reduction in freight rates, which, after all, is the principal thing which those who favor free tolls are fighting for. All of the arguments against the repeal finally dwindle down to the single one of aid to shipping, and consequent lowering of freight transportation.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. KENYON in the chair). Does the Senator from Kansas yield to the Senator from New Hampshire?

Mr. THOMPSON. I announced in the beginning that I should prefer not to yield until I got through, but I will answer the question of the Senator.

Mr. GALLINGER. My attention was attracted by the statement the Senator made that 92 per cent of the coastwise vessels were owned or controlled by railroads. Did I understand the Senator correctly?

Mr. THOMPSON. That, as I understand, is the testimony of witnesses before the Interoceanic Canals Committee of the Senate.

Mr. GALLINGER. If the Senator will turn to the Alexander report—Mr. ALEXANDER being the chairman of the committee of the House making the report, and a Democrat—he will find that only 330 vessels are controlled, in any way, by railroads out of the 27,000 vessels, I think, engaged in the coastwise trade. Ninety-two per cent of the regular lines are thus controlled; but that does not include the vast number of American vessels engaged in the coastwise trade which do not come under that head.

Mr. THOMPSON. That is the testimony of some of the witnesses, as I understand it, that the proportion is about 92 per cent of the regular lines now engaged in the coastwise trade.

Mr. GALLINGER. That is the report of Mr. ALEXANDER, the chairman of the House committee which made the investigation.

Mr. THOMPSON. I shall be glad to look at the report. My understanding of the testimony given before the Senate committee is as I have given it here.

It is argued that to deny American shipping this aid is to give away all the benefits of the canal and to leave the people of either coast at the mercy of the transcontinental railroads. It would certainly be no worse to leave the people at the mercy of the railroads, which are controlled by the Interstate Commerce Commission, than to leave them at the mercy of a Shipping Trust, which controls itself. The more we study into the relations between the tolls to be collected from American ships using the Panama Canal and the rates charged by the transcontinental railroads the more difficult it becomes to see any merit in the contention that has been made by the opposition to the repeal that the collection of tolls from American ships would be of material benefit to the railroads. We are forced to the conclusion that the sole beneficiary of the free tolls would be the corporations engaged in coastwise trade, and that the railroads would not profit by the repeal of the exemption. Consequently the chief beneficiary of the repeal would be the American public, who built the canal at the enormous expense of about $400,000,000. So instead of the profits from the exemption going into the coffers of the steamship corporations that use the canal, in the form of additional dividends, according to the usual practice of all monopolies, the tolls charged the American ships will go into the United States Treasury, to be distributed generally to the benefit of the people throughout the country. By charging everybody reasonable tolls the people of the whole country will save in taxes the amount of the toll charges. The whole people of the country are therefore to be benefited by this legislation, instead of the few interested in coastwise shipping. By the passage of this act with the amendment we are declaring that for the present we can not afford and do not wish to grant free tolls, when we are morally certain that the people would not get the benefit of it in lower freight rates.

By the express provisions of the amendment to the bill we are saving all rights of the American people under the treaty and all rights of the United States Government in the maintenance and control of the canal, so that we may grant free tolls or favor our home trade at any time in the future, should we desire to do so. We are simply saying, for the present, at least, the free-tolls proposition is economically wrong, and the law should therefore be repealed. If at any time later an independent American shipping business should grow up in this country which would merit special consideration by the Government, and wherein there would be some reasonable assurance or guaranty that the people would receive the benefit of the free tolls in lower freight rates or otherwise, then the law granting free tolls can be passed again.

So there is no need of anyone becoming excited over the situation or unfurling the American flag and frantically declaring that the honor of the Nation is betrayed if we repeal a law which now seems to us to be wrong in justice to ourselves as well as other nations which have questioned our good faith. There is no need of placing ourselves in a position which will subject us to criticism, or even call into question our rights under any treaty, especially when by not doing so we are to be the chief beneficiaries.

The Democratic Party has always been opposed to granting subsidies and special privileges. The Panama Canal act contains both features. It is true that the last Democratic platform declared for free tolls, but this provision is inconsistent with the fundamental principles of the party and inconsistent with other provisions in the platform declaring against special privileges and subsidies. This plank was not discussed in Kansas during the campaign of 1912, and has since been repudiated by four-fifths of the delegates who created it at the national convention. But even if it was in our platform, and if it had been consistent with our former declarations, but should appear to us at this time to be wrong, as the representatives of our party now we ought to be big enough and brave enough to correct the wrong. Two wrongs never make a right, and many wrongs may be righted by doing right at the proper time. It takes courage to acknowledge a wrong, but, after all, it only shows the best spirit and greatest strength to do so.

The American people have no fears whatever of this administration committing any act or doing anything that will reflect in any way against the honor of the Nation. They have too great confidence in the President to believe, imagine, or even suspicion any such thing. It may take a little time, but sooner or later it will be clear to the people of the country that there could be no possible benefit to them by subsidizing the shipping interests of the country, and that the people of the United States as a whole are the true beneficiaries of this legislation.

Therefore, in harmony with the true Democratic doctrine of "equal rights to all and special privileges to none," I will vote for the repeal bill as amended by the Senate committee.

Mr. WORKS. Mr. President, the Committee on Interoceanic Canals has reported an amendment to this bill that can have no other effect than to mislead and deceive the public without any beneficial effects. There is but one single right involved here and that is our right to exempt our ships, engaged in the coastwise trade, from the payment of tolls for passing through the canal, while imposing tolls on the ships of other nations. We provided for this exemption by statute. The bill as it came from the House is one to repeal that clause of the statute fully, without reservation, condition, or limitation. The bill goes to that question alone. It is in plain terms a surrender of that right because of the influences that have been brought to bear to bring about such surrender. The British Government protested against the exemption of our coastwise ships because they might carry foreign goods, and their exemption might increase the tolls to be exacted from foreign ships. This claim, made by Great Britain, had been fully and conclusively met by our State Department. It has never since been renewed or urged by that Government. It was left to the senior Senator from New York [Mr. ROOT] to again raise the question after it had been practically settled, and to make broader and more unjustifiable claims against his own Government and in favor of England than she had claimed for herself.

It was an unjust assault upon the good name of our country and the good faith of its Congress. It had the desired effect. It aroused and manufactured a sentiment that seems to have changed the mind of the President on this vital question of national honor involving the right and sovereignty of the Government over the canal. While before, the President and his party had stood firmly for the exemption, and the Democratic Party had declared for it in its national platform, the Chief Magistrate has changed his mind, has violated the platform under which he was elected, and denounced the exemption as a violation of the treaty with Great Britain. He says in his message:

> In my own judgment, very fully considered and maturely formed, that exemption * * * is in plain contravention of the treaty with Great Britain concerning the canal concluded on November 18, 1901.

Why he changed his mind no one knows. Such a surrender of the views of a public official on a matter so important was never known in the history of the country. Such an open and willful violation of a party platform by any high official was never heard of. The willingness of Members of Congress to stand by this repudiation of their party platform will look to the future historian like a political scandal.

Now, Mr. President, why should the President put himself and his political friends in Congress in this most unfortunate situation? It could not have been on economic grounds alone. If an economic mistake had been made, surely the President would not on that account have sacrificed himself by this remarkable change of front and the violation of the platform of his party or have asked Democratic Members of Congress to make a like sacrifice.

No; this question of repeal involves only the question of a violation of a treaty with a foreign country. It has been presented, almost wholly, on this issue. Senators are going to vote for it on that ground and that only. The people of this country know it. History will so record it. If we pass this bill, we will have stultified ourselves and the country and confessed ourselves guilty of a willful and intentional violation of a solemn treaty with another and friendly nation for a money advantage. Singularly enough, in this effort to bring ourselves and the country into disgrace and disrepute, the President and the senior Senator from New York have become firm allies and are supported by Senators who do not believe as the President and the Senator from New York seem to do—that the exemption is a violation of the treaty. It is a strange alliance, resting upon a marvelous foundation.

With this condition of things confronting us, and because of the wave of popular protest and indignation that has swept over the country at this betrayal of a party pledge and surrender of the rights of the country, the attempt is now made by, not the friends of repeal, for they can be counted on the fingers of your two hands, but by those who are obsequiously bowing to the will of the President, to deceive and mislead the people and turn away their wrath by the amendment proposed by the committee. This is it:

> Provided, That neither the passage of this act nor anything therein contained shall be construed or held as waiving, impairing, or affecting any treaty or other right possessed by the United States.

What right of this Government involved here could by any possibility be guarded or preserved by such an amendment as this? It must be borne in mind that the only matter in dispute is our right to exempt our own ships from the payment of tolls. There is no reason or occasion for attempting to protect any other right. Does anybody really believe that we acquired this right by treaty? By no means. On the contrary, we have the right solely because of our ownership of and sovereignty over the canal, and the contention against it is that we surrendered the right by the terms of the Hay-Pauncefote treaty. The claim is not that we acquired the right by the treaty, but that we lost it in that way. How absurd and misleading it is, then, for Congress to provide that by surrendering a right not acquired by treaty the act shall not affect any right so acquired. We never gained a right by any such means that could be lost or preserved, and we surrender a right in one sentence of the act and then by proviso say the act shall have no such effect if it was acquired by treaty. Such false and misleading legislation would be an insult to an intelligent people and discredit the lawmaking body that enacted it.

Mr. President, there should be no call for any attempt by proviso to preserve our right as owner of the canal to pass our own ships through it on such terms as we may elect. The bill itself presents a false issue. No one should ever have thought of surrendering this right so clearly an incident of ownership and sovereignty. The idea that we have estopped ourselves to exercise the right by the terms of the Hay-Pauncefote treaty has few supporters among our own people. Unfortunately one of these is the President. With all his power he will coerce others to adopt his view, who do not agree with him in the least. Unfortunately again, the votes of Senators who do not agree with him, but who will respond to his request and support this repeal bill only because he asks them to do it, will hold the balance of power when the bill comes to a vote and their support will pass it, if it passes at all.

So, Mr. President, we shall have another law vital in its consequences that is passed by unwilling votes cast against the judgment and opposed to the convictions of a large majority of the Members of this body. It will be one more added to the list of laws enacted by this Congress at the will of one man without whose dictation it would never have passed.

This being the situation, we are called upon to protect, in direct terms, and without evasion, subterfuge, or ambiguity, the one and only right that is assailed and about to be surrendered, namely, the right as the owner of the canal, and not by treaty, to exempt our ships from the payment of tolls. If we pass the bill as it came from the House we will have surrendered our right for all time. The President asks the repeal because the exemption is in violation of the treaty. If we pass the bill without a declaration to the contrary, the surrender will be complete and forever. The record, taking the President's message and the following passage of the bill, would be so made and we could not escape from it; and it would be a falsehood thus established against our own people. I think it may be safely said that not a half dozen Members of this body believe that the exemption is in violation of the treaty.

But if we pass this repeal bill, a majority will have declared to that effect and seal it by statute. However willing Senators may be to repeal the exemption clause of the statute, it would be inexcusable to make such a record as that with the hope of protecting ourselves and the country from such a misfortune. I have proposed and shall offer the following amendment:

Provided, That neither the passage of this act nor the imposition upon or collection of tolls from the ships of this country or its citizens for passing through the Panama Canal shall deprive the United States of the right, as owner of said canal, to exempt from the payment of such tolls any and all ships of the Government and its citizens at any future time, nor shall this act be construed as a waiver of such right or as an acceptance of or consent to such a construction of any treaty with a foreign country as will deny or abridge the same.

With such an amendment we can safely and consistently say that we have not repealed the statute because of or upon the theory that the exemption it provides for is in violation of the Hay-Pauncefote or any other treaty, but for economic or other reasons not affecting the rights of any other nation. And this would be strictly true. If this bill presented but the one question of the violation of the Hay-Pauncefote treaty and Senators voted their own sincere convictions, it would not receive 10 votes in this body. Every Senator here knows that to be true; but, unfortunately, there are Members who do not believe we have violated the treaty, but will vote for the bill on economic grounds, and one who, according to his own declarations, will vote for it to make other nations believe we are honest. What a fearful sacrifice to make to secure the good opinion of other nations! Have we sunk so low as to make it necessary to sacrifice our sovereignty over the canal to make other nations think better of us? The senior Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE] seems to think so. I do not. I think better than that of my country. It is most unfortunate that any Senator should have conceived such an idea. It is little less unfortunate that any Member of this body should vote for the bill, under the circumstances, on economic grounds. Say what he may, explain his vote as he will, his vote will be counted in the estimation of the people of the country and of other nations as in support of the President's declaration that the exemption of our ships was in violation of the treaty, and will help to place the country in the attitude of having willfully violated a solemn pledge.

The amendment I have proposed will enable such Senators, if they feel they are in duty bound to vote for the bill on economic grounds, to so declare, in effect, in the law itself. The adoption of the amendment, if the bill passes, will at least leave us free to assert our right at any future time and at the same time free us from the humiliating position of confessing that we have violated a treaty when a large majority of the Members of this body do not believe we have done any such thing. It would be a shameful thing to do.

Mr. President, I have not proposed the amendment because I believe there is any good reason for passing this repeal bill; but if the majority of the Senate are going to vote for the bill, then I sincerely hope we will at least maintain the honorable ground that we are not doing it at the dictation of England or because we have violated any of her rights.

I hope the amendment will be favorably considered.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. MARTINE of New Jersey in the chair). The Secretary will call the roll.

The Secretary called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Borah	Jones	Page	Smith, Md.
Brady	Kern	Perkins	Smith, S. C.
Bristow	Lane	Poindexter	Smoot
Bryan	Lea, Tenn.	Pomerene	Stephenson
Burton	Lee, Md.	Ransdell	Sterling
Catron	Lippitt	Reed	Sutherland
Chamberlain	Lodge	Root	Swanson
Chilton	McCumber	Saulsbury	Thomas
Clark, Wyo.	Martin, Va.	Shafroth	Thompson
Cummins	Martine, N. J.	Sheppard	Thornton
Gallinger	Nelson	Sherman	Vardaman
Goff	Norris	Shively	Warren
Hitchcock	O'Gorman	Simmons	West
James	Oliver	Smith, Ariz.	Works
Johnson	Overman	Smith, Ga.

Mr. KERN. I wish to announce the unavoidable absence of the following Senators: The senior Senator from Arkansas [Mr. CLARKE], the junior Senator from Arkansas [Mr. ROBINSON], the junior Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. HOLLIS], the senior Senator from Alabama [Mr. BANKHEAD], and the senior Senator from Texas [Mr. CULBERSON], all of whom are paired. This announcement may stand for the day.

Mr. GALLINGER. I desire to announce the unavoidable absence of the junior Senator from Maine [Mr. BURLEIGH], who is paired with the junior Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. HOLLIS].

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. I was requested to announce that the senior Senator from Mississippi [Mr. WILLIAMS] is absent on official business. He is paired with the Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. PENROSE].

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Fifty-nine Senators have answered to their names. There is a quorum present.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by J. C. South, its Chief Clerk, announced that the House had passed the joint resolution (S. J. Res. 148) authorizing the President to extend invitations to foreign Governments to participate, through their accredited diplomatic agents to the United States, in the National Star-Spangled Banner Centennial Celebration.

The message also announced that the House had passed the following bills, in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate:

H. R. 15613. An act to create an interstate trade commission, to define its powers and duties, and for other purposes;

H. R. 16586. An act to amend section 20 of an act to regulate commerce, to prevent overissues of securities by carriers, and for other purposes; and

H. R. 15657. An act to supplement existing laws against unlawful restraints and monopolies, and for other purposes.

ENROLLED BILLS SIGNED.

The message further announced that the Speaker of the House had signed the following enrolled bills, and they were signed by the Vice President:

H. R. 3334. An act authorizing the quitclaiming of the interest of the United States in certain land situated in Hampden County, Mass.;

S. 4167. An act granting pensions and increase of pensions to certain soldiers and sailors of the Regular Army and Navy, and of wars other than the Civil War, and certain widows and dependent relatives of such soldiers and sailors;

HOUSE BILLS REFERRED.

The following bills were severally read twice by their titles and referred to the Committee on Interstate Commerce:

H. R. 15613. An act to create an interstate trade commission, to define its powers and duties, and for other purposes; and

H. R. 16586. An act to amend section 20 of an act to regulate commerce, to prevent overissues of securities by carriers, and for other purposes.

H. R. 15657. An act to supplement existing laws against unlawful restraints and monopolies, and for other purposes, was read twice by its title.

Mr. OVERMAN. I move that the bill be referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

The motion was agreed to.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

Mr. PERKINS presented a petition of Local Branch No. 228, National Association of Letter Carriers, of Pasadena, Cal., praying for the enactment of legislation to grant compensatory time privilege to postal employees, which was referred to the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads.

He also presented a petition of the Woman's Christian Temperance Union of Ripon, Cal., praying for national prohibition, which was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

He also presented a petition of the Church Federation of Palo Alto, Cal., praying for the enactment of legislation to provide for Federal censorship of motion pictures, which was referred to the Committee on Education and Labor.

Mr. PAGE presented the memorial of J. Henry McGreevy, of Burlington, Vt., remonstrating against national prohibition, which was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. LODGE presented petitions of sundry citizens of Newburyport, Fitchburg, and West Brookfield, all in the State of Massachusetts, praying for national prohibition, which were referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

He also presented a petition of the Nies Club, of Dorchester, Mass., favoring national censorship of motion pictures, which was referred to the Committee on Education and Labor.

He also presented a petition of the Board of Aldermen of Malden, Mass., and a petition of the City Council of North Adams, Mass., praying for the enactment of legislation to provide pensions for civil-service employees, which were referred to the Committee on Civil Service and Retrenchment.

Mr. SHIVELY presented memorials of George Issler, William Griffin, Frank Wayne, and 19 other citizens of Fort Wayne, Terre Haute, and Indianapolis; of the Central Labor Union of Elkhart and of Local Branch No. 60, Glass Bottle Blowers' Association, of Terre Haute, all in the State of Indiana, remonstrating against national prohibition, which were referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

He also presented petitions of Charles Hoover, W. C. Trayle, E. A. Stanton, and 22 other citizens of Middlebury, Goshen, Orland, and Milford, all in the State of Indiana, praying for national prohibition, which were referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. SIMMONS presented a petition of sundry citizens of Greensboro, N. C., praying for national recognition of Dr. Frederick A. Cook, which was referred to the Committee on the Library.

Mr. BURLEIGH presented a petition of Smyrna Mills, Me., praying for national prohibition, which was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. JOHNSON presented petitions of sundry citizens of Weld, and of Cumberland County, in the State of Maine, praying for national prohibition, which were referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina, presented a memorial of sundry citizens of Laurens, S. C., remonstrating against national prohibition, which was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. POINDEXTER presented a memorial of General O. O. Howard Circle, No. 45, Ladies of the Grand Army of the Republic, of Port Townsend, Wash., remonstrating against any change being made in the American flag, which was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

FEDERAL TRADE COMMISSION.

Mr. NEWLANDS. I submit an amendment, in the nature of a substitute, which I intend to propose to the bill (S. 4160) to create a Federal trade commission, to define its powers and duties, and for other purposes. I ask that it may be printed in the RECORD and referred to the Committee on Interstate Commerce.

There being no objection, the amendment was referred to the Committee on Interstate Commerce and ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Amendment, in the nature of a substitute, intended to be proposed by Mr. NEWLANDS to the bill (S. 4160) to create a Federal trade commission, to define its powers and duties, and for other purposes, viz: Strike out all after the enacting clause and insert the following:

"A commission is hereby created and established, to be known as the Federal trade commission, composed of five members, not more than three of whom shall be members of the same political party, and the said Federal trade commission is referred to hereinafter as 'the commission.'

"The words defined in this section shall have the following meaning when found in this act, to wit:

"'Commerce' means such commerce as Congress has the power to regulate under the Constitution.

"The term 'corporation' or 'corporations' shall include joint-stock associations and all other associations having shares of capital or capital stock, organized to carry on business for profit.

"'Antitrust acts' means the act entitled 'An act to protect trade and commerce against unlawful restraints and monopolies,' approved July 2, 1890; also sections 73 to 77, inclusive, of an act entitled 'An act to reduce taxation, to provide revenue for the Government, and for other purposes,' approved August 27, 1894; and also the act entitled 'An act to amend sections 73 and 76 of the act of August 27, 1894, entitled "An act to reduce taxation, to provide revenue for the Government, and for other purposes,"' approved February 12, 1913.

"SEC. 2. Upon the organization of the commission, the Bureau of Corporations, and the offices of Commissioner and Deputy Commissioner of Corporations, shall cease to exist, and the employees of said bureau shall become employees of the commission in such capacity as it may designate. The commission shall take over all the records, furniture, and equipment of said bureau. All work and proceedings pending before the bureau may be continued by the commission. All appropriations heretofore made for the support and maintenance of the bureau and its work are hereby authorized to be expended by the commission for said purposes.

"The Bureau of Corporations and the offices of Commissioner of Corporations and Deputy Commissioner of Corporations are, upon the organization of the commission and the election of its chairman, abolished, and their powers, authority, and duties shall be vested in and exercised by the commission free from the direction or control of the Secretary of Commerce.

"Any commissioner may be removed by the President for inefficiency, neglect of duty, or malfeasance in office. A vacancy in the commission shall not impair the right of the remaining commissioners to exercise all the powers of the commission.

"The commissioners shall be appointed by the President, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate. The terms of office of the commissioners shall be seven years each. The terms of those first appointed by the President shall date from the taking effect of this act, and shall be as follows:

"One shall be appointed for a term of three years, one for a term of four years, one for a term of five years, one for a term of six years, and one for a term of seven years; and after said commissioners shall have been so first appointed all appointments, except to fill vacancies, shall be for terms of seven years each. The commission shall elect one of its members chairman for such period as it may determine. The commission shall elect a secretary and may elect an assistant secretary. Said secretary and assistant secretary shall hold their offices or connection with the commission at the pleasure of the commission. Each commissioner shall receive a salary of $10,000 per annum. The secretary of the commission shall receive a salary of $5,000 per annum. The assistant secretary shall receive a salary of $4,000 per annum. In case of a vacancy in the office of any commissioner during his term, an appointment shall be made by the President, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, to fill such vacancy for the unexpired term. The office of the commission shall be in the city of Washington, but the commission may at its pleasure meet and exercise all its powers at any other place, and may authorize one or more of its members to prosecute any investigation, who shall have and exercise the powers herein given the commission necessary to such investigation. The commission shall have such attorneys, accountants, experts, examiners, special agents, and other employees as may, from time to time, be appropriated for by Congress, and shall have authority to audit their bills and fix their compensation.

"With the exception of the secretary and assistant secretary and one clerk to each of the commissioners, and such attorneys, accountants, experts, examiners, and special agents as may be employed, all employees of the commission shall be a part of the classified civil service. The commission shall also have the power to adopt a seal, which shall be judicially noticed, and to rent suitable rooms for the conduct of its work.

"The Auditor for the State and Other Departments shall receive and examine all accounts of expenditures of the commission.

"All the expenses of the commission, including all necessary expenses for transportation incurred by the commissioners or by their employees under their orders in making any investigation or upon official business in any other place than in the city of Washington, shall be allowed and paid on the presentation of itemized vouchers therefor, approved by the commission.

"Witnesses summoned before the commission shall be paid the same fees and mileage that are paid witnesses in the courts of the United States.

"SEC. 3. The commission shall have power, among others—

"(a) To investigate from time to time, and as often as the commission may deem advisable, the organization, business, financial condition, conduct, practices, and management of any corporation engaged in commerce and its relation to other corporations and to individuals, associations, and partnerships.

"(b) To require any corporation subject to the provisions of this act which the commission may designate to furnish to the commission from time to time information, statements, and records concerning its organization, business, financial condition, conduct, practices, management, and relation to other corporations, or to individuals, associations, or partnerships, and to require the production for examination of all books, documents, correspondence, contracts, memoranda, or other papers relating to or in any way affecting the commerce in which such corporation under inquiry is engaged or concerning its relations to any individual, association, or partnership, and to make copies of the same.

"(c) To prescribe as near as may be a uniform system of annual reports from such corporations or classes of corporations subject to the provisions of this act as the commission may designate and to fix the time for the filing of such reports, and to require such reports, or any special report, to be made under oath or otherwise, in the discretion of the commission.

"(d) To make public, in the discretion of the commission, any information obtained by it in the exercise of the powers, authority, and duties conferred upon it by this act, except so far as may be necessary to protect trade processes, names of customers, and such other matters as the commission may deem not to be of public importance, and to make annual and special reports to the Congress and to submit therewith recommendations for additional legislation.

"(e) In any suit in equity brought by or under the direction of the Attorney General as provided in the antitrust acts if the court finds for the complainant it may, upon its own motion or the motion of any party to such suit, refer the matter of the form of the decree to be entered to the commission as a master in chancery; whereupon the commission shall proceed in that capacity upon such notice to the parties and upon such hearing as the court may prescribe, and shall as speedily as practicable make report with its findings to the court, which report and findings having been made and filed shall be subject to the judicial procedure established for the consideration and disposition of a master's report and findings in equity cases.

"(f) Wherever a restraining order or an interlocutory or final decree has heretofore been entered or shall hereafter be entered against any defendant or defendants in any suit brought by the United States to prevent and restrain any violation of the antitrust acts, the commission shall have power, and it shall be its duty, upon the application of the Attorney General, to make investigation of the manner in which the order or decree has been or is being carried out, and as to whether the same has been or is being violated and what, if any, further order, decree, or relief is advisable. It shall transmit to the Attorney General a report embodying its findings as a result of any such investigation with such recommendations for further action as it may deem advisable and the report shall be made public in the discretion of the commission.

"(g) If the commission believes from its inquiries and investigations, instituted upon its own initiative or at the suggestion of the President, the Attorney General, or either House of Congress that any corporation, individual, association, or partnership has violated any law of the United States regulating commerce, it shall report its findings and the evidence in relation thereto to the Attorney General with its recommendations.

"For the purpose of prosecuting any investigation or proceeding authorized by this section the commission, or its duly authorized agent or agents, shall at all reasonable times have access to, for the purpose of examination, and the right to copy any documents or writings of any corporation being investigated or proceeded against.

"SEC. 4. The powers and jurisdiction herein conferred upon the commission shall extend over all trade associations, corporate combinations, and corporations as hereinbefore defined engaged in or affecting commerce, except banks and common carriers.

"SEC 5. Any person who shall willfully destroy, alter, mutilate, or remove out of the jurisdiction of the United States or authorize, assist in, or be privy to the willful destruction, alteration, mutilation, or removal out of the jurisdiction of the United States of any book, letter, paper, or document containing an entry or memorandum relating to commerce, the production of which the commission may require under this act, or who shall willfully make any false entry relating to commerce in any book of accounts or record of any trade association, corporate combination, or corporation, subject to the provisions of this act, or who shall willfully make or furnish to said commission or to its agent any false statement, return, or record, knowing the same to be false in any material particular, shall be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor, and upon conviction thereof shall be punished by a fine of not exceeding $5,000 or by imprisonment not exceeding one year, or by both said punishments, in the discretion of the court.

"Any employee of the commission who divulges any fact or information which may come to his knowledge during the course of his employment by the commission, except in so far as it has been made public by the commission, or as he may be directed by the commission or by a court, shall be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor, and upon conviction thereof shall be punished by a fine not exceeding $5,000, or by imprisonment not exceeding one year, or by both said punishments, in the discretion of the court.

"SEC. 6. The commission shall have and exercise the powers possessed by the Interstate Commerce Commission to supœna and compel the attendance and testimony of witnesses and the production of evidence, and to administer oaths. All the powers, requirements, obligations, liabilities, and immunities imposed or conferred by the act to regulate commerce, as amended in relation to testimony before the Interstate Commerce Commission, shall apply to witnesses, testimony, and evidence before the commission.

"SEC. 7. The district courts of the United States, upon the application of the commission alleging a failure by any corporation, or by any of its officers or employees, or by any witness, to comply with any order of the commission for the furnishing of information, shall have jurisdiction to issue such writs, orders, or other process as may be necessary to enforce any order of the commission and to punish the disobedience thereof.

"SEC. 8. The several departments and bureaus of the Government, when directed by the President, shall furnish the commission, upon its request, all records, papers, and information in their possession relating to any trade association, corporate combination, or corporation subject to any of the provisions of this act."

Amend the title so as to read: "A bill to create a Federal Trade Commission, to define its powers and duties, and for other purposes."

Mr. NEWLANDS. I am directed by the Committee on Interstate Commerce, to which was referred the bill (S. 4160) to create an interstate trade commission, to define its powers and duties, and for other purposes, to report it with an amendment in the nature of a substitute, and I submit a report (No. 583) thereon. I ask that the bill may go to the calendar.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The bill will be placed on the calendar.

STEPHEN MORRIS BARLOW.

Mr. MYERS, from the Committee on Military Affairs, to which was referred the bill (S. 4954) for the relief of Stephen Morris Barlow, reported it with an amendment, and submitted a report (No. 584) thereon.

BILLS AND JOINT RESOLUTION INTRODUCED.

Bills and a joint resolution were introduced, read the first time, and, by unanimous consent, the second time, and referred as follows:

By Mr. SHIVELY:

A bill (S. 5749) granting an increase of pension to Frank Stemm (with accompanying papers); and

A bill (S. 5750) granting a pension to Eliza J. Arthur; to the Committee on Pensions.

By Mr. THOMAS:

A bill (S. 5751) authorizing the Secretary of the Interior to grant patent to E. M. Palmer for certain lands in the State of Colorado; to the Committee on Public Lands.

By Mr. POINDEXTER:

A bill (S. 5752) for the relief of John Morrow; to the Committee on Military Affairs.

A bill (S. 5753) granting an increase of pension to William H. Satterthwait; to the Committee on Pensions.

By Mr. GORE:

A bill (S. 5754) for the relief of Miles Cook (with accompanying papers); and

A bill (S. 5755) for the relief of Jesse J. Clemmons (with accompanying papers); to the Committee on Military Affairs.

By Mr. POINDEXTER:

A bill (S. 5756) providing for farm loans from funds deposited in postal savings banks; to the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads.

A bill (S. 5757) to amend the commerce act, approved June 29, 1906; to the Committee on Interstate Commerce.

A bill (S. 5758) providing for mineral entries on lands in diminished Indian reservations; to the Committee on Indian Affairs.

By Mr. OLIVER:

A joint resolution (S. J. Res. 157) requesting the President of the United States to invite foreign Governments to participate in the International Congress on Education; to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

PANAMA CANAL TOLLS.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. 14385) to amend section 5 of an act to provide for the opening, maintenance, protection, and operation of the Panama Canal, and the sanitation of the Canal Zone, approved August 24, 1912.

Mr. O'GORMAN. Mr. President, I do not know that there is any other Senator present who desires to discuss the canal tolls bill to-day. Two Senators have announced that they will speak on Monday if they have the opportunity. I know of no others who intend to participate in the discussion. Under the circumstances, so that we may make as much progress as possible on Monday and perhaps reach a vote Monday evening, I move that the Senate take a recess until 11 o'clock Monday morning.

Mr. GALLINGER. I ask the Senator to withhold that motion. May we not devote an hour to the calendar this afternoon?

Mr. O'GORMAN. I have no objection to that. I withdraw my motion and ask that the tolls bill be temporarily laid aside.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. MARTINE of New Jersey in the chair). Without objection, the unfinished business will be temporarily laid aside and the motion for a recess is withdrawn.

THE CALENDAR.

Mr. GALLINGER. I ask unanimous consent that the Senate proceed to the consideration of unobjected cases on the calendar under Rule VIII.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the request of the Senator from New Hampshire? Without objection, such will be the order, and the Secretary will announce the first bill on the calendar.

The bill (S. 1240) to establish the legislative reference bureau of the Library of Congress was announced as first in order.

Mr. GALLINGER. Let that go over.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. It will go over.

The bill (S. 655) authorizing the Secretary of the Interior to survey the lands of the abandoned Fort Assiniboine Military Reservation and open the same to settlement was announced as next in order.

Mr. SMOOT. Let that go over.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill will go over.

The joint resolution (S. J. Res. 41) authorizing the Secretary of the Interior to sell or lease certain public lands to the Republic Coal Co., a corporation, was announced as next in order.

Mr. SMOOT. Let that go over also.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The joint resolution will go over.

The bill (S. 2242) making it unlawful for any Member of Congress to serve on or solicit funds for any political committee, club, or organization was announced as next in order.

Mr. SMOOT. Let that go over.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill will go over.

MINERAL LANDS IN INDIAN RESERVATIONS.

The bill (S. 2651) providing for the purchase and disposal of certain lands containing kaolin, kaolinite, fuller's earth, and other minerals within portions of Indian reservations heretofore opened to settlement and entry was announced as next in order.

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. Let the bill go over.

Mr. STERLING. This bill has been up several times and has gone over under objection. I should like very much to have the bill acted upon this afternoon. It is a matter of considerable interest to the people of my State.

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. I am perfectly willing that it shall be called up, but I want to remind the Senator and the Senate that it will probably lead to debate. I understood that the calendar was to be called simply for the consideration of unobjected cases.

Mr. GALLINGER. That is right.

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. I have no objection whatever to having the bill considered, if it does not lead to debate.

Mr. STERLING. I will say that I think the original bill will not lead to debate. There is an amendment proposed by the Senator from Washington [Mr. POINDEXTER] that is pending. The rest of the bill has been acted upon in Committee of the Whole, and agreed to in Committee of the Whole; I understood that there will be no objection to it.

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. Do I understand the Senator to say that the bill as it stands has been acted upon in Committee of the Whole, and agreed to?

Mr. STERLING. Yes, sir; it has been acted upon in Committee of the Whole, and agreed to. I think the RECORD will so show.

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. Does the Senator understand that the bill will lead to any debate as it now stands?

Mr. STERLING. I do not expect that it will lead to any debate. The bill has been quite fully considered.

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. The amendment that the Senator spoke of has already been offered?

Mr. STERLING. The amendment has been offered.

Mr. SHAFROTH. I should like to ask the Senator from South Dakota whether there is anything in the bill which involves the question of leasing any of the mineral lands?

Mr. STERLING. There is not anything in the bill which involves the question of leasing.

Mr. SHAFROTH. Then, I have no objection to its consideration.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill.

Mr. GALLINGER. Let the amendment be stated.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary will state the amendment proposed by the Senator from Washington [Mr. POINDEXTER].

The SECRETARY. It is proposed to add as an additional section the following:

SEC. 2. That all lands reserved as timberlands or for other purposes within diminished Indian reservations shall be open to mineral entry and location under the mining laws of the United States: Provided, That upon every producing mine developed thereon the Secretary of the Interior shall levy and collect a reasonable royalty at a rate to be fixed by him, the proceeds thereof to be paid into the tribal funds of the Indians for whose benefit said reservation was made.

Mr. SHAFROTH. I understand that there was nothing in the nature of a leasing proposition to be upon the bill. If the Senator will agree to strike out the proviso, I have no objection whatever to the bill.

Mr. POINDEXTER. Mr. President, if the Senator insists upon his objection, rather than have the bill fail I will agree that it shall go out, but I should like the Senator to withhold the objection for a moment until I state very briefly the nature of the amendment.

Mr. SHAFROTH. Very well.

Mr. POINDEXTER. It applies only to Indian lands. There was objection made by some Senators to the amendment because they apprehended that it would shut off lands from entry or establish a royalty system upon lands which they thought ought to be subject to the public-land laws without any special conditions. The lands covered by the amendment are not now subject to mineral entry at all. The reason why I introduced the amendment was in the interest of the Indians as well as in the interest of the white people. If there are any valuable minerals on these lands, it is obviously a wise policy to encourage the development of them. The lands belong to the Indians. They are not public lands. If the Senator from Colorado will consider it carefully, I think he will conclude as to those lands which belong exclusively to the Indians that it would be wrong or unwise not to allow some return to the Indians for any valuable proceeds that may come from them. I am not in favor of a royalty system as applied to public lands generally, but these are not public lands. I should like very much to have the Senator withhold his objection, or if he insists upon it, that we may dispose of it in conference. I will not insist upon the amendment to the extent of defeating the bill.

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. Will the Senator yield to me for a moment?

Mr. POINDEXTER. I yield to the Senator from Arizona.

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. These are not Indian lands, for if they were they could not be reduced in size without an act of Congress. Is this an Executive reservation or a reservation created by act of Congress?

Mr. POINDEXTER. It does not cover any Executive reservation, and could have no effect whatever upon the class of Executive reservations which the Senator has in his part of the country. It simply covers a case where there is an Indian reservation that has been by act of Congress opened up for the settlement of agricultural lands. All the agricultural lands that have not been allotted to Indians are open to homestead entry by white people. Outside of agricultural lands in these reservations there are timberlands that were not opened for settlement, but are still reserved as an Indian timber reservation not subject to entry of any kind.

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. Are there timber reservations reserving the timber for the Indians?

Mr. POINDEXTER. Yes; there have been for a number of years. It is the purpose of this amendment to open up those reservations for mineral entry.

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. The point I make is simply this: Some time ago I introduced a resolution, and if I can ever get an opportunity when my modesty will permit me to interrupt the exciting proceedings of the Senate on the tolls bill or at any subsequent time, I wish to submit some remarks to the Senate on the power of an Executive reservation to carry mineral lands with it. My contention is that no Executive order extending or creating an Indian reservation can carry with it minerals. Therefore I feel that any reservation of these mineral lands in a diminished reservation, not lands thrown out from the reservation, are not in control by the Federal Government as against a man who wishes to locate it, and no tax or imposition of any kind can be placed on that mineral property. It strikes me as absolutely opposed to the whole spirit of our mining laws that such an imposition should be made, and it ought not to be done.

Mr. POINDEXTER. I am very much in sympathy with the views of the Senator from Arizona in regard to that, and I have myself insisted in reference to several reservations which are supposed to contain minerals that under the law they are now subject to entry. Nevertheless, entries are impossible because the executive branch of the Government refuses to allow them, and, as a practical matter, they never will be made, however great the mineral resources developed, unless there is an act of this kind expressly authorizing mineral entry upon the land.

I am very much afraid the Senator from Arizona misapprehends the nature of the land designated as diminished Indian reserves. It is just the opposite of what the Senator referred to. It is not lands that have been thrown out from a reservation, but it is lands that have been kept in the reservation when some others have been thrown out.

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. But that is one of the reasons of my objection. The Senator will understand I do not wish to antagonize his bill, but there is no doubt in my mind, at least—and to that question I have given some consideration recently—that the lands even within an Executive reservation that contain mineral are open to location and settlement by miners. But whether that be true or not, I do not want that open question foreclosed by an act of Congress. If we settle it with this act of Congress, we recognize the right that I claim the President does not have in these reserves.

In answer to the further suggestion of the Senator, that you can not sue the Government, my judgment is that a valid mining claim on an Executive-order reserve is to-day open to location and settlement, and if it be true that you can not sue the Government, you can get an injunction against the particular individual who attempts to stop you from mining, and therefore foreclose the Government by the judgment of the court from further interference with the location For these reasons I hope the Senator will leave the proposed section out of the bill.

Mr. POINDEXTER. Mr. President, I hope that the Senator from Arizona will not press his objection. I should like to have an opportunity to have the amendment placed on the bill, and I feel in a perfectly reasonable frame of mind in regard to it. I do not want to press it unduly, and I want the Senator from Arizona to agree with me about it, because I am satisfied that our object is the same; that is, to allow the use of valuable minerals which under the present law will be locked up forever. The Indians never will develop it. White people are not allowed to enter the lands, and as long as they remain there locked up there is an exaggerated idea about the value of the minerals in them. It creates a state of public opinion which is very disagreeable. I think the people have some reason to object to a policy which would shut off from any kind of development or entry lands of this kind.

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. I heartily agree with the Senator that these lands ought to be developed. They are of no earthly use to the Indians. In fact, the development of them would be of great advantage to the Indians, because they would find work among their neighbors. I dislike to see the precedent established now. I would be glad if the Senator would let the bill go over.

Mr. POINDEXTER. If the Senator will withhold his objection I will later on consent to an amendment excepting Executive-order reservations.

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. I would be obliged to the Senator if he would pursue that course, for I am very averse to raising any objection to his bill, and he and I agree on this proposition, for our purpose is exactly the same.

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. Will the Senator yield to me a moment?

Mr. POINDEXTER. I yield to the Senator from Wyoming.

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. It seems that my objection to the bill lies on an entirely different ground from that of the Senator from Arizona. These are Indian lands on a diminished reservation, that portion of the reserve which is not separated from the Indians but continues to be Indian lands.

Mr. POINDEXTER. Exactly.

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. All the land belongs to the Indians; all the timber and all the mineral land still adheres to it. Have we the right, by an act of Congress, without an agreement with the Indians, especially upon a treaty reservation, to say what disposition shall be made of the lands upon that diminished reserve? I do not think so. I think we would have to have an agreement with the Indians before we could legislate.

Mr. GALLINGER. I rise to a point of order, Mr. President. The reason why the calendar has become so voluminous results from the fact that when we proceed to it we do not observe the rule of the Senate, which is that each Senator can speak five minutes and only once on a bill. Heretofore we have spent hours in debating a single bill on the calendar under Rule VIII. Under the unanimous-consent agreement, unless the rule is to be observed, I will object to the further consideration of the bill.

Mr. POINDEXTER. I will not make any further argument on the question.

Mr. GALLINGER. If the bill can be passed, I have no objection.

Mr. POINDEXTER. I ask the Senators to withhold their objection and let it, in view of the congested calendar, go through. Then in conference, if we can not agree upon it, I shall be perfectly willing to withdraw it.

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. I can hardly, with the view that I hold, agree to Congress disposing of Indian property without the consent of the Indians any more than I could consent to the idea of one man entering another man's bank and taking out what he chose to take.

Mr. POINDEXTER. The Indians have consented.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. Mr. President, I think I shall have to object to the further consideration of the bill if the Senator from Washington insists upon the consideration of his amendment. It presents a very important question—a question that ought to be looked into, it seems to me, by a committee.

Mr. SHAFROTH. I ask the Senator from Washington whether he will not withdraw the proviso. My objection to the leasing provision contained in this bill is——

Mr. SUTHERLAND. I object to the further consideration of the bill.

Mr. POINDEXTER. Did the Senator from Utah withdraw his objection to the bill?

SEVERAL SENATORS. Regular order!

Mr. POINDEXTER. If the Senator from Utah will withdraw his objection to the bill, I will withdraw the amendment to which he objects.

Mr. SMOOT. Regular order!

Mr. SUTHERLAND. I withdraw the objection, and I ask if we can pass the bill?

Mr. SHAFROTH. With the understanding that the amendment is withdrawn, the bill is perfectly satisfactory, and I hope it will pass.

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. Just a moment. I do not want to object; but I want to put the bill into some kind of shape if we can do so. There is no provision in the bill for coal at all; and yet under the provisions of the bill these lands shall "be disposed of under the general provisions of the mining and coal-land laws of the United States." I move to strike out the words "and coal-land," as they are surplusage. Of course, we can not dispose of this land as coal land is disposed of. The words to which I refer are found on page 2 of the bill, in line 14.

Mr. SHAFROTH. As I understand, the amendment proposed by the Senator from Washington [Mr. POINDEXTER] is withdrawn.

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. I know; but I am calling attention to another portion of the bill, on page 2, line 14, where it is provided that these lands—

> Shall be open to exploration and purchase and be disposed of under the general provisions of the mining and coal-land laws of the United States.

In the first place, the words "and coal-land" are surplusage; and, in the next place, if they are not surplusage, they are not applicable to this particular kind of land.

The VICE PRESIDENT. It will be necessary to reconsider the vote whereby the amendment heretofore adopted was agreed to. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and the vote whereby the amendment was agreed to is reconsidered. The Senator from Wyoming now proposes an amendment to that amendment, which will be stated.

The SECRETARY. In section 1, page 2, line 14, it is proposed to amend the amendment by striking out the words "and coal-land."

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. LANE. Mr. President, this bill is one with which I am not familiar, but it seems to me that it will be far-reaching in its effects; it is an important measure, and it will apply to lands belonging to Indians all over the United States. The Indians object to it. I have letters from them in my office. I was not looking for this bill to come up to-day, or I would have brought the letters with me and presented them to the Senate. The Indians object to having these lands taken away from them without their consent. They wish to be fully advised as to what measures are to be taken in regard to them.

The Indians of this country have been deprived of an immense deal of property of enormous value, for which they have received no return. They have been deprived of their agricultural lands, of their mineral lands, of all manner of lands, and they have had nothing in return for them. Their condition is pitiable. If this is a proposition to reach out another hand and take from them other great resources without their consent, I want to object to its passage and do all I can to defeat it.

Mr. STERLING. Mr. President, I think the Senator from Oregon is under a misapprehension as to the meaning of this bill. It does not purport to dispose of Indian lands at all. The lands covered by the bill have already been opened to settlement, but no provision has been made by Congress in regard to the disposition of the lands containing these particular kinds of mineral; that is all. This bill is simply to permit of the disposition of lands containing kaolin, kaolinite, fuller's earth, and fire clay.

Mr. LANE. "And other minerals."

Mr. STERLING. And minerals of that kind.

Mr. LANE. The bill says "and other minerals," and that phrase includes every known mineral.

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. There are two prints of the bill.

Mr. STERLING. It does not include other minerals, but it refers to other mineral lands. The provision in regard to minerals is stricken out and the bill relates specifically to the particular kinds of minerals named in the bill. They are kaolin, kaolinite, fuller's earth, china clay, and ball clay—minerals found within reservations heretofore opened up for exploration and settlement, but for the disposition of which there was no provision of law at all, and the bill allows of the disposition of them under the general mining laws.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, in comparing the copy of the calendar I have with that of the Senator from Wyoming [Mr. CLARK] I find that there are two bills being considered by the Senate. The bill that is on the Senator's calendar is entirely different from the bill which is on mine. I tried to follow the Senator's amendment and could not. I think the Senator from Oregon has another bill. For that reason I think we had better have an opportunity to know what we are acting upon, and so I object to the further consideration of the bill.

Mr. STERLING. Mr. President, I will say that the bill before the Senate is a reprint.

Mr. SMOOT. Regular order, Mr. President.

The VICE PRESIDENT. There being objection, the bill goes over.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. President, though I was here during practically all of the session to-day, I was unfortunately out of the Chamber when the calendar was taken up. I therefore ask unanimous consent to recur to Calendar Order 99. I believe there is not any opposition to it.

Mr. GALLINGER. That could not be done under the agreement. The agreement was that the Senate should proceed to the calendar under Rule VIII, and consider unobjected cases in their order.

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. Regular order!

BILLS AND RESOLUTIONS PASSED OVER.

Senate resolution No. 156, limiting expenditures for telegrams sent or received by Senators, was announced as next in order.

Mr. GALLINGER. Let that go over.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The resolution goes over.

Senate resolution No. 84, providing that any Senator upon his own request may be recorded and counted as present in order to constitute a quorum, was announced as next in order.

Mr. OVERMAN. Let that go over.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The resolution goes over.

Senate resolution No. 218, proposing an amendment to the standing rules of the Senate, was announced as next in order.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. Let that go over.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The resolution goes over.

The joint resolution (S. J. Res. 26) proposing an amendment to the Constitution of the United States was announced as next in order.

Mr. GALLINGER and Mr. SUTHERLAND. Let that go over.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The joint resolution goes over.

The bill (S. 3023) relating to the duties of registers of United States land offices and the publication in newspapers of official land-office notices was announced as next in order.

Mr. BURTON. I ask that the bill may go over.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The bill goes over.

The joint resolution (S. J. Res. 94) to authorize the Secretary of Commerce to investigate the condition of trade in China, for the purpose of determining the desirability of establishing there a permanent exposition of the products of the United States of America, was announced as next in order.

Mr. SMOOT. I ask that the joint resolution may go over.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The joint resolution goes over.

The bill (S. 2425) to authorize the Roanoke River Development Co. to construct and maintain a dam across the Roanoke River in Mecklenburg County, in the State of Virginia, approximately 20 miles below the town of Clarksville, in said State, was announced as next in order.

Mr. BURTON. Let the bill go over.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The bill goes over.

The bill (S. 3971) to provide for permanent exhibits of the resources of the States of the Union in or near Washington, D. C., was announced as next in order.

Mr. SMOOT. I ask that the bill may go over.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The bill goes over.

The joint resolution (S. J. Res. 10) proposing an amendment to the Constitution of the United States, fixing the time for the convening of Congress and commencement of the terms of the President, Vice President, Senators, and Representatives, was announced as next in order.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. Let that go over.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The joint resolution goes over.

Mr. SHAFROTH. Mr. President, that is a measure of which I gave notice a number of times, and I ask unanimous consent that it may now be taken up and considered immediately after the disposition of the tolls bill.

Mr. SUTHERLAND and Mr. WALSH. I object.

The VICE PRESIDENT. There is objection, and the joint resolution goes over.

The bill (S. 1986) to remove the charge of desertion from the military record of Henry Fuller was announced as next in order.

Mr. GALLINGER. This bill and the two bills following have been reported adversely. I ask if any Senator has any objection to their indefinite postponement, thereby getting them off the calendar?

Mr. SMOOT. The senior Senator from Michigan [Mr. SMITH] has asked that they go over. I understand he desires to make a statement before they are indefinitely postponed.

Mr. GALLINGER. Then I shall merely ask that they may go over.

Mr. OVERMAN. I ask that they may go to the calendar under Rule IX.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and the bills go to the calendar under Rule IX.

The bills referred to are as follows:

A bill (S. 1986) to remove the charge of desertion from the military record of Henry Fuller;

A bill (S. 3594) to correct the military record of Peter Duchane; and

A bill (S. 1990) to correct the military record of Samuel J. Kearns.

The resolution (S. Res. 254) to create a special committee of five Senators to assist the Interstate Commerce Commission in investigating certain facts regarding the methods and practices of the Louisville & Nashville Railroad, and for other purposes, was announced as next in order.

Mr. LEA of Tennessee. I ask that the resolution go over.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The resolution goes over.

The bill (S. 392) to create in the War Department and Navy Department, respectively, a roll designated as "the Civil War volunteer officers' retired list," to authorize placing thereon with retired pay certain surviving officers who served in the Army, Navy, or Marine Corps of the United States in the Civil War, and for other purposes, was announced as next in order.

Mr. BRYAN. I ask that the bill may go over.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The bill goes over.

Mr. KENYON. I ask unanimous consent that this bill be taken up immediately after the vote on the tolls bill.

Mr. BRYAN. I object.

Mr. KENYON. I gave notice on the 9th of March that I would ask for the taking up of this bill. I know that does not give it any right, but I think it is a bill which ought to be acted on during this session.

Mr. BRYAN. Mr. President, I understand the Senator's request would require a roll call, so as to ascertain the presence of a quorum; and to save that, I object.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Objection is made, and the bill goes over.

The bill (S. 121) to provide that petty officers, noncommissioned officers, and enlisted men of the United States Navy and Marine Corps on the retired list who had creditable Civil War service shall receive the rank or rating and the pay of the next higher enlisted grade was announced as next in order.

Mr. OVERMAN. I object.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The bill goes over.

TRAFFIC IN OPIUM.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. 6282) to provide for the registration of, with collectors of internal revenue, and to impose a special tax upon all persons who produce, import, manufacture, compound, deal in, dispense, sell, distribute, or give away opium or coca leaves, their salts, derivatives, or preparations, and for other purposes.

Mr. OVERMAN. The bill has been heretofore read.

Mr. GALLINGER. Let the first committee amendment be reported.

Mr. THOMAS. I think that bill has been considered.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The pending amendment proposed by the Committee on Finance will be stated.

The SECRETARY. In section 2, on page 4, line 6, before the word "municipal," it is proposed to strike out "and," and after the word "municipal" it is proposed to insert "and insular," and in line 9, after the word "drugs," to insert the words "or articles," so as to read:

And the State, Territorial, District, municipal, and insular officials named in section 5 of this act. Every person who shall give an order as herein provided to any other person for any of the aforesaid drugs or articles shall, at or before the time of giving such order, make or cause to be made a duplicate thereof on a form to be issued in blank for that purpose by the Commissioner of Internal Revenue, and in case of the acceptance of such order, shall preserve such duplicate for said period of two years in such a way as to be readily accessible to inspection by the officers, agents, employees, and officials hereinbefore mentioned.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. THOMAS. In section 2, page 4, line 20, after the words "veterinary surgeon," I move to strike out "registered under this act."

The amendment was agreed to.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The next amendment proposed by the committee will be stated.

The SECRETARY. In section 2, on page 4, line 21, after the word "Provided," it is proposed to strike out "however," and in line 22, after the word "shall," to strike out "personally attend upon such patient" and to insert "have been specially employed to prescribe for the particular patient receiving such drug: And provided further, That such drug shall be dispensed in good faith and not for the purpose of avoiding the provisions of this act," so as to read:

Provided, That such physician, dentist, or veterinary surgeon shall have been specially employed to prescribe for the particular patient receiving such drug: And provided further, That such drug shall be dispensed in good faith and not for the purpose of avoiding the provisions of this act.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. THOMAS. On behalf of the committee I offer an amendment to come in following the committee amendment in line 2, on page 5.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The amendment will be stated.

The SECRETARY. After the word "act." on page 5, section 2, line 2, it is proposed to insert the following:

Provided also, That a record of the drugs thus dispensed shall be made in a suitable book kept for that purpose, and shall be preserved for two years in such a way as to be readily accessible to inspection by the officers, agents, employees, and officials hereinbefore mentioned.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. THOMAS. On page 5, section 2, line 4, after the word "drugs," the committee offers an amendment to insert the words "or articles."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. THOMAS. The committee also offers an amendment on page 5, section 2, line 4, to strike out the word "pharmacist" and to insert the word "dealer."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. THOMAS. On page 5, section 2, line 10, after the word "such," the committee offers an amendment to strike out the word "pharmacist" and to insert "dealer."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. THOMAS. On page 5, section 2, line 11, after the word "such," I move on behalf of the committee to strike out "prescriptions" and to insert "prescription."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. THOMAS. On behalf of the committee, on page 5, section 2, line 12, before the word "prescription," I move to strike out "each" and to insert the words "the same."

Mr. SMOOT. I suggest to the Senator that the word "such" should be inserted there instead of the words "the same."

Mr. THOMAS. I accept the suggestion of the Senator from Utah. The word "such" should be inserted. I move to insert the word "such" instead of the word "each."

The VICE PRESIDENT. The amendment will be stated.

The SECRETARY. On page 5, section 2, line 12, before the word "prescription," it is proposed to strike out "each" and to insert "such."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. THOMAS. On page 5, section 2, line 17, after the word "drugs," I move, on behalf of the committee, to insert the words "or articles."

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment reported by the Committee on Finance was, in section 2, subsection (c), page 5, line 18, after the word "America," to insert "or any Territory or the District of Columbia or any of the insular possessions of the United States of America"; and in line 20, after the word "country," to insert "regulating their entry in accordance with such regulations for importation thereof into such foreign country as are prescribed by said country, such regulations to be promulgated from time to time by the Secretary of State of the United States," so as to read:

(c) To the sale, exportation, shipment, or delivery of any of the aforesaid drugs by any person within the United States of America, or any Territory or any of the insular possessions of the United States of America, to any person in any foreign country, regulating their entry in accordance with such regulations for importation thereof into such foreign country as are prescribed by said country, such regulations to be promulgated from time to time by the Secretary of State of the United States.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. THOMAS. On behalf of the committee, I offer the amendment which I send to the desk, to come in at the end of subsection (c).

The VICE PRESIDENT. The amendment will be stated.

The SECRETARY. On page 7, after line 5, it is proposed to insert the following:

(d) To the sale, barter, exchange, or giving away of any of the aforesaid drugs or articles to any officer of the United States Government or any State, county, or municipal government lawfully engaged in making purchases thereof for the various departments of the Army and Navy, and for Government, State, county, or municipal hospitals or prisons.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment reported by the committee was, on page 6, line 23, after the word "drugs," to insert the words "or articles."

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, I should like to call the attention of the Senator from Colorado to an amendment that should be inserted on page 6, line 10. It reads as follows:

Provided, That such forms shall be furnished by the collector without cost to the officers of the United States Government or the State governments who are lawfully engaged in making purchases of the aforesaid drugs for the various departments of the Army and Navy and for Government and State hospitals.

Mr. THOMAS. On what page of the printed bill?

Mr. SMOOT. Page 6, line 10.

Mr. THOMAS. What is the page of the document where the amendment is suggested?

Mr. SMOOT. On page 4, Senate Document 473, about the middle of the page. It is suggested that, on line 10, page 6, after the word "district," the proviso which I have read should be inserted.

Mr. THOMAS. That is proper, Mr. President. On page 6, line 10, after the word "district," I move, on behalf of the committee, that that amendment be inserted.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The amendment will be stated.

The SECRETARY. On page 6, line 10, after the word "district," it is proposed to insert:

Provided, That such forms shall be furnished by the collector without cost to the officers of the United States Government or the State governments who are lawfully engaged in making purchases of the aforesaid drugs for the various departments of the Army and Navy and for Government and State hospitals.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment reported by the Committee on Finance was, on page 6, line 23, after the word "drugs," to insert the words "or articles"; on page 7, line 1, after the word "drugs," to insert "or articles"; and on the same page, line 3, after the word "drugs," to insert "or articles," so as to read:

Whenever any collector shall sell any of such forms, he shall cause the name of the purchaser thereof to be plainly written or stamped thereon before delivering the same; and no person other than such purchaser shall use any of said forms bearing the name of such purchaser for the purpose of procuring any of the aforesaid drugs or articles or furnish any of the forms bearing the name of such purchaser to any person with intent thereby to procure the shipment or delivery of any of the aforesaid drugs or articles. It shall be unlawful for any person to obtain by means of said order forms any of the aforesaid drugs or articles for any purpose other than the use, sale, or distribution thereof by him in the conduct of a lawful business in said articles or in the legitimate practice of his profession.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. THOMAS. In section 2, line 5, on page 7, before the word "articles," I move, on behalf of the committee, to insert the words "drugs or."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. THOMAS. On page 7, after line 5, on behalf of the committee, I offer the amendment which I send to the desk.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The amendment will be stated.

The SECRETARY. In section 2, page 7, after line 5, it is proposed to insert:

The provisions of this act shall apply to the United States of America, the District of Columbia, the District of Alaska, the Territory of Hawaii, the insular possessions of the United States, and the Canal Zone. In Porto Rico and the Philippine Islands the administration of this act, the collection of the said special tax, and the issuance of the order forms specified in section 2 shall be performed by the appropriate internal-revenue officers of those Governments, and all revenues collected hereunder in Porto Rico and the Philippine Islands shall accrue intact to the general governments thereof, respectively. The courts of first instance in the Philippine Islands shall possess and exercise jurisdiction in all cases arising under this act in said islands. In the Canal Zone the administration of this act, the collection of the said special tax, and the issuance of the order forms specified in section 2 shall be performed by such officer or officers in said Canal Zone as the President may designate for that purpose. The courts of the Canal Zone having jurisdiction of crimes and offenses committed in said zone shall have jurisdiction to hear, try, and determine all actions and proceedings in which any person shall be charged with having violated any of the provisions of this act within the limits of said Canal Zone.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, in that amendment I observe that Alaska is designated as a District. Is not Alaska a Territory?

Mr. SMOOT. It is.

Mr. GALLINGER. I suggest that the word "District" be stricken out and the word "Territory" be inserted.

Mr. THOMAS. I think that is an excellent suggestion, Mr. President. Alaska is a Territory, and I modify the amendment in that way.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the amendment as modified.

The amendment as modified was agreed to.

The next amendment reported by the Committee on Finance was, in section 3, page 7, line 11, after the word "drugs," to insert "and articles," so as to make the section read:

SEC. 3. That any person who shall be registered in any internal-revenue district under the provisions of section 1 of this act shall, whenever required so to do by the collector of the district, render to the said collector a true and correct statement or return, verified by affidavit, setting forth the quantity of the aforesaid drugs and articles received by him in said internal-revenue district during such period immediately preceding the demand of the collector, not exceeding three months, as the said collector may fix and determine, the names of the persons from whom the said articles were received, the quantity in each instance received from each of such persons, and the date when received.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, in section 4, page 7, line 21, after the word "drugs," to insert "or articles," so as to read:

SEC. 4. That it shall be unlawful for any person who shall not have registered and paid the special tax as required by section 1 of this act to send, ship, carry, or deliver any of the aforesaid drugs or articles from any State or Territory.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, is that amendment right? Should not the amendment on page 7, line 21, inserting the words "or articles," be disagreed to? The committee suggested that amendment before the bill was reported to the Senate, but the changes which have been made on page 3 of the bill, I think, require that those words should be left out of the bill; in other words, that the amendment should be disagreed to. I will ask the Senator from Colorado if that is not correct?

Mr. THOMAS. So far as I am able to judge offhand, I should say that the words "or articles" are proper. I do not know that I understand the reason given by the Senator for suggesting that the amendment inserting those words be disagreed to.

Mr. SMOOT. If the Senator will note the amendments suggested in Senate Document 473, he will find on page 4 of that document a suggested amendment in line 3, page 7, to strike out the words "or articles."

Mr. THOMAS. All of those amendments, I will say to the Senator, were suggested by the department and depended upon disagreeing to the amendment reported by the committee on page 2, lines 1 to 3, proposing to insert the words "or hypodermic syringes or needles adapted to administer any of the above drugs." Those words have not been stricken out, and consequently the retention of the words "or articles" is necessary throughout the bill.

Mr. SMOOT. I understood, Mr. President, that the amendment referred to by the Senator was to be stricken from the bill. If it is not, then the Senator is perfectly correct; but if it is to be stricken from the bill the amendment inserting the words "or articles" is proper.

Mr. THOMAS. I should not feel authorized to agree to striking out the proposed amendment concerning hypodermic syringes in the absence of the senior Senator from Mississippi [Mr. WILLIAMS], who really has charge of the bill. Personally I should not object to the elimination from the bill of that amendment.

Mr. SMOOT. All these amendments will go to conference.

Mr. THOMAS. Yes.

Mr. SMOOT. And if it is finally decided to eliminate the words read by the Senator from Colorado covering hypodermic syringes or needles, then the words "or articles" will likewise have to be dropped out in conference.

Mr. THOMAS. Certainly.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the amendment reported by the committee.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment reported by the Committee on Finance was, in section 4, page 7, line 22, before the word "the," to strike out "or" and insert "the Territory of Alaska"; in the same line, after the words "District of Columbia," to insert "or any insular possession of the United States of America"; in line 25, after the words "District of Columbia," to insert "or insular possession"; and on page 8, line 5, after the word "or," to strike out "to," and insert "in pursuance of," so as to read:

SEC. 4. That it shall be unlawful for any person who shall not have registered and paid the special tax as required by section 1 of this act to send, ship, carry, or deliver any of the aforesaid drugs or articles from any State or Territory, the Territory of Alaska, the District of Columbia, or any insular possession of the United States of America, to any person in any other State or Territory or the District of Columbia or insular possession: Provided, That nothing contained in this section shall apply to common carriers engaged in transporting the aforesaid drugs or articles, or to any employee within the scope of his employment, of any person who shall have registered and paid the special tax as required by section 1 of this act, or in pursuance of the written prescriptions of physicians, dentists, and veterinary surgeons who have registered under this act.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. THOMAS. The committee proposes an amendment to strike out all after the word "act," in section 4, page 8, line 5, and to insert in lieu thereof the amendment I send to the desk.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The amendment will be stated.

The SECRETARY. In section 4, page 8, line 5, after the word "act," it is proposed to strike out the remainder of the section down to and including the word "employed," in line 11, and in lieu thereof to insert:

Or to any person who shall deliver any such drug or article which has been prescribed or dispensed by a physician, dentist, or veterinarian who has been specially employed to prescribe for the particular patient receiving such drug or article.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment of the Committee on Finance was, in section 5, page 8, line 16, after the word "section," to strike out "four" and insert "three"; in line 20, after the words "District of Columbia," to insert "or any insular possession of the United States of America"; in line 24, after the word "drugs," to insert the words "or articles"; on page 9, line 4, after the words "District of Columbia," to insert "or any insular possession of the United States of America"; in line 14, after the words "District of Columbia," to insert "or any insular possession of the United States of America"; and in line 18, after the word "drugs," to insert "or articles," so as to make the section read:

SEC. 5. That the duplicate-order forms and the prescriptions required to be preserved under the provisions of section 2 of this act, and the statements or returns filed in the office of the collector of the district, under the provisions of section 3 of this act, shall be open to inspection by officers, agents, and employees of the Treasury Department duly authorized for that purpose; and such officials of any State or Territory, or of any organized municipality therein, or of the District of Columbia, or any insular possession of the United States of America, as shall be charged with the enforcement of any law or municipal ordinance regulating the sale, prescribing, dispensing, dealing in, or distribution of the aforesaid drugs or articles. Each collector of internal revenue is hereby authorized to furnish, upon written request, certified copies of any of the said statements or returns filed in his office to any of such officials of any State or Territory or organized municipality therein, or the District of Columbia or any insular possession of the United States of America, as shall be entitled to inspect the said statements or returns filed in the office of the said collector, upon the payment of a fee of $1 for each 100 words or fraction thereof in the copy or copies so requested. Any person who shall disclose the information contained in the said statements or returns or in the said duplicate order forms, except as herein expressly provided, and except for the purpose of enforcing the provisions of this act, or for the purpose of enforcing any law of any State or Territory or the District of Columbia or any insular possession of the United States of America, or ordinance of any organized municipality therein, regulating the sale, prescribing, dispensing, dealing in, or distribution of the aforesaid drugs or articles, shall on conviction be fined or imprisoned as provided by section 9 of this act. And collectors of internal revenue are hereby authorized to furnish upon written request to any person a certified copy of the names of any or all persons who may be listed in their respective collection districts as special-tax payers under the provisions of this act upon payment of a fee of $1 for each 100 names or fraction thereof in the copy so requested.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. THOMAS. In section 6, page 10, line 5, after the word "than," on behalf of the committee I move to strike out "one-twelfth" and insert "one-fourth."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. THOMAS. The committee also ask that the amendment reported by the committee in section 6, page 10, line 16, proposing to insert after the word "act" the words "Provided, That the amount of any drug herein mentioned shall be shown upon the label of the container of such remedy or preparation," be disagreed to.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the amendment reported by the committee.

The amendment was rejected.

The next amendment of the Committee on Finance was, in section 8, page 11, line 7, after the word "drugs," to insert "or articles," so as to read:

SEC. 8. That it shall be unlawful for any person not registered under the provisions of this act, and who has not paid the special tax provided for by this act, to have in his possession or under his control any of the aforesaid drugs or articles.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. THOMAS. In section 8, page 11, line 12, on behalf of the committee I move the amendment which I send to the desk.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The amendment will be stated.

The SECRETARY. In section 8, page 11, line 12, after the word "person," it is proposed to insert the words "or to a nurse under the supervision of a physician, dentist, or veterinary surgeon registered under this act."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. THOMAS. In the same section, page 11, line 13, after the word "employment," I move, on behalf of the committee, to insert the words "or occupation."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. THOMAS. In the same section, page 11, line 14, after the word "drugs," I move, on behalf of the committee, to insert the words "or articles."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. THOMAS. Also, on behalf of the committee, in section 8, page 11, line 18, after the word "drugs," I move to insert the words "or articles."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. THOMAS. That completes the committee amendments.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. Mr. President, I notice that all the way through this bill when it speaks of the United States it says "the United States of America." What is the necessity of having the words "of America" in the bill? It is unusual and unnecessary in legislation. We can legislate only for the United States of America. It seems to me we had better follow the usual form, and simply say "the United States."

Mr. THOMAS. I am perfectly willing to strike out the words "of America," Mr. President. We are so accustomed in this body to using more words than are necessary that I supposed it would do no harm in this case. [Laughter.]

Mr. SUTHERLAND. I notice that in two or three places in the bill the words "the United States" are used, but in a great majority of cases it says "the United States of America."

Mr. THOMAS. Let the last two words go out, Mr. President.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The amendment will be stated.

The SECRETARY. Wherever the words "United States of America" occur in the bill it is proposed to strike out the words "of America."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, I notice that in one part of the bill the words "registered under this act" are stricken out, and I am sure an amendment was agreed to a moment ago retaining those words. The registration is under an entirely different act of Congress, and the words ought to be stricken out of this bill. I refer to the amendment which was acted upon a moment ago.

Mr. THOMAS. What part of the bill does the Senator refer to?

Mr. GALLINGER. The amendment concerning veterinary surgeons, and so forth, where the words "registered under this act" are used. Manifestly they are not registered under this act, there being a general law on the subject.

Mr. THOMAS. Do I understand that the Senator asks to have the words "registered under this act" inserted in the bill?

Mr. GALLINGER. I ask to have them stricken from the bill.

Mr. THOMAS. They were stricken from the bill.

Mr. GALLINGER. They were, in one case, but I am very sure an amendment was read a moment ago in which those words occurred.

Mr. LANE. The amendment was in section 8, page 11, line 16. I think that is the one to which the Senator refers.

Mr. GALLINGER. I think wherever those words occur they should be stricken from the bill.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. President, I call the Senator's attention to the fact that under the provisions of section 1 anyone dealing in those articles must register; and I apprehend that the registration refers to the provisions of that section.

Mr. GALLINGER. I know very little about it. The bill is too complicated for me to comprehend.

Mr. WALSH. I inquire of the Senator from Colorado if that is not correct?

Mr. THOMAS. The Senator from Colorado can not definitely answer that question. I do not recall that the words "registered under this act" appear more than once in the act.

Mr. GALLINGER. Oh, yes, they do; several times.

Mr. THOMAS. If they do, I am inclined to think the suggestion made by the Senator from New Hampshire should be followed.

Mr. WALSH. Under the provisions of section 1, everyone dealing in these articles is required to register with the collector of the district.

Mr. THOMAS. There is a provision in the act which dispenses with registration, which was stricken out for reasons set forth in the document which deals with the amendments, although I am not able to turn to it immediately in my copy of the bill; and I do not recall that any amendment offered includes those words.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, on page 11, line 12, after the word "person," the following amendment was agreed to:

Or to a nurse under the supervision of a physician, dentist, or veterinary surgeon registered under this act.

Mr. JAMES. That is all right. It can be stricken out in conference.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, may I ask whether the amendment of the committee on page 2, beginning in line 1, and ending with the word "drugs" in line 3, was agreed to?

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary informs the Chair that it was.

Mr. SMOOT. Now, Mr. President, I wish to ask the Senator having the bill in charge——

Mr. THOMAS. Just a moment, if the Senator please. I think the amendment which was offered on page 11, line 12, properly required registration. The purpose of striking out the words "registered under this act" in subdivision "(a)" in section 2 on page 4 was to remove the necessity of such registration in cases of the dispensing and distribution of the drugs or articles provided for in that subsection and others. In other words, it was designed to make an exception that might be necessary in cases of exigency. Therefore I am inclined to think the suggestion made by the Senator from New Hampshire is not sound.

Mr. GALLINGER. I quite agree with the Senator, upon examining the bill more closely. The words ought not to be stricken out at that point.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, I wish to inquire of the Senator whether he intends the bill to pass with the amendment of the committee on page 2, beginning in line 1, and ending with the word "drugs" in line 3; that is to say, in these words:

Or hypodermic syringes or needles adapted to administer any of the above drugs.

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. President, that amendment was offered by the senior Senator from Mississippi [Mr. WILLIAMS], who is the chairman of the subcommittee having this bill in charge. It was adopted by the subcommittee, and the report has been made upon it. The report I have heard concerning that amendment practically convinced me that there was no necessity for including these instruments in the bill; but, as I say, in the absence of the Senator from Mississippi I can not consent to having them eliminated. They can be taken care of in conference.

Mr. SMOOT. I wish to call attention to the fact that the National Drug Trade Conference, the Treasury Department, and the Internal-Revenue Office all object to those words going into the bill, and I think give excellent reasons why they should not be in the bill.

For instance, the Commissioner of Internal Revenue states:

The reasons for striking out the committee's amendment are as follows—

Referring to the particular amendment to which I am now calling attention.

The bill is designed to control the use of narcotics. If it is effective in the control of such drugs, it is wholly unnecessary to regulate the instruments by which they are administered. Further, the committee's amendment would make it necessary for all manufacturers of any kind of a hypodermic syringe or needle to register under the act. To this the Internal Revenue Bureau of the Treasury Department is opposed, because of the great labor that would be required and the unnecessary records that would have to be kept, thus adding greatly to the expense of administering the act.

Then, at the National Drug Trade Conference the association took almost the same position as that taken by the Treasury Department.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, the National Drug Trade Conference suggests that if the hypodermic-syringe provision is stricken out, the words "or articles" should not go in the bill; and yet we have been inserting those words here for the last half hour.

Mr. SMOOT. That is true, and I called attention to it a little while ago. Of course if the Senator feels that he would rather let this bill go to conference, and thrash it out there, I will state frankly that it can be done, because all of these are amendments made by the Senate.

Mr. THOMAS. I do not feel that I can do otherwise in the absence of the Senator from Mississippi.

Mr. SMOOT. Then I shall not insist.

Mr. THOMAS. I fully sympathize with the views expressed by the Senator from Utah. I think they are sound.

Mr. SMOOT. All right.

Mr. BURTON. Mr. President, I am in receipt of very strenuous objections to that amendment from physicians and others. It is my recollection that the Senator from Colorado proposed an amendment as a substitute for that when this bill was up before. Attention was called to this when the bill was considered on a prior occasion. I think the senior Senator from Indiana [Mr. SHIVELY] objected to it.

Mr. SHIVELY. I was under the impression that the objection that has been made had been obviated by a change of the language.

Mr. BURTON. It is my own recollection that the Senator from Colorado [Mr. THOMAS] proposed an amendment which was to be inserted as a substitute for this, and which would remove the objections which were made.

I do not feel like objecting to the further consideration of the bill because of this amendment; but very strong objection has been made to it by dealers, physicians, and others. It seems to me utterly unnecessary. It would require every physician who has an instrument of that kind to register.

Mr. THOMAS. When the bill was before the Senate heretofore, it was in charge of the Senator from Mississippi. I assisted him in proposing some amendments to the measure, but I have no recollection of proposing a substitute for this amendment.

The VICE PRESIDENT. If the Chair may be permitted to interrupt, it was amended on the 16th of April by the Senator from Colorado, whose amendment the Secretary will read.

The SECRETARY. The amendment of the committee reads:

Or hypodermic syringes or needles adapted to administer any of the above drugs.

To that an amendment was agreed to, as follows:

Except veterinary hypodermic syringes and needles, and hypodermic syringes and needles designed and used for the administration of serums, vaccines, toxins, and analogous products.

Mr. THOMAS. Yes; I remember now quite distinctly that that amendment was then proposed and adopted; but of course that does not do away with the force of the criticism made by the Senator from Utah.

Mr. SMOOT. No; as the Senator says, that does not do away with the criticism to which I have called the Senator's attention. That does away with the criticism as to a certain kind of instrument where the serums are used.

Mr. THOMAS. If the Senator cares to move to strike out the proposed amendment, I shall not oppose it.

Mr. SMOOT. I really feel that it ought to go out, and I do not believe the Senate should pass the bill with that language in it. If the Senator does not object, I shall move that that amendment be stricken from the bill, and also the words "or articles" wherever they have been put in the bill by the committee. That will cover the whole of the objections of the department in one motion.

Mr. WARREN. Mr. President, I wish to ask the Senator in charge of the bill, owing to the confusion and the fact that there are only about 13 pages in the bill and some 1,300 amendments so far—I do not know exactly how many—whether he feels confident that the bill, when passed here, will be in a condition to go to conference, or whether it ought not to be rewritten and have a reexamination by the committee before it passes out of the Senate?

I merely make the suggestion. I have no objection to the bill. It is a very serious condition, however, I should think, when a bill is subject to so many amendments, made on various days, and when no one seems to understand where the bill is now. I doubt if any man in his seat here now has an idea what this bill provides and what it does not provide.

Mr. THOMAS. The amendments which were made to the bill heretofore were made to the part of it which preceded the portion that has been read and amended to-day.

Mr. SMOOT. Yes; all of them.

Mr. THOMAS. I am quite willing to act upon the suggestion of the Senator from Wyoming after the amendments have been agreed to.

Mr. WARREN. I do not suggest it in order to create delay. I simply suggest it as a warning, perhaps, as to whether it ought to be rewritten or whether the committee is satisfied to have it passed as it is.

Mr. THOMAS. I do not believe there ought to be any further needless delay in the passage of this bill. Its importance, of course, is well known. I imagine that it can be printed and laid before the Senate so that we can consider it on Monday, and doubtless an opportunity will present itself where, by unanimous consent, a final vote may be taken upon it. I am willing to take that course, if desired.

Mr. GALLINGER. I think that would be a wise course to pursue. In the meantime the Senator can go carefully over the bill.

Mr. THOMAS. Yes. In the meantime I think the motion of the Senator from Utah should be disposed of, because that will make a great difference.

Mr. SMOOT. Yes; I think all of the Senate will agree that that amendment should be disagreed to. If that is the case, with all of the amendments that were put into the bill on account of this amendment—that is, the words "or articles,"—stricken out, it would be well to have the bill reprinted, and then the Senator can go over it carefully, as suggested by the Senator from Wyoming.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on reconsidering the amendment as amended, at the top of page 2.

The motion to reconsider was agreed to.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question now is on agreeing to the amendment as amended.

The amendment as amended was rejected.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Utah moves that wherever the words "or articles" or the words "and articles" have been included in the bill the vote by which the amendment was agreed to may be reconsidered.

Mr. BURTON. I should like to understand that. Do the words "or articles" include only the items specified at the top of page 2?

Mr. THOMAS. Yes.

Mr. SMOOT. Simply the syringes. Everything else is the drug itself, and the word "drugs" cover that; but when we put in the amendment about hypodermic syringes and needles we designated them thereafter as "or articles" or "and articles." It applies only to this amendment.

Mr. BURTON. I had supposed that was inserted for greater conclusiveness.

Mr. THOMAS. No, Mr. President; it was meant only to cover the syringes and needles.

Mr. BURTON. Merely for those?

Mr. THOMAS. That is all.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The pending question is whether the motion to reconsider the various amendments embracing the words "or articles" and "and articles" shall be agreed to.

The motion to reconsider was agreed to.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the amendments.

The amendments were rejected.

Mr. THOMAS. The committee proposes, on line 24, page 2, after the word "Navy," to insert the words "the Public Health Service."

The VICE PRESIDENT. That language has been all stricken out, and an amendment has been adopted at that point.

Mr. THOMAS. Then I withdraw the request, Mr. President. I had no note of that action here, and I did not want to overlook the amendment.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair will call the attention of the committee—it is not the Chair's business, but it will assume it—to the fact that on the first page of the bill it is provided that it shall go into effect on the 1st day of January, 1914.

Mr. THOMAS. That was changed to "October."

The VICE PRESIDENT. It has not been changed by the record.

Mr. THOMAS. It was the first amendment offered.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The amendment will be stated.

The SECRETARY. It is proposed to strike out the word "January," on page 1, line 3, and to insert in lieu thereof "October."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. LANE. Mr. President, I should like to call the attention of the Senator from Colorado to section 6, on page 10. This bill is one, I presume, to curtail the use of drugs such as opiates and cocaine; and yet in that section there is a provision which allows any street faker or anyone else to dispense a solution containing 2 grains of opium to each fluid ounce of a preparation—a grain to a tablespoonful. That is not a good provision. It should be better guarded than that. That will permit the use of these drugs in soothing sirups, cough mixtures, and all kinds of dopes which can be sold by fakers, and which are deadly to infants. That is a deadly dose to an infant or a child under a year old. A teaspoonful of that mixture will kill a child, and such a provision ought to be looked into.

I should like to have the committee, before they put the bill on its final passage, hear some testimony on that subject. That is directly contrary to every principle which seems to govern the remainder of the bill.

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. President, that section has been the subject, I suppose, of as much discussion, particularly by way of correspondence, from the National Drug Trade Association and from physicians and dealers, as any other of the various sections of the bill. The consensus of their statements is in favor of this section as it has been drawn by the House and amended by the Senate.

I am quite willing to turn over to the Senator from Oregon the accumulated correspondence which I have upon the subject. I am unable at this time to give him the general course of the arguments which were used in favor of the measure as it has been reported.

Mr. LANE. That would be interesting reading. I would like to see some of that correspondence. I submitted this bill to the State Board of Health of Oregon, and criticism was made in regard to that feature, and they did not indorse it. I know of no board of health that has indorsed it. On the other hand, there has been a lot of correspondence from people who are manufacturing those mixtures and preparations and from dealers and druggists. You can, no doubt, secure many indorsements from manufacturing druggists who make patent medicines, for the reason that they sell them at a profit, and they are in many patent medicines.

Mr. THOMAS. I will give the Senator the correspondence in my possession, and meantime I will have the bill printed.

Mr. GALLINGER. Printed with amendments?

Mr. THOMAS. Printed with amendments, of course.

Mr. LANE. That is all I ask.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The bill will be passed over.

BILLS PASSED OVER.

The bill (H. R. 6827) to amend an act entitled "An act to change the name of the Public Health and Marine-Hospital Service to the Public Health Service, to increase the pay of officers of said service, and for other purposes," approved August 14, 1912, was announced as next in order.

Mr. SMOOT. Let that bill go over, Mr. President. One of the Senators who wanted to speak on it is absent.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The bill will be passed over.

The bill (S. 2002) to reduce fees in the United States district courts, to fix the salaries of the clerks of such courts, to increase the mileage and per diem of witnesses and jurymen therein, and to repeal section 840 of the Revised Statutes and all other conflicting laws, was announced as next in order.

Mr. SMOOT. Let that bill go over, for the same reason.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The bill will be passed over.

EMORY SCOTT LAND.

The bill (S. 67) for the relief of Emory Scott Land was announced as next in order.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The bill has been reported adversely.

Mr. GALLINGER. Let it go to Rule IX, Mr. President.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The bill will go to the calendar under Rule IX.

PENSIONS AND INCREASE OF PENSIONS.

The bill (H. R. 12045) granting pensions and increase of pensions to certain soldiers and sailors of the Civil War and certain widows and dependent children of soldiers and sailors of said war was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

The bill had been reported from the Committee on Pensions with amendments.

The first amendment of the Committee on Pensions was, on page 1, line 9, after the word "receiving," to insert: "Provided, That in the event of the death of Pearl Schnader, helpless and dependent child of said Edward D. Schnader, the additional pension herein granted shall cease and determine: And provided further, That in the event of the death of Clara P. Schnader the name of the said Pearl Schnader shall be placed on the pension roll, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws, at the rate of $12 per month from and after the date of death of said Clara P. Schnader," so as to make the clause read:

The name of Clara P. Schnader, widow of Edward D. Schnader, late of Company C, Seventy-ninth Regiment Pennsylvania Volunteer Infantry, and pay her a pension at the rate of $24 per month in lieu of that she is now receiving: Provided, That in the event of the death of Pearl Schnader, helpless and dependent child of said Edward D. Schnader, the additional pension herein granted shall cease and determine: And provided further, That in the event of the death of Clara P. Schnader the name of the said Pearl Schnader shall be placed on the pension roll, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws, at the rate of $12 per month from and after the date of death of said Clara P. Schnader.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 2, after line 19, to strike out:

The name of Patrick Mahan, late of Company B, One hundred and twenty-fourth Regiment Ohio Volunteer Infantry, and pay him a pension at the rate of $30 per month in lieu of that he is now receiving.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. SHIVELY. Mr. President, on page 3, I move to amend by striking out lines 23 and 24, and on page 4 by striking out lines 1 and 2, the soldier having died.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The amendment will be stated.

The SECRETARY. On page 3, beginning with line 23, it is proposed to strike out lines 23 and 24 and lines 1 and 2 on page 4, in the following words:

The name of Conrad Stephan, late of Company C, Fifteenth Regiment Ohio Volunteer Infantry, and pay him a pension at the rate of $30 per month in lieu of that he is now receiving.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment of the Committee on Pensions was, on page 4, after line 15, to strike out:

The name of John J. Haley, late civilian pilot, Mississippi River, and pay him a pension at the rate of $30 per month.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 5, after line 10, to strike out:

The name of Charles R. Gentner, late of Company D, Sixth Regiment Pennsylvania Volunteer Cavalry, and pay him a pension at the rate of $30 per month in lieu of that he is now receiving.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 5, line 22, before the words "per month," to strike out "$24" and insert "$20," so as to make the clause read:

The name of Elizabeth Dorman, widow of Louis Dorman, late of Battery F, First Regiment Missouri Volunteer Light Artillery, and pay her a pension at the rate of $20 per month in lieu of that she is now receiving.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. SHIVELY. On page 6, I move to strike out lines 7, 8, 9, and 10. The soldier is deceased.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The amendment will be stated.

The SECRETARY. On page 6 it it proposed to strike out lines 7, 8, 9, and 10, in the following words:

The name of John Beckley, late of Company H, Fourth Regiment Ohio Volunteer Infantry, and pay him a pension at the rate of $30 per month in lieu of that he is now receiving.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment of the Committee on Pensions was, on page 6, after line 22, to strike out:

The name of Eliza A. Stevenson, widow of David K. Stevenson, late of Company E, One hundred and fifty-fifth Regiment Pennsylvania Volunteer Infantry, and pay her a pension at the rate of $20 per month in lieu of that she is now receiving.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 7, after line 18, to strike out:

The name of Rebecca L. Scarbrough, widow of Martin L. Scarbrough, late of Company D, Sixty-second Regiment Ohio Volunteer Infantry, and pay her a pension at the rate of $12 per month.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 7, line 25, before the words "per month," to strike out "$24" and insert "$30," so as to make the clause read:

The name of Louis Krott, late of Company K, Tenth Regiment Indiana Volunteer Cavalry, and pay him a pension at the rate of $30 per month in lieu of that he is now receiving.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 8, after line 8, to strike out:

The name of Minnie S. Rector, widow of John E. Rector, late of Company F, Fiftieth Regiment Missouri Volunteer Infantry, and pay her a pension at the rate of $12 per month.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 11, after line 7, before the words "per month," to strike out "$17" and insert "$20," so as to make the clause read:

The name of Juliet Burt Norton, widow of Oliver D. Norton, late acting assistant surgeon United States Army, and pay her a pension at the rate of $20 per month.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 11, after line 11, to strike out:

The name of Ruth E. Hering, widow of Samuel Hering, late of Company I, Fourth Regiment United States Infantry, and pay her a pension at the rate of $12 per month.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 12, after line 22, to strike out:

The name of Rosa T. Wallace, widow of William J. Wallace, late of Company A, Thirteenth Regiment New York State Militia Infantry, and pay her a pension at the rate of $20 per month in lieu of that she is now receiving.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. SHIVELY. On page 12, the soldier having died, I move to strike out lines 15, 16, 17, and 18.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The amendment will be stated.

The SECRETARY. On page 12 it is proposed to strike out all of lines 15, 16, 17, and 18 in the following words:

The name of Andrew J. Bruer, late of Company D, Forty-ninth Regiment Pennsylvania Volunteer Infantry, and pay him a pension at the rate of $40 per month in lieu of that he is now receiving.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, I will ask the Senator from Indiana if in all cases where these paragraphs are stricken out the beneficiaries have died since the bill was reported?

Mr. SHIVELY. Not in all cases.

Mr. GALLINGER. In most of them?

Mr. SHIVELY. In all cases where I have tendered the amendment to-day that is true.

The next amendment of the Committee on Pensions was, on page 13, after line 6, to strike out:

The name of L. Maggie Morris, widow of James S. Morris, late of Company M, Ninth Regiment Kentucky Volunteer Cavalry, and pay her a pension at the rate of $20 per month in lieu of that she is now receiving.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 13, after line 10, to strike out:

The name of Winchester E. Moore, late acting third assistant engineer, United States Navy, and pay him a pension at the rate of $30 per month in lieu of that he is now receiving.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 14, after line 6, to strike out:

The name of Susie B. Kellogg, widow of Charles R. Kellogg, late of Company H, Eleventh Regiment Indiana Volunteer Infantry, and pay her a pension at the rate of $24 per month in lieu of that she is now receiving.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 15, line 15, before the word "widow," to insert "former," so as to make the clause read:

The name of Phoebe Jane Cosgriff, former widow of James Cosgriff, late of Company B, Thirty-first Regiment Missouri Volunteer Infantry, and pay her a pension at the rate of $12 per month.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 16, line 19, after the word "receiving," to insert "Provided, That in the event of the death of Alice G. Morse, helpless and dependent child of said Asa Morse, the additional pension herein granted shall cease and determine: And provided further, That in the event of the death of Marianne F. Morse the name of the said Alice G. Morse shall be placed on the pension roll, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws, at the rate of $12 per month, from and after the date of death of said Marianne F. Morse," so as to make the clause read:

The name of Marianne F. Morse, widow of Asa Morse, late of Company B, One hundred and seventy-first Regiment Pennsylvania Volunteer Infantry, and pay her a pension at the rate of $24 per month in lieu of that she is now receiving: Provided, That in the event of the death of Alice G. Morse, helpless and dependent child of said Asa Morse, the additional pension herein granted shall cease and determine: And provided further, That in the event of the death of Marianne F. Morse the name of the said Alice G. Morse shall be placed on the pension roll, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws, at the rate of $12 per month, from and after the date of death of said Marianne F. Morse.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 18, line 5, before the words "per month," to strike out "$50" and insert "$40," so as to make the clause read:

The name of William Cassidy, late of Company I, Sixth Regiment United States Infantry, and pay him a pension at the rate of $40 per month in lieu of that he is now receiving.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 18, line 9, before the words "per month," to strike out "$24" and insert "$36," so as to make the clause read:

The name of Frank Fuquay, late of Company G, Seventeenth Regiment United States Colored Infantry, and pay him a pension at the rate of $36 per month in lieu of that he is now receiving.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 19, after line 6, to strike out:

The name of Louisa M. Buchanan, widow of Charles H. Buchanan, late of Company K, Fourth Regiment Michigan Volunteer Infantry, and pay her a pension at the rate of $36 per month in lieu of that she is now receiving: Provided, That in the event of the death of Viola L. and Nora J. Buchanan, helpless and dependent children of said Charles H. Buchanan, the additional pension herein granted shall cease and determine: And provided further, That in the event of the death of Louisa M. Buchanan, the name of said Viola L. and Nora J. Buchanan shall be placed on the pension roll, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws, at the rate of $12 per month each from and after the date of death of said Louisa M. Buchanan.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 20, line 5, before the words "per month," to strike out "$24" and insert "$30," so as to make the clause read:

The name of Stephen S. Kelly, late of Company A, Twenty-fifth Regiment Indiana Volunteer Infantry, and pay him a pension at the rate of $30 per month in lieu of that he is now receiving.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 21, line 4, after the word "determine," to strike out "And provided further, That in the event of the death of Mary A. Austin, the name of said Carl L. Austin shall be placed on the pension roll, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws, at the rate of $12 per month from and after the date of death of said Mary A. Austin," so as to make the clause read:

The name of Mary A. Austin, widow of Eli Austin, late of Company H, One hundred and first Regiment Illinois Volunteer Infantry, and pay her a pension at the rate of $24 per month in lieu of that she is now receiving: Provided, That in the event of the death of Carl L. Austin, helpless and dependent child of said Eli Austin, the additional pension herein granted shall cease and determine.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendments were concurred in.

The amendments were ordered to be engrossed and the bill to be read a third time.

The bill was read the third time and passed.

IMPORTATION OF CONVICT-MADE GOODS.

The bill (S. 4161) to prohibit the importation and entry of goods, wares, and merchandise made in whole or in part by convict, pauper, or detained labor, or made in whole or in part from materials which have been made in whole or in part or in any manner manipulated by convict or prison labor, was announced as next in order.

Mr. POMERENE. Mr. President, that was originally a Senate bill, and I think Order of Business No. 490 is a House bill relating to the same subject matter. There is also a favorable report upon that bill.

While the chairman of the committee is not here, I am disposed to think that he would prefer to have the House bill taken up for consideration and passed when it is reached. For that reason I suggest that this bill be passed over.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The bill will be passed over.

Mr. GALLINGER. I give notice that when the bill is reached, if I am in the Senate, I shall move to include goods, wares, and merchandise made by any trust.

BILLS OF LADING.

The bill (S. 387) relating to bills of lading was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The bill has heretofore been read.

Mr. POMERENE. I send to the desk an amendment which I offer to the bill.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The amendment will be stated.

The SECRETARY. Strike out the first paragraph, lines 3, 4, 5, and 6 on page 1, in the following words:

That bills of lading issued by any common carrier for the transportation of goods from a place in a State to a place in a foreign country or from a place in one State to a place in another State shall be governed by this act.

And in lieu to insert:

That bills of lading issued by any common carrier for the transportation of goods in any Territory of the United States or the District of Columbia, or from a place in a State to a place in a foreign country, or from a place in one State to a place in another State, or from a place in one State to a place in the same State through another State or foreign country, shall be governed by this act.

Mr. SMOOT. I should like to ask the Senator having the bill in charge whether this was a unanimous report from the Committee on Interstate Commerce?

Mr. POMERENE. I will say that it was, and also that the bill as presented now passed the Senate in August, 1912.

Mr. SMOOT. I knew a bill similar to it had passed the Senate. I did not know whether it was a unanimous report.

Mr. POMERENE. It was.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the amendment submitted by the Senator from Ohio.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. POMERENE. On page 20, line 13, I move to strike out "fourteen" and insert "fifteen," so as to read:

SEC. 49. That this act shall take effect on the 1st day of January, 1915.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendments were concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

Mr. POMERENE. For the information of Senators and Representatives who may not be familiar with the bill I ask that the report which was submitted may be printed in the RECORD. It consists of only about 5 pages.

There being no objection, the report was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

[Senate report No. 309, Sixty-third Congress, second session.]

BILLS OF LADING.

Mr. POMERENE, from the Committee on Interstate Commerce, submitted the following report to accompany S. 387:

The Committee on Interstate Commerce, to which was referred Senate bill 387, reports it back to the Senate with the recommendation that it pass.

This is the same bill passed by the United States Senate on August 24, 1912. It represents the result of the labors of the commissioners on uniform State laws of the American Bar Association after repeated conferences with representatives of the American Bankers' Association, the railroad organizations, and the shippers' associations. It was originally prepared for the purpose of having it enacted by the various State legislatures, so as to provide uniformty of legislation upon this subject. It has already been enacted by 10 of the leading commercial States—Connecticut, Illinois, Iowa, Louisiana, Massachusetts, Maryland, Michigan, New York, Ohio, and Pennsylvania. The pending bill does not vary substantially from the acts passed by the legislatures of the several States just named, save that it is made applicable to interstate and foreign commerce.

NECESSITY FOR FEDERAL LEGISLATION.

In the hearings before the Interstate Commerce Committee it was testified that bills of lading were annually issued in American commerce representing consignments of merchandise valued at $25,000,000,000; that 99 per cent of the tonnage and value of the commodities shipped and covered by these bills of lading involved interstate and foreign commerce and 1 per cent intrastate commerce. On these bills of lading it was estimated that $5,000,000,000 in cash was advanced annually by the banks. It must follow, therefore, that any reasonable legislation which will lead to the security of these bills of lading in the hands of their owners or holders must be of immense value to all parties concerned.

In 1889 the Supreme Court of the United States in the case of Friedlander v. Texas & Pacific Railroad (130 U. S., 416) held:

"A bill of lading fraudulently issued by the station agent of a railroad company without receiving the goods named in it for transportation, but in other respects according to the customary course of business, imposes no liability upon the company to an innocent holder who receives it without knowledge or notice of the fraud and for a valuable consideration."

Under the agreed statement of facts in this case it appears that the bill of lading issued November 6, 1883, was executed by one Easton, the agent of the railroad company, fraudulently and in collusion with one Lahnestein, and without receiving any of the cotton represented by the bill of lading to have been received and without any expectation on the part of Easton to receive it. A conspiracy had been entered into between Easton and Lahnestein to issue these bills of lading for Lahenstein's benefit. They had been guilty of similar transactions without receiving the cotton. The court held that under these circumstances the agent was acting beyond the scope of his authority, and therefore the railroad company was not bound.

Whether this decision was sound doctrine or not, it was based upon precedent, and ever since has been recognized as the law of the land by the Federal courts as well as by some of the State courts.

This rule has resulted in great losses to the buyers of merchandise who have the right to depend upon the bona fides of bills of lading, to bankers and financial men who have bought or discounted drafts secured by these bills of lading, and to the sellers of cotton, grain, or other products who are honest and whose transactions are discredited by reason of the frauds which have been permitted to be perpetrated by fraudulent shippers conspiring with freight agents.

As a further result of this rule millions of dollars have been lost to commerce.

The pending bill (sec. 25) modifies the law as laid down in the Friedlander case by declaring:

"SEC. 25. That if a bill of lading has been issued by a carrier or on his behalf by an agent or employee the scope of whose actual or apparent authority includes the issuing of bills of lading, the carrier shall be liable to (a) the consignee named in a straight bill or (b) the holder of an order bill who has given value in good faith for damages caused by the nonreceipt by the carrier of all or part of the goods or their failure to correspond with the description thereof in the bill at the time of its issue."

Other defects in the present law which it is sought to correct by this bill may be classified under the heads of: (1) Shipper's load and count; (2) Duplicate bills of lading; (3) Altered bills of lading; (4) Spent bills of lading; (5) Forgeries.

SHIPPER'S LOAD AND COUNT.

Many abuses have arisen by carriers marking a bill of lading "Shipper's load and count." This, of course, affects their value for banking and credit purposes. These abuses are sought to be remedied by sections 23 and 24 of the bill, which provides:

"SEC. 23. That when goods are loaded by a carrier such carrier shall count the packages of goods, if package freight, and ascertain the kind and quantity, if bulk freight; and such carrier shall not, in such cases, insert in the bill of lading "Shipper's load and count," or other words of like purport, indicating that the goods were loaded by the shipper and the description of them made by him. If so inserted, contrary to the provisions of this section, said words shall be treated as null and void and as if not inserted therein.

"SEC. 24. That when goods are loaded by a shipper, at a place where the carrier maintains an agency, such carrier shall, on written request of such shipper, and when given a reasonable opportunity by the shipper so to do, count the packages of goods, if package freight, and ascertain the kind and quantity if bulk freight, within a reasonable time after such written request, and such carrier shall not, in such cases, insert in the bill of lading 'Shipper's load and count,' or other words of like purport, indicating that the goods were loaded by the shipper and the description of them made by him. If so inserted, contrary to the provisions of this section, said words shall be treated as null and void and as if not inserted therein."

DUPLICATE BILLS OF LADING.

The regulations with regard to duplicate bills of lading are found in sections 6, 7, and 18. They read as follows:

"SEC. 6. That order bills issued in a State for the transportation of goods to any place in the United States on the Continent of North America, except Alaska and Panama, shall not be issued in parts or sets. If so issued, the carrier issuing them shall be liable for failure to deliver the goods described therein to anyone who purchases a part for value in good faith, even though the purchase be after the delivery of the goods by the carrier to a holder of one of the other parts: Provided, however, That nothing contained in this section shall be interpreted or construed to forbid the issuing of order bills in parts or sets for such transportation of goods to Alaska, Panama, Porto Rico, the Philippines, Hawaii, or foreign countries, or to impose the liabilities set forth in this section for so doing.

"SEC. 7. That when more than one order bill is issued in a State for the same goods to be transported to any place in the United States on the Continent of North America, except Alaska and Panama, the word 'duplicate,' or some other word or words indicating that the document is not an original bill, shall be placed plainly upon the face of every such bill except the one first issued. A carrier shall be liable for the damage caused by his failure so to do to anyone who has purchased the bill for value in good faith as an original, even though the purchase be after the delivery of the goods by the carrier to the holder of the original bill: Provided, however, That nothing contained in this section shall in such case for such transportation of goods to Alaska, Panama, Porto Rico, the Philippines, Hawaii, or foreign countries be interpreted or construed so as to require the placing of the word 'duplicate' thereon, or to impose the liabilities set forth in this section for failure so to do.

"SEC. 18. That a bill upon the face of which the word 'duplicate,' or some other word or words indicating that the document is not an original bill, is placed plainly shall impose upon the carrier issuing the same the liability of one who represents and warrants that such bill is an accurate copy of an original bill properly issued, but no other liability."

ALTERED BILLS OF LADING.

Section 16 provides:

"SEC. 16. That any alteration, addition, or erasure in a bill after its issue without authority from the carrier issuing the same, either in writing or noted on the bill, shall be void, whatever be the nature and purpose of the change, and the bill shall be enforceable according to its original tenor."

SPENT BILLS OF LADING.

Many frauds have been committed in the commercial world by using bills of lading after the goods have been delivered because they were not taken up or canceled. Frequently these bills of lading have been used for the purpose of securing credit. The railroads have not been responsible because they have been able to prove the delivery of the goods. Sections 14 and 15 of the bill remedy these abuses. They read as follows:

"SEC. 14. That except as provided in section 29, and except when compelled by legal process, if a carrier delivers goods for which an order bill has been issued, the negotiation of which would transfer the right to the possession of the goods, and fails to take up and cancel the bill, such carrier shall be liable for failure to deliver the goods to anyone who for value and in good faith purchases such bill, whether such purchaser acquired title to the bill before or after the delivery of the goods by the carrier and notwithstanding delivery was made to the person entitled thereto.

"SEC. 15. That except as provided in section 29, and except when compelled by legal process, if a carrier delivers part of the goods for which an order bill had been issued and fails either—

"(a) To take up and cancel the bill, or

"(b) To place plainly upon it a statement that a portion of the goods has been delivered, with a description, which may be in general terms, either of the goods or packages that have been so delivered or of the goods or packages which still remain in the carrier's possession, he shall be liable for failure to deliver all the goods specified in the bill to anyone who for value and in good faith purchases it, whether such purchaser acquired titled to it before or after the delivery of any portion of the goods by the carrier, and notwithstanding such delivery was made to the person entitled thereto."

FORGED BILLS OF LADING.

While the laws of the several States penalize the forging of bills of lading, it is believed, because of the fact that by far the greater part of the commerce is interstate in character, there should be some Federal legislation making the forging and issuing of forged bills of lading punishable by the Federal courts. This is done by section 44 of the pending bill.

It is not intended by this report to call especial attention to all of the provisions of the bill, as they are self-explanatory. Suffice it to say that in addition to the correction of the abuses hereinbefore specially referred to the bill is a codification of the principles now controlling interstate shipments. It defines the rights and liabilities of the common carriers, consignors and consignees, and all other intermediate owners and holders of bills of lading. It will serve to make more uniform the commercial laws of our country.

CONSTITUTIONALITY OF THE BILL.

Congress is given the right "to regulate commerce with foreign nations and among the several States and with the Indian tribes." Under this provision of the Constitution it seems clear that interstate shipments are subject to the control of Congress. Bills of lading are but representatives of the goods therein described, defining the rights and liabilities of the carriers, the consignor, and the consignee, and other holders thereof. If the goods shipped are subject to the rules and regulations of interstate commerce, then clearly it seems bills of lading, representing them, also must be interstate commerce, and Congress therefore has the right to declare the terms and conditions upon which they may be issued, used, and retired.

Without intending to discuss the many decisions of our Supreme Court defining the power of Congress over interstate commerce, we believe the constitutionality of the pending bill by analogy clearly follows from the doctrine laid down in Southern Railway v. United States (222 U. S., 20). The syllabus reads as follows:

"The safety-appliance act of March 2, 1893 (27 Stat., 571, ch. 196), as amended March 2, 1903 (32 Stat., 943, ch. 976), embraces all locomotives, cars, and similar vehicles used on any railway that is a highway of interstate commerce, and is not confined exclusively to vehicles engaged in such commerce.

"The power of Congress under the commerce clause of the Constitution is plenary and competent to protect persons and property moving in interstate commerce from all danger, no matter what the source may be; to that end Congress may require all vehicles moving on highways of interstate commerce to be so equipped as to avoid danger to persons and property moving in interstate commerce."

Mr. Justice Van Devanter, who delivered the opinion of the court, said, at page 26:

"We come, then, to the question whether these acts are within the power of Congress under the commerce clause of the Constitution, considering that they are not confined to vehicles used in moving interstate traffic, but embrace vehicles used in moving intrastate traffic. The answer to this question depends upon another, which is, Is there a real or substantial relation or connection between what is required by these acts in respect of vehicles used in moving intrastate traffic and the object which the acts obviously are designed to attain, namely, the safety of interstate commerce and of those who are employed in its movement; or, stating it in another way, is there such a close or direct relation or connection between the two classes of traffic, when moving over the same railroad, as to make it certain that the safety of the interstate traffic and of those who are employed in its movement will be promoted in a real or substantial sense by applying the requirement of these acts to vehicles used in moving the traffic which is intrastate as well as those used in moving that which is interstate? If the answer to this question, as doubly stated, be in the affirmative, then the principal question must be answered in the same way. And this is so, not because Congress possesses any power to regulate intrastate commerce as such, but because its power to regulate interstate commerce is plenary and competently may be exerted to secure the safety of the persons and property transported therein and of those who are employed in such transportation, no matter what may be the source of the dangers which threaten it. That is to say, it is no objection to such an exertion of this power that the dangers intended to be avoided arise, in whole or in part, out of matters connected with intrastate commerce."

POSTAL SAVINGS DEPOSITORIES.

The bill (H. R. 9318) to amend the act approved June 25, 1910, entitled "An act to establish postal savings depositories for depositing savings at interest with the security of the Government for repayment thereof, and for other purposes," was announced as next in order.

Mr. GALLINGER. Let the bill go over.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The bill will go over.

POSTAL SAVINGS SYSTEM.

The bill (H. R. 7967) to amend the act approved June 25, 1910, authorizing a postal savings system was announced as next in order.

Mr. GALLINGER. Let that likewise go over.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The bill will go over.

Mr. BRYAN. Does the Senator from New Hampshire ask to have the bill go over?

Mr. GALLINGER. If it can be acted upon immediately, I will not object. There is an amendment pending, I believe.

Mr. BRYAN. I think there will be no further debate upon it. It has been discussed quite fully.

Mr. GALLINGER. The two Senators from Massachusetts are much interested in the bill. They are both absent. I will ask that the bill go over for the day.

Mr. BRYAN. Of course the Senator can do that, but the Senators from Massachusetts have understood all the time that at the first opportunity the bill would be called up. I served notice upon both of them and upon the Senate, and I appeal to the Senator from New Hampshire to let the bill come up and be voted upon. It has been postponed and kicked about for three months.

Mr. GALLINGER. That is equally true of the entire calendar, or most of the calendar. We have been unfortunate in not passing many bills. We have passed only several in the last two hours or hour and a half. I am very sure that the Senators from Massachusetts would wish to be present when the bill is considered. One other Senator has suggested to me that he wishes to have the bill go over. He did not speak for himself and I do not want to speak for him, but this is a very important measure. I hope the Senator from Florida will not feel that any injustice is being done him. I think the bill ought to be acted upon at some time, but it is a House bill and we have yet some time in which to pass House bills. Our rule has been in former Congresses when nearing the close of a session to take up only House bills and act upon them.

Mr. BRYAN. This is not such a bill as can be passed on a few moments' consideration, but the bill has been considered several days, though the consideration has always been fragmentary. The bill passed the House in December and was referred to the committee in February and reported here in March. Because of the grain-inspection bill and other bills it has been postponed. The last time the Senator from New Hampshire objected to the bill because of the absence of the Senators from Massachusetts. I stated then, as the Senator can verify by the RECORD, that I would give notice to every Senator that at the first opportunity when the bill was reached upon the calendar I intended to ask that it be considered. We have been upon the calendar for an hour and a half this afternoon, and, certainly, if either of the Senators from Massachusetts wanted to speak further on the bill—and they have already spoken upon it two or three times—they had an opportunity to find out that it would be reached, and they could be here.

Mr. GALLINGER. I do not at all speak for the Senators from Massachusetts, and in view of the fact that the Senator from Florida did give that notice, which I distinctly recall, and the Senators from Massachusetts are not present, I withdraw my objection.

Mr. BURTON. I must object, Mr. President.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Objection is made, and the bill goes over.

PANAMA CANAL TOLLS.

Senate resolution 289, requesting the President to inform the Senate what "other matters of even greater delicacy and nearer consequence" are referred to in his message of March 5, 1914, was announced as next in order.

Mr. JAMES. Let that go over.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The resolution will go over.

CHRIS KUPPLER

The bill (S. 2304) for the relief of Chris Kuppler was considered as in Committee of the Whole. It proposes to pay to Chris Kuppler, of Seattle, Wash., $2,137.21, in payment of the amount withheld from him as liquidated damages under a certain contract for the construction of the United States executive mansion at Juneau, Alaska, entered into by and between the duly authorized officer of the Treasury Department, representing the United States of America on the one part, and the said Chris Kuppler on the other part, dated August 1, 1912.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

FREDERICK J. ERNST.

The bill (S. 1128) for the relief of Frederick J. Ernst was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

The bill was reported from the Committee on Claims with an amendment, in line 4, to strike out "$1,500" and insert "$730," so as to make the bill read:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, directed to pay to Frederick J. Ernst the sum of $730, which sum, or so much thereof as may be necessary, is hereby appropriated out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, said sum to be payment in full for injury sustained by the breaking of a carboy of vitriol oil while storing the same for the United States Government at the Washington Navy Yard September 12, 1906.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment was concurred in. The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

PENSIONS AND INCREASE OF PENSIONS.

Mr. SHIVELY. I move to strike out lines 23 and 24, on page 17, and the first two lines on page 18, in the following words:

The name of William B. Warren, late of Company H, First Regiment United States Lancers, Michigan Volunteer Cavalry, and pay him a pension at the rate of $24 per month in lieu of that he is now receiving.

I move the amendment because the soldier has died since the bill was reported.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. SHIVELY. On page 24, line 21, the name "Tylor" should be "Tyler." I move to strike out "Tylor" and insert "Tyler," so as to read "James A. Tyler."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. SHIVELY. On page 25 I move to strike out lines 19, 20, 21, and 22, in the following words:

The name of David Crandell, late of Company K, Thirty-sixth Regiment Wisconsin Volunteer Infantry, and pay him a pension at the rate of $30 per month in lieu of that he is now receiving.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. BRYAN. On page 9 I move to strike out lines 1, 2, 3, and 4, which read as follows:

The name of Allison W. Pollard, late second lieutenant Company K, Seventeenth Regiment Kentucky Volunteer Cavalry, and pay him a pension at the rate of $20 per month in lieu of that he is now receiving.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the amendment proposed by the Senator from Florida.

Mr. BRYAN. Mr. President, this pensioner was placed on the pension roll by special act. He could not get upon the rolls under the law applying to soldiers of the Civil War. In 1866 he was granted a pension by special act. He served as second lieutenant in a Kentucky cavalry company from May 9, 1865, to September 20, 1865. The Interior Department held that it would not consider that he had taken part in the Civil War unless he showed actual engagement in battle or service; that the burden was upon him.

In view of the finding of the Interior Department the name of the pensioner was dropped from the rolls, he having been on the rolls before they found it out, I suppose. Then he applied to the Secretary of the Interior to reinstate him. He could only get upon the rolls by a special act. In 1906 he was placed upon the roll by a special act, and this bill is to increase his pension. He was not enlisted during the period of the war, as held by the Secretary of the Interior. The Secretary was right in his holding. I think there can be no doubt of this case. The House committee incorporates the former finding. I can see no reason why this name should appear in the bill to pension soldiers engaged in the Civil War, because he never enlisted until after the war was over.

Mr. SHIVELY. There is something formal and technical in the Senator's objection. It certainly does not go to the merits. There is no reason in the ground stated why the name of this beneficiary should be stricken out. Senators will observe that the report on this case is quite a long one. I will not detain the Senate by reading it. It is one of the cases in which the late lamented Senator from Kentucky, Mr. Bradley, took an interest.

On page 24 the report states:

Claimant is now 77 years of age and, as the evidence shows, in poor health and needy circumstances. His physician and neighbors testify that claimant is feeble and broken down and entirely incapacitated for any kind of labor to earn a living. The testimony further shows that claimant has no property except a small cottage home and no other income than his pension, namely, $12 per month, which is entirely insufficient for his support.

An increase of this soldier's pension to $20 per month is justified by the proofs on file, and your committee so recommend.

Mr. BRYAN. The Senator from Indiana reads in defense of the action of the committee from the report of the House committee showing that he is old and poor. The Senator does not undertake to meet the proposition that he never had any war service at all. If that is to be the test, we will have many more upon the pension roll. There are now many people old and poor who have as much right to be upon the pension roll as Mr. Pollard, whose name I move to strike out of the bill.

Mr. SMOOT. There is this difference, however, in Mr. Pollard's case: When he made application for a pension at the Pension Office he was allowed a pension at $8 per month. He had drawn a pension for a number of years when, after an investigation, the department held that having been stationed in one particular place and not in direct service and not having participated in any engagement of the Civil War——

Mr. BRYAN. Oh, no; the Senator will pardon me. He was not enlisted until May 19, 1865.

Mr. SMOOT. That is true; but the legal end of the war was August 20, 1865.

The Senator has been on the committee for a long enough time and he knows that there have been many pensions granted where the enlistment was even later than this one.

Mr. BRYAN. Mr. President, if the Senator will permit me, I do not deny that. I think that is true. I think if the Senator appeals to precedent he can find any kind of precedent——

Mr. SMOOT. Many of them.

Mr. BRYAN. Yes—that will justify any kind of a pension. There is no doubt about that.

Mr. SMOOT. I want to conclude what I have to say. In this case Mr. Pollard was granted a pension by the department, and it was found by the department that he was suffering from rheumatism and other disabilities contracted while he was in the service, but after he had been drawing a pension for a number of years at $8 per month there was another examination made, and under a rule of the department, as he had not been in any engagement in the Civil War, the pension was withheld from him.

Mr. GALLINGER. I recall very distinctly, Mr. President, that what is stated in this report is the exact truth, because I discussed it more than once with the late Commissioner of Pensions, and that is that the Pension Bureau made a ruling that the technical legal termination of the war was August 20, 1866, but—

Subsequently the Secretary of the Interior held that service under the second section of the act of June 27, 1900, must have been rendered both during and in some necessary connection with the War of the Rebellion as a part of its belligerent operations.

That is the technicality in this case. This soldier came under the ruling of the Bureau of Pensions and was granted a pension——

Mr. SMOOT. Of $8 per month.

Mr. GALLINGER. Of $8 per month. Subsequently the Secretary of the Interior made a different ruling as to the time of the termination of the war, and I suppose the soldier was dropped from the rolls as a consequence of that ruling.

Mr. SMOOT. He was dropped from the rolls.

Mr. JAMES. I want to say, if the Senator will permit me, that I know Mr. Pollard well. He lives in the adjoining county to mine. I have often talked with him about his pension case; he used to come to see me about it. It seems to me that if he went into the service of his country, though the war was technically over and though he was in no real engagements, yet if he did service to the Government, and by reason of that service contracted the disease that has afflicted him, as I know it has——

Mr. SMOOT. All his life.

Mr. JAMES. And he is a very deserving old fellow. I do not think a technicality of this sort ought to be invoked to keep him out of a pension, and I shall very gladly vote to give it to him.

Mr. GALLINGER. The report shows that—

During the period of his service was on detached duty at Bowling Green, Ky., and that his company, during the whole period of its existence, was stationed at Russellville, Owensboro, and Louisville, Ky.

So he apparently was in the service though he did not happen to be in any engagement, because the war was practically over.

Mr. SMOOT. I want to say further that this pensioner is 77 years old. The late Senator from Kentucky, Mr. Bradley, virtually made the same statement to the committee that the Senator from Kentucky [Mr. JAMES] has now made. The late Senator from Kentucky knew this pensioner personally; he knew the physical disabilities of the man and what he was suffering. The committee for that reason, and for the reason that the department has passed upon the question of his contracting the disease while in the Army, thought it was nothing more than right that he should be given a pension of $20 a month.

Mr. JONES. I want to ask the Senator a question. I have no objection to this bill, but, as I understand it, this pensioner is already drawing a pension by special act?

Mr. SMOOT. Yes; of $12 a month.

Mr. JONES. I had the impression—I do not know whether or not I am wrong—that the Committee on Pensions would not consider a bill where the pensioner was already drawing a pension under a special act. I want to know about that.

Mr. SMOOT. I will say to the Senator that there are particular cases where by a special act a pension is granted to a soldier or to a soldier's widow, but it is only in a case where they are utterly helpless, requiring a constant attendant, and where the condition of the soldier has materially changed for the worse since the first act was passed.

Mr. JAMES. If the Senator will permit me, while I was a Member of the other House I introduced the special act for Mr. Pollard, something like 10 years ago.

Mr. JONES. The granting of the pension has probably been delayed on the ground that the committee could not consider a bill where a pension by special act had already been secured.

Mr. JAMES. The special act was passed giving him $12 a month.

Mr. JONES. I want to say to the Senator from Utah that I have had one or two such cases. I remember one where a man was getting a pension by a special act, and he became paralyzed, actually absolutely helpless.

Mr. SMOOT. Requiring an attendant?

Mr. JONES. He had to be rolled around in a chair; but the committee absolutely refused to consider the bill for his relief.

I had another case where a man had secured a pension by special bill and became absolutely blind, and the committee said—I think it was the House committee, probably—that they would not consider a bill where they had granted a pension by special act. I think it is unjust, and I got the impression that the Senate committee would not consider bills of that kind; that that was an actual rule adopted by the committee.

Mr. BRYAN. It is.

Mr. SMOOT. There is a rule of the committee that a second special act for the relief of a soldier shall not be considered; but that rule, I will say to the Senator from Washington, has been violated—if you call it a violation—in a few cases; but it has been violated in no case, unless there has been a material change in the condition of the soldier from the time of the passage of the first act. In nearly every such case the pensioners are utterly helpless and require the constant attendance of a nurse.

Mr. JONES. I am glad to know that the committee will relax the rule in some cases upon a certain showing, because I have had cases that appealed very strongly to me as to which I was unable to get action.

Mr. BRYAN. Mr. President, of course if the Senator from Kentucky, the Senator from Indiana, and the Senator from Utah base this pension upon either of the grounds stated, that the Senator from Kentucky knows the pensioner, that he lives in an adjoining county, or that the late Senator from Kentucky was much interested in the case, or, as they all wind up their statement with the claim that he is old and poor, there is no answer to that; and I have no doubt the amendment I have offered will be disagreed to. But it will not be disagreed to with the Senate acting under the belief that this man suffered any injury in the service during the war. He does not claim to have done so, and this report does not say that he so claims.

Mr. JAMES. Will the Senator yield for a question?

Mr. BRYAN. Not just now.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, if the Senator from Florida will permit me. I will say that I became rather the champion of the Mexican War veterans. They were receiving pensions of eight and ten dollars a month, and I introduced a bill, which I think became a law, increasing their pension to $20. That was done solely upon the ground that they were old and poor. Many of those men did not have any wounds or disease contracted in the service. This is a very exceptional case, and I think we may well pass the bill.

Mr. BRYAN. It is an old-age pension, pure and simple, and nothing else.

Mr. GALLINGER. Not quite that, Mr. President, because this man did render service.

Mr. BRYAN. Not in the war.

Mr. GALLINGER. Then the report is not correct.

Mr. BRYAN. How could he render service in the war when the war was over, as the Senator knows, on May 17, 1865?

Mr. GALLINGER. We have granted pensions to hundreds of men who never reached the battle field. Many of the soldiers in the Mexican War were only en route to Mexico, and yet we granted them all pensions.

Mr. BRYAN. That is true.

Mr. GALLINGER. In the Spanish War there were regiments from New England that never got beyond Georgia, and yet they contracted disease there, and we pension them.

Mr. BRYAN. Of course, that has been true in all wars, Mr. President.

Mr. GALLINGER. Yes.

Mr. BRYAN. But they had enlisted while the war was going on; this man had not.

Mr. GALLINGER. But this man enlisted, he was accepted as a soldier, and he was given certain duties to perform as an officer. He could not very well participate in an engagement at that period, but he nevertheless owed allegiance to the Government as a soldier.

Mr. BRYAN. Oh, yes. Forty-nine years ago he was over 21 years of age, and his enthusiasm could have become aroused some years earlier; but he waited until a month after the war was over. Then it happened to occur to him that it would be a good idea to enlist; and now, after almost 50 years have elapsed, we are putting him on the pension roll; and the members of the committee who argue in favor of the claim do so upon the ground that he is old and poor. You can not distinguish his claim from the claim of any other old, poor, and dependent person.

Mr. JAMES. Mr. President, if the Senator will yield, I should like to ask him a question. The Senator announces the doctrine, if I gather the thought he suggests correctly, that a man in order to be entitled to a pension must have participated in a battle or a conflict.

Mr. BRYAN. The Senator did not gather my contention correctly.

Mr. JAMES. The Senator said that the war was over before this soldier enlisted. This soldier was in the service of his country, and whether he was in a conflict or not, whether the war had ended or not, if, while wearing the uniform and doing service under the flag, he contracted disease, in my judgment, he is as much entitled to a pension as if he were wounded in front of the cannon's mouth. It makes no difference provided he was serving his country; and you can not establish the doctrine that we will pension only those who are wounded, and say to a man who has, in the service of his country, contracted disease which has taken away from him his earning power and has racked him with pain, "Oh, no; we will not pay you anything because you were in no battles that were fought; you were in no conflicts; you stood ready to serve, however; you were serving——

Mr. BRYAN. In time of peace.

Mr. JAMES. "But the war was over." Many soldiers, and among them many of the best soldiers, are soldiers in time of peace because they help to preserve peace.

Mr. BRYAN. Mr. President, the Senator from Kentucky can not base this proposed increase of pension upon the ground that this man claims to have suffered or to have contracted any disease because of his enlistment in the Army. He did not claim that for himself.

Mr. JAMES. The report of the committee shows it.

Mr. SHIVELY. Has the Senator read the words on page 23 of the report?

Mr. BRYAN. I have; and they apply to the time before he enlisted, when he claims that he was a scout, and that his horse was shot from under him. He was not enlisted in the Army of the United States at that time and he does not claim that while he was a soldier after the war was over he contracted any disease. The Senator from Indiana and the Senator from Utah can only base action in this case on the ground that the claimant is old and poor.

Mr. SHIVELY. Mr. President, I base it on the ground that he was a soldier; that he was in the service of the United States; that he did serve over 90 days; that he served honorably; and that now he is old and poor.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the Senator from Florida.

The amendment was rejected.

Mr. BRYAN. I move to strike out, on page 27, lines 3 to 5, inclusive.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The amendment will be stated.

The SECRETARY. On page 27, after line 2, it is proposed to strike out:

> The name of Jennie F. Wilson, widow of William E. Wilson, late surgeon Tenth Regiment Illinois Volunteer Cavalry, and pay her a pension at the rate of $12 per month.

Mr. BRYAN. Mr. President, I make this motion in order that it may be brought to the attention of the Senate that this widow was married after June 27, 1890. She was married on June 3, 1891. Her age is given as 62. I do not believe that it is proper to be picking out cases here and there and granting pensions in cases in which the rule of the committee says it will not be done and the law says it will not be done. I think all ought to be treated alike. Personally I do not believe the date ought to be brought down to the present time, but there is no reason for singling out an individual who can get the ear of a Member of Congress and persuade him to introduce a bill for her relief.

Mr. SHIVELY. Mr. President, of course this pension could not be allowed under the general law or the case would not be before us. There are a few cases in which we have granted pensions to those who married soldiers within a brief time after June 27, 1890. If the widow had married the soldier before that time, as I have said, she would be entitled to a pension under the general law. The facts are exceptional and the case meritorious.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, there is another point in this case. She was a faithful nurse to the soldier, as the report states, "during many years of complete invalidism"; and that was taken into consideration.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the Senator from Florida.

The amendment was rejected.

Mr. BRYAN. On page 19, I move to strike out lines 3 to 6, inclusive.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The amendment will be stated.

The SECRETARY. On page 19, after line 2, it is proposed to strike out:

> The name of John M. Nelson, who served as pilot, second class, on the U. S. S. General Sherman, Mississippi Squadron, United States Navy, and pay him a pension at the rate of $24 per month.

Mr. BRYAN. Mr. President, this man was a Mississippi River pilot and never enlisted at all.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the amendment submitted by the Senator from Florida.

The amendment was rejected.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendments were concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

THE PUBLIC HEALTH SERVICE.

The bill (S. 2616) to promote the efficiency of the Public Health Service was announced as next in order.

Mr. JAMES. Let that bill go over.

Mr. RANSDELL. Mr. President, I hope the bill will not be objected to unless there is some good reason for the objection. I do not want to object to the bills of other Senators. This bill has been on the calendar for a long time, and involves a matter of great public importance. I hope the Senator from Kentucky will withdraw his objection.

Mr. JAMES. I have no objection; I did not know the Senator was here.

Mr. RANSDELL. I am here and have been waiting to have it considered not only to-day but on many other days. I think the bill will take but very little time.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill (S. 2616) to promote the efficiency of the Public Health Service, which had been reported from the Committee on Public Health and National Quarantine with amendments.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, the Senator who objected to the consideration of the bill the last time it was reached on the calendar is not in the Chamber, and I believe he would like to be present when the bill is being considered.

Mr. SWANSON. Who made the objection?

Mr. RANSDELL. Who objected to it at that time? I do not recall.

Mr. SMOOT. The RECORD will show, Mr. President.

Mr. SWANSON. I think a similar bill has repeatedly passed the Senate.

Mr. RANSDELL. This bill has been on the calendar for a long time. It is, as I have said, a matter of great public importance, and I hope Senators will allow it to be considered and acted upon. It is not our fault that Senators who may want to object to it are not here to-day.

Mr. SMOOT. I am perfectly aware of that, Mr. President. I have not said anything about that, but if the bill is going to be considered I should like to ask some questions about it as to what the cost will be and what it really means.

Mr. RANSDELL. I will be glad to try to answer the questions.

Mr. SMOOT. I will ask the Senator, then, in what cost will the bill involve the Government?

Mr. RANSDELL. The estimated cost is about $50,000 per annum. That is according to the report from the Treasury Department, which is found on page 4 of the report with the bill at the lower part of the page.

Mr. SMOOT. The figures are $49,634.

Mr. RANSDELL. Yes; $49,634.

Mr. SMOOT. I will ask the Senator if this bill does not propose an increase in addition to the one that was granted two or three years ago?

Mr. RANSDELL. I can not say just when the other increase was granted, but I know that the bill is in the interest of fairness to this great health service. I believe that the officers of that service ought to be put on a par with the officers of the Army and Navy, and that is where the increase comes in principally.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, I have not even had time to read the report on the bill, but I will say to the Senator that it seems to me that this was a part of a bill that was introduced two years ago, at which time there was a substantial increase granted to the officers of this service, and the legislation proposed in this bill was rejected by the Senate.

Mr. SWANSON. Mr. President, if the Senator will permit me, I think this bill has passed the Senate repeatedly. It has failed of passage in the House of Representatives on account of objection there.

Mr. SMOOT. If that is the case, then I am mistaken as to the bill, and I really feel that I ought to read over the report.

Mr. RANSDELL. I should like to say that the Senator was a member of the committee that reported this bill favorably and was present when part of the discussions were had with reference to it. He did not say anything of that kind when we were discussing it in the committee, as I recall.

Mr. SMOOT. I was not there when the bill was reported out. If it is the same bill that passed the Senate, with the amendments that were offered by myself on the floor of the Senate, two years ago, and failed of passage in the House, I really have no objection to it; but from hastily reading the bill, and without taking the time to read the report, it seems to me the items of increase provided in this bill are the items of increase that were disagreed to by the Senate at the time the increase was granted before.

Mr. RANSDELL. I will say to the Senator that I do not see how there can be any objection to the items of increase, because they simply provide for commutation of quarters for the medical officers of the Public Health Service and place those public health officers on terms of equality with the health officers of the Army and the Navy. Those are substantially all the increases that I know of, except that the bill does provide for the appointment of several additional officers in the Public Health Service, who are strongly urged by the Secretary of the Treasury—five additional professors in the Public Heatlh Service. That, of course, would mean some additional pay, but it seems to me we can well afford to be a little bit liberal with the Public Health Service. We have been liberal with many things, and they do not use up a great deal of the public money. I should like to see just a little liberality displayed toward them, if we are going to be liberal with anything in the world.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, I am always a friend of the Public Health Service, and recognize the great importance and value of its work. I have not studied this bill. I will ask the Senator exactly why five professors are appointed? What do they do? Do they lecture?

Mr. RANSDELL. No; I do not understand that they are to lecture. To be entirely frank with the Senator, I can not tell him exactly why they are called professors, except that they wish to give them some title. They wish, I may say, to keep them in the service. A good many of their very best men have left the service because of increased pay and increased honors offered elsewhere, and it was thought that this would help to keep them in the service.

Mr. GALLINGER. In view of the title, I should think they must be teachers in some capacity; and, if so, that is desirable. I do not question the advisability of it; it was only that the term attracted my attention.

Mr. RANSDELL. I will say very frankly that it was thought by the head of the Public Health Service that this title would be helpful in retaining the services of these very valuable men. The service has lost some men of very great professional ability recently and it is in danger of losing some others. Whenever the men develop great ability some college or other educational institution tries to get them, and offers them bigger salaries. There is a tendency to quit the health service because the pay is so small. This, I imagine, is an attempt to help keep them by giving them more honorary titles anyway.

Mr. GALLINGER. If this title confers an honor, I do not see why it should not go to men now in the service.

Mr. RANSDELL. I may say that they propose to give it to several of the men who are already in the service.

Mr. GALLINGER. It says "five additional professors."

Mr. RANSDELL. That is true; and it also says:

That the chiefs of the Divisions of Zoology, Pharmacology, and Chemistry in the Hygienic Laboratory may, upon the recommendation of the Surgeon General of the Public Health Service, be appointed by the Secretary of the Treasury as professors of zoology, pharmacology, and chemistry, respectively, of the Public Health Service, and they shall be entitled to leaves of absence as now provided by law for the commissioned medical officers of the Public Health Service.

And so forth.

Mr. GALLINGER. It continues the matter a little further. The men who are in this service are all graduates, and they have all undergone a very rigid examination. It seems to me rather strange that we should now assign men to instruct them in zoology, pharmacology, and chemistry. I am not going to object to it. I only wished to get the information; that was all.

Mr. SWANSON. If the Senator will read the report on page 3, he will see that these five men are to engage in research work. I do not think any department of the Government has done more good work and done more to benefit the country than the Public Health Service of this Government.

Mr. GALLINGER. We all recognize that.

Mr. SMOOT. Nobody denies that.

Mr. KENYON. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Louisiana yield to the Senator from Iowa?

Mr. RANSDELL. I do.

Mr. KENYON. I should like to ask if these men, designated as professors, are doctors?

Mr. RANSDELL. They are.

Mr. KENYON. And the committee feel that by calling them professors they will be able to retain them better than by calling them doctors?

Mr. RANSDELL. Yes. I understand they are physicians.

Mr. KENYON. I call that to the attention of the Senator from New Hampshire as being worthy of serious consideration.

Mr. SMOOT. I wish to say to the Senator that no one has a higher regard for the Public Health Service than I. I think a law ought to be passed consolidating all of our public health activities into one public health service, taking them from the different departments, and having that great service perform all of the work along that line that the Government has to do. I have introduced a bill to that effect upon more than one occasion, but it has failed of passage.

I do not understand this bill, however; and it is for that reason, and that alone, that I am going to ask that it be passed over for a day. I will promise the Senator in charge of it that I will take the report home to-night and read it, and I will also take the bill passed by the Senate two years ago and compare it with this one; and if this is the same as the bill that passed the Senate two years ago I will assist the Senator in any way I can to secure its passage. I object to its consideration at this time, however.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The bill will be passed over.

Mr. WARREN. Mr. President, I ask permission to say to the Senator who has charge of the bill that before it comes up again I wish he would consult the Army law regarding this 10 per cent matter. He will find that this bill does not correspond to the rate paid in the Army, which I understand it is the intention of this bill to follow.

Mr. RANSDELL. I thank the Senator for the suggestion. I was taking what the Secretary of the Treasury said in regard to it. He was probably misinformed.

Mr. WARREN. Furthermore, there should be some information as to how these professors are to be appointed. As their rank will be that of lieutenant colonel, we want to know where they will come from.

Mr. RANSDELL. I thank the Senator, and I will make the investigation.

FRANK AUSTIN AND OTHERS.

The bill (S. 4449) for the relief of Frank Austin and others was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

The Secretary read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Treasury is hereby authorized and directed to pay, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, to the parties named herein or their legal representatives, the following amounts of money that are their pro rata parts of the sum of $5,618.51, the balance due one J. B. Greer, under his contract with the Eastern Branch, National Home for Disabled Volunteer Soldiers dated, September 25, 1907, for the improvement of sewerage and a drainage system at the Eastern Branch, National Home for Disabled Volunteer Soldiers at Togus, Me., and which sum was not paid to the said J. B. Greer, but was retained by the treasurer of said Eastern Branch to meet the claims of persons and corporations who furnished materials and labor to said Greer in connection with said contract and was afterwards covered by the said treasurer into the Treasury of the United States after the parties herein named had filed notice of their claims stating the character and amount of the same with the treasurer of said Eastern Branch, namely: Frank Austin, $25.90; Harold Bickford, $34.97; H. Brown, $4.10; Bennett & Stoddard Co., $18.13; Brooks Hardware Co., $278.15; E. R. Bean, $11.55; E. E. Brookings, $5.29; M. L. Bayard & Co., $418.09; John F Burns, $58.71; J. H. Cogan & Co., $242.69; Mark T. Clafton, $4.40; Decker & Day Hardware & Coal Co., $32.73; W. A. French, $5.29; C. M. Fossett, $1.60; Patrick Fag, $7.56; George Fuller Sons, $20.90; J. A. Ferguson, $34.97; R. A. Fossett, $9.69; Fifield Bros., $8.43; John Goodine, $11.51; W. Henry, $46.44; A. R. Hayes & Co., $34.41; Kennebec Central Railroad Co, $94.34; Kennebec Construction Co., $226.63; Ira Marston, $4.15; William J. Marston, $5.40; L. L. Newcomb, $2.25; Oakland Manufacturing Co., $262.02; Pacific Flush Tank Co., $507.24; Proctor & Bowie, $99.29; Portland Stoneware Co. $1,164.67; Peter Rackliff, $7.55; George E. Reed, $68.48; W. H. Radcliff, $3.24; Charles Rockliff, $18.37; Claud Rockliff, $7.55; Roe Stephens Manufacturing Co., $231.53; B. C. Shaw, $103.74; H. M. Springer, $107.19; Charles E. Sturgis, $20.72; J. A. Shaw, $230.31; W. J. Skehan & Co., $20.33; Charles Stockbridge, $3.24; Charles W. Shaw, $108.37; Alfred O. Turner, $28.33; L. L. Wellman, $116.56; F. A. Witham, $5.29; O. R. Wellman, $84.50; W. D. Harrington, $89.51; W L. Blake, $32.69; Leo. Rafeal, $649.51; total, $5,618.51.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, I notice that the Senator reporting the bill is here. In the report I notice nothing from any of the departments as to the justice of the claim or what the claim may be.

Mr. JOHNSON. I call the attention of the Senator from Utah to the fact that the report says:

The president of the Board of Managers of the National Home for Disabled Volunteer Soldiers recommends the passage of the bill in a letter dated March 2, 1914, to the Secretary of War.

Mr. SMOOT. That may be true, but——

Mr. JOHNSON. Very briefly, I will explain to the Senator the object of the bill.

A contractor undertook to put in a system of sewerage and drainage at the Soldiers' Home at Togus, Me. He entered into a contract and failed to carry out his contract. In the meantime the material men and labor men who had furnished material and labor filed claim for lien, and the amount of $5,618.51 was retained by the Government to meet these claims. The Government afterwards went on and performed the contract and charged it up to the contractor. After the payment of all the bills and performing the work this money was left with which to pay these lien claims. In the meantime the money was covered into the United States Treasury, because under the law it had to be returned after a year, I think, and it is in the United States Treasury now. These people filed their claims, however, and they were approved, and the treasurer of the home reported that they had been approved and the amounts agreed upon fully decided upon; and here they have asked to have their pro rata part of this money which was held back by the Treasury.

Mr. SMOOT. I will ask the Senator why these people did not get their money from the bondsman of the contractor?

Mr. JOHNSON. The bondsman proved to be unable to satisfy the claim. This money in the hands of the Treasury did not belong to the United States. It was money due the contractor, the balance of the contract price which was not needed to complete the work.

Mr. SMOOT. Does the Senator know whether, after the work had been completed by the Government, it cost the Government more than the original contract called for?

Mr. JOHNSON. This balance was left after the work was done.

Mr. SMOOT. Surely that can not be the case.

Mr. JOHNSON. Yes; I mean that. I have looked through the matter, and that is exactly what I mean. After the work was completed by the Government there was left of the contract price this balance that was not needed to reimburse the Government for the work which it had performed in completing the contract. That was covered back into the United States Treasury. Claims to the amount of $12,000, I think, were filed; but there was only this sum to meet those claims, and I have asked here that these men may be paid their pro rata part of the balance.

Mr. SMOOT. Has it cost the Government no more to do the work itself than if the contractor had been successful?

Mr. JOHNSON. No more, and this balance was left.

Mr. SMOOT. That being the case, I have no objection to the consideration of the bill. The report ought to state it, however.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

BOLOGNESI, HARTFIELD & CO.

The bill (S. 1882) for the relief of Bolognesi, Hartfield & Co. was announced as next in order.

Mr. GALLINGER. There is an adverse report on that bill. Let it go to Rule IX.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The bill will go to the calendar under Rule IX.

AIDS TO NAVIGATION IN ALASKA.

The bill (S. 3800) making an appropriation for aids to navigation in Alaska was announced as next in order.

Mr. KERN. Let the bill go over.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. Mr. President, I hope the Senator will not ask to have this bill go over, unless there is some particular reason for it. It is very much needed along the coast of Alaska, and it is recommended by the department, as shown by the report. The bill is a very short one. It is simply carrying out an appropriation that has been heretofore made for the same purpose.

The Senator knows that there have been a great many wrecks up there and great loss of life, simply because that coast has been neglected; and it seems to me the bill ought to be passed.

Mr. KERN. I withdraw the objection, then, if it will not take any time.

There being no objection the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill. It appropriates, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, the sum of $60,000 for the establishment of aids to navigation and the improvement of existing aids to navigation in Alaska, in accordance with the estimates submitted by the department.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

BILLS PASSED OVER.

The bill (S. 531) to set apart certain lands in the State of Oregon as a public park, to be known as the Saddle Mountain National Park, was announced as next in order.

Mr. SMOOT. I am requested to ask that that bill go over.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The bill will be passed over.

The bill (H. R. 4938) providing for the issuance of patents to transferees of town lots purchased from the United States at public sale in certain cases was announced as next in order.

Mr. KERN. Mr. President, I ask to have that bill go over.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The bill will be passed over.

THE PHILIPPINE SCOUTS.

The bill (S. 1281) providing for the retirement of certain officers of the Philippine Scouts was announced as next in order.

Mr. KERN. Let that bill go over.

Mr. WARREN. Mr. President, I hope that bill may be considered. It is very short. It has passed the Senate twice and has been favorably recommended to the House. It applies only to three men, possibly, and perhaps only to one now, as one has died since, and possibly two.

Mr. KERN. All right; I withdraw the objection.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill. It provides that any person who served at any time in the Volunteer Army in the Civil War and has heretofore served as captain in the Philippine Scouts, and has since been retired as an enlisted man, and whose time of actual service in the Regular and Volunteer forces of the United States shall aggregate more than 40 years, and whose aggregate of services, together with certificates of merit and honorable service, when computed as provided by existing law for the retirement of enlisted men, shall amount to not less than 50 years, may, upon nomination by the President and by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, be placed upon the retired list of the Army as a captain of Infantry in recognition of his long and efficient service in the Army.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

MATTHEW LOGAN.

The bill (S. 3761), for the relief of Matthew Logan, was announced as next in order.

Mr. KERN. Let the bill go over.

Mr. WARREN. Mr. President, these are very short bills; they are for the relief of very old people, so that they may have pensions, and I hope they will not be objected to. The individual cases have been carefully scanned.

This bill relates to a man who did excellent service for a long time. I hope the Senator will withdraw the objection.

Mr. SHIVELY. Yes; he performed over 50 years of splendid service.

Mr. KERN. I withdraw the objection.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill. It provides that in the administration of the pension laws and the laws governing the National Home for Disabled Volunteer Soldiers, or any branch thereof, Matthew Logan shall hereafter be held and considered to have been honorably discharged from the military service of the United States as a private of Battery H, First Regiment Rhode Island Volunteer Light Artillery, on the 25th day of July, 1865, provided that no pension shall accrue prior to the passage of this act.

Mr. OVERMAN. Was any adverse report ever made on this bill by the Committee on Military Affairs?

Mr. WARREN. Never. The bill has passed the Senate twice, and has been favorably reported to the House, but it was not reached there.

Mr. OVERMAN. It has been a long time since the war. Sometimes these bills come before the committee and are reported adversely, and later are introduced again and reported favorably. I should like to know whether that has ever been done in this case.

Mr. WARREN. No; it has not.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

JOHN P. WAGNER.

The bill (S. 229) for the relief of John P. Wagner was announced as next in order.

Mr. OVERMAN. Let that bill go over.

Mr. KENYON. I hope the Senator will withdraw the request.

Mr. OVERMAN. Is the Senator interested in the bill?

Mr. KENYON. Yes; I am.

Mr. WARREN. I think if the Senator will read the report he will see that the bill is one that ought to be acted upon.

Mr. OVERMAN. Has there ever been any adverse report on this bill?

Mr. KENYON. No; there has not.

Mr. WARREN. This man has had two honorable discharges from the Army, after several promotions, in one case by expiration of time. He was mustered in for a third time as a second lieutenant and recruiting officer, and raised a company. Some altercation came up between him and a general officer, and he was dropped without any trial at all.

Mr. GALLINGER. I think a reading of the report will show that the bill ought to be passed. It says that he was sent from his command to get provisions, and among other things he got some intoxicating liquids, which he carried back internally. [Laughter.]

Mr. OVERMAN. I withdraw the objection.

Mr. GALLINGER. On his way back he failed to salute an officer and was summarily dismissed from the service.

Mr. WARREN. Without any trial.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill. It provides that in the administration of the pension laws and the laws governing the National Home for Disabled Volunteer Soldiers, or any branch thereof, John P. Wagner shall hereafter be held and considered to have been honorably discharged from the military service of the United States as a captain of Company H, Two hundred and second Regiment Pennsylvania Volunteer Infantry, on the 12th day of November, 1864, provided that no pension shall accrue prior to the passage of this act.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

CAPT. HAROLD L. JACKSON.

The bill (S. 3768) to restore Capt. Harold L. Jackson, retired, to the active list of the Army was announced as next in order.

Mr. KERN. Let the bill go over.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The bill will go over.

BENJAMIN E. JONES.

The bill (S. 1803) for the relief of Benjamin E. Jones was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

The bill was reported from the Committee on Claims with an amendment, on page 1, line 5, to strike out "$100" and insert "$70," so as to make the bill read:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to pay Benjamin E. Jones, junior engineer, United States Geological Survey, the sum of $70, and said amount is hereby appropriated out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, said sum to be in full of all losses incurred and damages sustained by him in an accident while engaged in the Government service.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended and the amendment was concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

S. W. LANGHORNE AND H. S. HOWELL.

The bill (S. 2334) for the relief of S. W. Langhorne and the legal representatives of H. S. Howell was announced as next in order.

Mr. SMOOT. There have been a great many bills similar to this from the Committee on Claims of the Senate. I remember one from my own State. I have always been unable to get a favorable report from the committee for paying rent for an office for the land office at Salt Lake City.

Mr. KERN. I am surprised at that.

Mr. SMOOT. I want to say to the Senator that I believe there are a great many cases of this kind all through the United States, and was it not understood——

Mr. BRISTOW. If the Senator will allow me, may I inquire if this is one of those cases where a land office in the old days provided its own building until the receipts amounted to a certain sum and then the Government repaid the rent?

Mr. SMOOT. I was going to ask the same question.

Mr. BRISTOW. If it is, there are scores of such claims lying around here, and we had better not go into the question now at this late hour in the afternoon anyway.

Mr. WALSH. Permit me to say that the merits of this bill have been fully considered by the committees of the House and the Senate, and a similar bill has heretofore passed both bodies. I think this bill passed this body twice before and the House once, and I think in each instance the bill failed to be enacted simply because of the state of the calendar.

Mr. BRISTOW. If it is the general type of bills of which a great many have been presented, they all ought to be considered together. They are all upon exactly the same basis and one ought not to go through and the others be denied.

Mr. WALSH. The report gives the entire facts. I do not understand that there is any doubt about the situation at all.

Mr. SMOOT. I have the report here, and I think this is one of those cases.

Mr. BRISTOW. One ought not to be allowed and the others held back.

Mr. SMOOT. Let the bill go over for the present, anyway.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The bill will go over.

PHILIP COOK.

The bill (S. 1063) for the relief of Philip Cook was announced as next in order.

Mr. KERN. Let the bill go over.

Mr. KENYON. I hope an objection will not be made to this bill. This man served over four years in the Army. He is an old man. He went home after the war was over and supposed that the matter was ended. It is very unjust, it seems to me, to refuse relief on that military record. He was in some 30 or 40 battles. He had a remarkable military record. I hope the Senator who objected will withdraw his objection.

Mr. KERN. Very well.

The bill was considered as in Committee of the Whole. It provides that in the administration of the pension laws Philip Cook, who was a private of Troop H, Sixth Regiment United States Cavalry, shall hereafter be held and considered to have been discharged honorably from the military service of the United States as a member of said troop and regiment on the 3d day of August, 1865.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

BILLS PASSED OVER.

The bill (S. 543) to correct the military record of John T. Haines was announced as next in order.

Mr. KERN. Let the bill go over.

The VICE PRESIDENT. It will go over.

The bill (S. 4405) to provide for and encourage the prospecting, mining, and treatment of radium-bearing ores in lands belonging to the United States, for the purpose of securing an adequate supply of radium for Government and other hospitals in the United States, and for other purposes, was announced as next in order.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. Let the bill go over.

The VICE PRESIDENT. It will go over.

The bill (S. 2806) relative to the appointment, pay, and rank of chief warrant officers in the Revenue-Cutter Service was announced as next in order.

Mr. KERN. Let the bill go over.

The VICE PRESIDENT. It will go over.

The bill (S. 1802) construing the provisions of section 8 of the act entitled "An act to improve the efficiency of the personnel of the Revenue-Cutter Service," approved April 16, 1908, was announced as next in order.

Mr. OVERMAN. Let the bill go over.

The VICE PRESIDENT. It will go over.

The bill (H. R. 6060) to regulate the immigration of aliens to and the residence of aliens in the United States was announced as next in order.

Mr. SMOOT. Let that go over.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The bill will go over.

The bill (H. R. 8846) making appropriation for payment of certain claims in accordance with findings of the Court of Claims, reported under the provisions of the acts approved March 3, 1883, and March 3, 1887, and commonly known as the Bowman and the Tucker Acts, and under the provisions of section No. 151 of the act approved March 3, 1911, commonly known as the Judicial Code, was announced as next in order.

Mr. GALLINGER. Let that go over.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The bill will go over.

FREDERICK B. M'GUIRE.

The bill (S. 2245) for the relief of Frederick B. McGuire, trustee for Bessie J. Kibbey, owner of lot 75, square 628, Washington, D. C., with regard to assessment and payment of damages on account of changes of grade due to construction of the Union Station, District of Columbia, was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

CLARA DOUGHERTY AND OTHERS.

The bill (S. 23) for the relief of Clara Dougherty, Ernest Kubel, and Josephine Taylor, owners of lot No. 13; of Ernest Kubel, owner of lot No. 41; and of Mary Meder, owner of the south 17.10 feet front by the full depth thereof of lot No. 14, all of said property in square No. 724, in Washington, D. C., with regard to assessment and payment for damages on account of change of grade due to the construction of Union Station, in said District, was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

CHARLOTTE J. PILE AND OTHERS.

The bill (S. 11) for the relief of Charlotte J. Pile, Eastmond P. Green, and Easie C. Gandell, owners of lots Nos. 53, 54, and 55, in square No. 753, Washington, D. C., with regard to assessment and payment of damages on account of change of grade due to construction of the Union Station, in said District, was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

DESTITUTE, INFIRM, OR AGED PARENTS.

The bill (S. 1653) providing against the abandonment of destitute, infirm, or aged parents was announced as next in order.

Mr. KERN. Let the bill go over.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The bill will go over.

PENSIONS AND INCREASE OF PENSIONS.

The bill (S. 4969) granting pensions and increase of pensions to certain soldiers and sailors of the Regular Army and Navy and of wars other than the Civil War, and to certain widows and dependent relatives of such soldiers and sailors, was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

It proposes to pension the following persons at the rate per month named:

Eli Ziegler, late of the company of Indian scouts known as the Forsyth Scouts, commanded by Col. George A. Forsyth, United States Army, who participated in the battle with the Indians on the Arickaree Fork of the Republican River, in Colorado, on the 17th day of September, 1868, $20 per month.

Mr. SHIVELY. On page 1 I move to strike out lines 6, 7, 8, and 9, in the following words:

The name of Emma Sherwood, widow of John Sherwood, late of U. S. S. Cumberland, United States Navy, War with Mexico, and pay her a pension at the rate of $20 per month in lieu of that she is now receiving.

I move the amendment because the beneficiary has died since the bill was reported.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment was concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

IDA A. CHEW.

The bill (S. 31) for the relief of Ida A. Chew, owner of lot 112, square 721, Washington, D. C., with regard to assessment and payment of damages on account of changes of grade due to construction of the Union Station, District of Columbia, was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

EDWARD STEWART.

The bill (S. 4311) for the relief of Edward Stewart was announced as next in order.

Mr. KERN. Let the bill go over.

Mr. CATRON. Mr. President, I should like to have the bill passed at this time. I hope the Senator from Indiana will withdraw his objection. Mr. Stewart is 84 years old. He served three and a half years in the war and was in nearly every battle in which his command was engaged during that time.

He enlisted in May, 1861, and served until March 31, 1863, when, at Louisville, Ky., the officers of his command went to a barbecue and left the soldiers standing in line; they had nothing to eat, and became dissatisfied, and quite a number of them went home. Mr. Stewart afterwards reenlisted in the Sixth Ohio Cavalry and served 17 or 18 months, when, at the close of the war, he was honorably discharged. His whole record is good. He is now 84 years old and in absolute need.

Mr. KERN. I have no objection to the passage of the bill.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. WALSH in the chair). The objection is withdrawn.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill. It provides that in the administration of the pension laws and the laws governing the National Home for Disabled Volunteer Soldiers, or any branch thereof, Edward Stewart shall hereafter be held and considered to have been honorably discharged from the military service of the United States as a private of Company C, Second Regiment Michigan Volunteer Infantry, on the 31st day of March, 1863, but no pension shall accrue prior to the passage of this act.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

BILLS, ETC., PASSED OVER.

The joint resolution (S. J. Res. 120) creating a joint committee of Congress, and authorizing said committee to acquire, by purchase or condemnation, the property known as Monticello, and embracing the former home of Thomas Jefferson and the family graveyard in which his remains were interred, with such lands and grounds appurtenant thereto as the committee shall find necessary in order to carry out the various public objects and purposes in said resolution set forth, all of said property being located in Albemarle County, Va., was announced as next in order.

Mr. KERN. Let the joint resolution go over.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The joint resolution will go over.

The bill (S. 3545) to provide for the highway-improvement work by the United States Department of Agriculture in cooperation with the highway departments of the several States was announced as next in order.

Mr. GRONNA. I ask that the bill may go over.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill will go over.

JOHN W. CUPP.

The bill (S. 201) for the relief of John W. Cupp was announced as next in order.

Mr. KERN. Let that go over.

Mr. BRISTOW. I do not think the Senator wants this bill to go over. It is for the relief of a postmaster who was authorized to put his money in a national bank. The bank failed, and this is to reimburse him.

Mr. KERN. Very well.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill, which had been reported from the Committee on Claims with an amendment, in line 6, after the word "of," to strike out "$229.48" and to insert "$205.71," so as to make the bill read:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to pay, out of any moneys in the Treasury of the United States not otherwise appropriated, to John W. Cupp, late postmaster at Galion, Ohio, the sum of $205.71, to reimburse him for the payment of said sum, which, as postmaster, he had deposited as funds of the post office at Galion, Ohio, in the Galion National Bank, and which funds were lost by reason of the insolvency and failure of said bank.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment was concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

ESTATE OF JAMES HARVEY DENNIS.

The bill (S. 3808) to carry out the findings of the Court of Claims in the case of James Harvey Dennis was announced as next in order.

Mr. JAMES. This is a very meritorious bill and carries out the findings of the Court of Claims. I sincerely trust that no Senator will object to its consideration. It pays a claim that ought to have been paid many years ago. A bill similar to this one, which has been favorably reported from the Committee on Claims of the Senate, has passed the House of Representatives and is now upon the calendar. It is House bill 11040, which I ask be substituted for this bill.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, the substitution will be made.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill (H. R. 11040) to carry out the findings of the Court of Claims in the case of James Harvey Dennis. It proposes to pay to L. Helen Dennis, administratrix of the estate of James Harvey Dennis, deceased, the sum of $26,538, in accordance with the findings of the Court of Claims reported in Senate Document No. 619, Sixty-second Congress, second session, said sum to be accepted and receipted for in full of said claim against the Government; but L. Helen Dennis shall file in the Treasury Department a certificate showing her appointment as administratrix of said estate and a certified copy of her bond, which bond must be at least equal in amount to the sum hereby appropriated. If L. Helen Dennis be dead or no longer holding said office, payment shall be made to her successor upon his or her complying with the same requirements as herein provided with respect to the said L. Helen Dennis, administratrix.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

Mr. GALLINGER. Let the Senate bill be indefinitely postponed.

Mr. JAMES. I move that the bill (S. 3808) to carry out the findings of the Court of Claims in the case of James Harvey Dennis be indefinitely postponed.

The motion was agreed to.

T. S. WILLIAMS.

The bill (H. R. 1055) for the relief of T. S. Williams was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

The bill was reported from the Committee on Claims with an amendment, in line 6, to strike out "$315.55" and insert "$47.17," so as to make the bill read:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to pay, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, to T. S. Williams the sum of $47.17, in full compensation for payments made by the said T. S. Williams to secure the service of a mail carrier from August 6, 1900, to June 30, 1902, at Williamsburg, Idaho.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment was concurred in.

The amendment was ordered to be engrossed and the bill to be read a third time.

The bill was read the third time and passed.

SIMON M. PRESTON.

The bill (S. 691) for the relief of Simon M. Preston was considered as in Committee of the Whole. It proposes to pay to Simon M. Preston, of Seattle, Wash., the sum of $5,838.36, the amount of the defalcation of D. C. Kearns, a deputy collector under Simon M. Preston, who was collector of internal revenue for the first election district of Mississippi from the 1st of June, 1869, to the 22d of May, 1873, which sum was repaid to the United States Government by Simon M. Preston, and its collection by him from D. C. Kearns having been hindered and prevented by his pardon by the President of the United States and the remission of the fine equivalent to said sum.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

FREDERICK J. ERNST.

Mr. SMITH of Maryland. Mr. President, the Senate has this afternoon pass the bill (S. 1128) for the relief of Frederick J. Ernst. I find on the calendar a similar bill which has passed the House of Representatives. I ask that the Senate reconsider the vote by which the Senate bill was ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed, and proceed to the consideration of the House bill.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, the vote by which the Senate passed the bill S. 1128 will be reconsidered. The Chair hears none.

Mr. SMITH of Maryland. I now move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of House bill 4405.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill (H. R. 4405) for the relief of Frederick J. Ernst, which had been reported from the Committee on Claims with an amendment, on page 1, line 4, after the words "sum of," to strike out "$1,500" and to insert "$730," so as to make the bill read:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, directed to pay to Frederick J. Ernst the sum of $730, which sum is hereby appropriated out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, said sum to be payment in full for injury sustained by the breaking of a carboy of vitriol oil while storing the same for the United States Government at the Washington Navy Yard, September 12, 1906.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment was concurred in.

The amendment was ordered to be engrossed and the bill read a third time.

The bill was read the third time and passed.
